The honorable Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. BADGER,] yesterday made some beautiful observations upon this branch of the subject, which I have no doubt found a response in the hearts of all who heard him, as they certainly did in mine. Opinion is strength. "The race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong," says the Book of Revelation, and victory does not always perch on the standard of power, says history, the book of human experience. Many a battle has been lost before it was fought, paradoxical as it may seem. The consciousness of superiority on the one side, and of inferiority on the other, have led to results which force alone could not have obtained; and the prestige of a great name at the head of an army, has frequently preceded its march, and rendered its operations, not less easy than triumphant. These are among the moral causes, which direct and control physical force, and the world is full of the lessons they teach. Let us never forget them. There are circumstances connected with our position, our prospects, and our institutions, which fix the attention of the world upon our career. Every man, who recollects the war of 1812, well knows the feelings produced by our first triumph on the ocean. That little contest between two frigates, in which the "Constitution" was victorious, occasioned a sensation, both in this country and in England, which it is now, in the meridian of our power, difficult to realize. It seemed, as though the charm of British invincibility were broken; as though there were another nation, which might claim that it needed "no towers along the steep," and that its march, too, would be upon the mountain wave. Nations, indeed, confident of themselves, have towers of strength in the hearts of their people, far better than any bulwarks, that range the ocean or defend the land. When the shout of that victory rang through the United States and England, it sounded like the warning knell of British superiority. The subsequent career and efforts of our Navy, during the same war, rendered that feeling still stronger. And down to our day, I have no doubt that branch of our service has preserved the same noble character for discipline and efficiency, notwithstanding the reproaches we have sometimes heard addressed to it even in this Senate, and which were as unwelcome, as they were unconvincing to me. I believe the Navy, is just as efficient now, as it was on the day when Hull captured the Guerriere. I believe that no naval service in the world has a braver, or more patriotic, or a more able body of officers, than has ours. And every American should look with jealousy upon all attempts to depreciate this great arm of national defense, and should cherish it, not less as an instrument of power, than as a source of glory, in those collisions with other nations, which we cannot hope to escape.

Sir, I know very well that I have been accused of being very inimical to England, and of being desirous of precipitating hostilities between that country and ours. Nothing can be more unjust—nothing can be more unreasonable than this charge against me. I should deprecate a war between the two countries as one of the greatest calamities that could befall them; and I hope never to live to see the day when they will be involved in hostilities. I repeat, no man is more ready than I am, to do justice to the eminent qualities of the English character, nor to those great feats in arts and arms; which have given a proud distinction to England during the most stirring period the world has ever seen. But while I cheerfully render this justice, it does not therefore follow, that I am forever to forget the injurious aspersions upon my own country, which, at one time, gave a tone, and a very unjust one, to the public opinion of Christendom, respecting the moral, social, and political condition of the American people. No, sir; I, for one, will be guilty of no such subserviency. During a long life, I have watched the course of England, and I want no contest of arms with her; I want a contest of arts, of science, of literature, of all those pursuits which give dignity to man, and prosperity and intelligence to human nature.

I repeat, I have observed from early life the course of England. From the day that John Adams presented himself to George III. as the first representative of the lost colonies, in his Cabinet—a scene which that sturdy old patriot has graphically described in his letters—down almost to the present day, there has been a feeling of aversion in the British breast against the great American Republic. At first, this feeling of aversion was mingled with contempt; but at length, time and events, while they left the sentiment of repulsion in active operation, substituted for contempt some degree of respect, which is now gradually mingling with another feeling, destined to exert a powerful influence upon the intercourse, intellectual and material, between the two countries. I am sure I shall not be accused, in this Senate, of speaking under the impulse of too ardent a patriotism when I say that this sentiment is growing stronger day by day, and that, day by day, its consequences will be more developed.

Mr. BADGER. What is it?

Mr. CASS. Apprehension. Now, sir, I do not pretend that I have borne this national contumely in the Christian spirit of turning another cheek to receive another blow. I have not done so. I have been for carrying the war into Africa. When an Englishman talks about the wickedness of a spirit of aggrandizement, and about that reprobate Brother Jonathan, who covets the goods of all his neighbors, strong and weak, and seizes all where he does not fear resistance, I am ever tempted to refer to a little island, off the western coast of Europe, which boasts that the sun never sets upon her possessions, and which never acquired a foot of territory but by the sword; while the acquisitions we have made, with one exception, have been made by peaceful arrangement to the great satisfaction of the people inhabiting them; and the exceptional case was one which we had conquered in a just and necessary war, and for which we also paid a valuable consideration.

It is perhaps a part of the conformation of an Englishman, certainly improved by constant practice, that he is very acute in seeing the mote in Brother Jonathan's eye, but very obtuse in discerning the beam in his own. I have, from time to time, in public and in private, wherever I have heard or seen these aspersions, met them in the real Hannibalian spirit, in which national attacks ought to be met. It is within the knowledge of the present generation, that, with supercilious cant, a British review asked the question, "Who reads an American book?" And the pregnant inquiry was repeated, with true national complacency, by almost every man, who could read a primer from John O'Groat's house to the Land's End; aye, and it went on its way to Siberia rejoicing. The question meant much more than was asked. It meant: What name, but one, has America ever added to the long list of illustrious men, who have marked their days and their deeds upon the history of the world, from the earliest period of recorded time down to our age? It meant, what single feat in arms, in arts, in science, in literature, or in any of the great pursuits, which elevate the human character, and which give stability to nations, and freedom and prosperity to men—what single feat has America ever performed to illustrate her own character, or to command the respect or the gratitude of the world? Nobody asks that question now. It is a self-answered inquiry. Why, sir, the very subject, that engrosses our attention, the very object, which is now producing this spirited competition between us and England, is the result of the genius of an American—of the genius of Fulton, who first showed the practical applicability of steam to ocean and to inland navigation. He did not, indeed, reveal a new world to an old one, like his great predecessor in the realms of discovery, Columbus; but he brought two worlds into closer proximity than they had been before. He almost annihilated distance. He practically reduced the circumference of the world to one third of its original extent; and he opened a career for the industry and enterprise of nations, that no vision even of the imagination, had ever before shadowed forth, to stimulate or to reward human exertions.

This power is but in the infancy of its career, and already it has advanced in its work with the pace of a giant. The smoke of the steamboat, as well as the white canvas of the sailing ship, is spread upon the world of waters—aye, and it is seen in every nook of the globe, wherever man is to be found to need the benefits of commerce, the consolations of religion, or the blessings of intellectual advancement, and he must be wiser or rasher than I am, who undertakes to set limits to the effects of this discovery—where it is to lead the world, and what great changes in civilization it is to produce. Why, sir, it is a possession richer than the gold of our modern Ophir, more precious than all the spicy treasures of "Araby the blest." It is the great invention of modern days. It marks the present as the era of civilization above all other recorded epochs in the calendar of time.

One word more upon another point. The feeling, to which I have referred, existing between England and our own country, has felt the softening influence of time and intercourse. It was not at all unnatural that, when we were first violently separated from the parent country, the disruption should lead to mutual aversion, and especially on the part of the defeated nation. We were a small people, who had come happily out of a great contest. By the blessing of God, the justice of our cause, and the valor, patriotism, and wisdom of our fathers, gained a great victory; and with it the best Government (and I hope we shall hold on to it) which the world has ever seen; or, in my opinion, ever will see elsewhere. It is not wonderful, that the intercourse between the two nations, which commenced under such circumstances, commenced and continued in a spirit of unkindness. But I am happy to know, that a sensible melioration has taken place. I trust, that ere long the two nations will have no contest, but that competition, which is at once the incentive and the reward of a generous national rivalry—a strife for superiority in all the pursuits, interesting to civilization and to the prosperity of nations. That is a contest, into which we have entered, and of which the subject before us is an important branch. I am not willing to abandon it. I am not willing to confess, directly or indirectly, that we have been beaten; and that sentiment is to my mind a paramount reason for holding on at present to this enterprise—at any rate, till all the necessary facts are clearly ascertained.

I yesterday had an amendment read for information, which I shall submit at the proper time. Its object is, simply to have a full and practical examination of these vessels, with their cost, and the probable expense of sailing them; and to cause the report in relation to them to be presented to Congress at the next session; so that we may be able definitely to form an opinion upon their value and their properties, and upon the propriety of continuing their employment. I am willing to provide for this additional contract until that can be done; but not beyond that time, if the examination and report should be adverse. I shall vote for the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina to limit the duration of the grant; and if it is pressed by no one else it will be by me. I am desirous to place this matter in such a situation, that Congress may terminate the arrangement, whenever it is found by practical inquiry to be unsatisfactory.

If such a provision is made, the arrangement will be a safe one, as the matter will then be within the control of Congress.

Mr. CLEMENS. Before the vote is taken, I wish to say that I agreed to pair off with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SPRUANCE,] who was compelled to go home; and although nothing was said about amendments, I suppose that, in good faith, I must refrain from voting on any amendment which will materially affect the character of the bill.

Mr. MORTON. I wish to state that I have paired off with the Senator from Massachusetts; [Mr. DAVIS,] on all the questions connected with this amendment. I therefore wish to be excused from voting.

The question was then taken on the amendment to the amendment, and resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Borland, Brodhead, Brooke, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Felch, Geyer, Hunter, Jones of Iowa, Jones of Tennessee, King, Mallory, Mason, Sebastian, Underwood, Wade, Walker, Weller, and Whitcomb—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Badger, Bayard, Bell, Berrien, Bradbury, Bright, Cass, Clarke, Dawson, Douglas, Fish, Gwin, Hale, Hamlin, Houston, James, Mangum, Miller, Norris, Pearce, Pratt, Rusk, Seward, Shields, Smith, Stockton, Sumner, and Upham—28.

So the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BROOKE. I move to strike out the amendment proposed by the committee and to insert the following, as another section.

"SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That, in addition to the compensation now allowed to the Collins line of steamers for the transportation of the mails between New York and Liverpool, there shall be appropriated the whole amount of postages received on the mails carried by said steamers: Provided, That the number of trips of said steamers shall be increased from twenty to twenty-six per annum, at such times as shall be directed by the Postmaster General; said increase of service to commence on the first day of July, 1852."

The PRESIDENT. It will not be in order to offer that as an amendment, in that form, or without leaving a portion of the original amendment.

Mr. BROOKE. Then I will modify it, so as to strike out all of the original amendment after the words, "For additional compensation," and insert all that part of my amendment which commences with and follows the words, "now allowed to the Collins line," &c., to the end. It will then read, "For additional compensation to the Collins line," &c.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would suggest to my friend from Mississippi an alteration of his amendment, which is to strike out that portion which gives the present amount allowed to them. His purpose was, I suppose, to give them the whole amount of postages, and not the $385,000 in addition. I am not willing to give that sum in addition to the postages. I understand from the friends of this measure, that the owners of the line are of opinion that it will be a profitable thing to the Government. If that be so, I am willing the company should have all that may be made out of it; but I am not willing to give the $385,000 in addition. If the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi is altered so as to correspond to that idea, I will vote for it. I move to strike out "$385,000."

The PRESIDENT. The modification can only be made with the assent of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. BROOKE. I assent to the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee, and will modify the amendment.

The amendment was modified so as to read:

"For compensation, in lieu of that now allowed to the Collins line of steamers, for the transportation of the mails between New York and Liverpool, there shall be appropriated the whole amount of postages received on the mails carried by said steamers: Provided, That the number of trips of said steamers shall be increased from twenty to twenty-six per annum, at such times as shall be directed by the Postmaster General, said increase of service to commence on the first day of July, 1852."

Mr. HALE. I shall vote against that proposition, and any other, I do not care what it is, which makes the compensation of this line depend upon the postages which it may receive. I am in favor of cheap postage both on land and water; and the moment we assign over to these gentlemen, as a means of compensating them, the receipts from postages, and make their compensation depend upon them, they will have an interest in keeping the rates of postage where they now stand, and we shall be bound in honor not to reduce them during the continuance of their contract. For that reason I am utterly opposed to making their compensation depend on their receipts from postages.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I certainly cannot favor this amendment, if it will decrease the amount of letter writing; but I am sure it is entirely useless to resist the amendment which is proposed by the committee. It is like the French spoliation bill, and will be carried.

Mr. HALE. Yes, that is its manifest destiny.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I will say, however, to my friend from Tennessee, [Mr. Jones,] with regard to the trouble he has in consequence of the $385,000, that if that is left in the amendment of the committee, the bill will pass any how.

Mr. BROOKE. I ask the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ATCHISON. I desire a little information. I wish to know from any gentleman who can inform me, what was the amount received by the Government through this Collins line of steamers during the last twelve months? I wish to know what we are giving, and what will be the effect of this proposition.

Mr. HUNTER. The amount is much less than is now paid; that is certain.

Mr. PRATT. The effect, as I understand it, of the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi, would be to decrease, instead of increase the amount of compensation given to this line at present.

Mr. BADGER. Certainly.

Mr. PRATT. They are unable to go on now. What they want is present aid; but the effect of this amendment would be to decrease the amount of that aid.

Mr. BORLAND. If the supposition of the Senator from Maryland is correct, I must confess that some of the arguments used by the advocates of this appropriation are unintelligible to me. We have been told, as an inducement to make this appropriation, that this line would pay a revenue into the Treasury of the United States, even at the advance to $33,000 per trip; and now we are told that if we surrender to it the whole amount derivable from postage, it will not equal by 33 per cent. the $19,000 we now give. One statement or the other must be incorrect. It must either be untrue that the postages will not pay into the Treasury an amount equal to what it is proposed to give them, or the compensation now moved will not be a diminution of what they at present receive. One statement or the other must be erroneous; but which I am not prepared to say.

Mr. BAYARD. I understand the arguments used in favor of this proposition, differently from my friend from Arkansas. The proposition now made will necessarily defeat the bill. The parties have entered into a contract with the Government, in view of which they have already expended a large sum of money, to carry the mails for a specific sum. The argument used in support of the increased compensation has been, with some variations as used by different gentlemen, not that the postages at present would be a sufficient compensation for all expenses, but that ultimately, we may suppose from present indications, they will be sufficient. That is, when all the arrangements are complete, and the twenty-six trips shall be made, as is contemplated, the Government will not suffer any loss in paying the amount proposed as a compensation for mail service. But I have heard no Senator say that within the first year or the first two years, the postages will be equivalent to what it is now proposed to appropriate. The necessary effect of the proposition is this: these parties made a contract with the Government for the erection of a line of steamers, in pursuance of a policy which you chose to adopt some five years ago, and have already sunk, as private individuals, half a million of dollars of their own capital; and now in the Senate of the United States it is proposed, as if in mockery to them, to give over to them the postages, when your own returns show that they must incur a further loss by it, and you ask them to incur this ruinous loss for the next year. Is this a proposition which is worthy of the American Government; or is the amendment one which the Senate should sanction?

Mr. BERRIEN. In addition to the suggestion of the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] I think the statement of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] is correct, that this amendment is calculated to affect the power of the Government in its control over the postal arrangements—a power they never should part with.

The Government has entered into a contract, to continue in force for a term of ten years; and it is believed by the advocates of this appropriation, that the amount expended by the Government will be returned in that space of time. In lieu of following the terms of the contract, at a moment of time when its operation has not been sufficiently extensive to produce the beneficent results anticipated, we propose to reduce the amount of compensation by transferring to these parties the postages which may be received. Now, I say that this Government ought never to part with the control over the postal arrangements, at least so important a part of them as relates to our postal communications with Europe. We may be inhibited, in the event of this amendment being adopted, from making any modification in the postal arrangements. Desirous, as we may be, in the course of time to reduce the rates of postage, if this amendment prevails we shall have divested ourselves of all power to make any change.

It is suggested that this power may be exercised without injury to these parties, because the reduction of postage increases the amount of the receipts. That is the case; but the instant effect is not that ascribed to it. Some time must be allowed to intervene between the reduction of the postage and the period when the effects of the operation of that reduction will lead to an increase in the amount of receipts. In the mean time, these parties have a contract with us, under which they are transporting our communications across the Atlantic. If they suffer a reduction of their receipts in consequence of a reduction in the rates of postage, we shall have failed in carrying out in good faith the terms of our contract with them, or we must surrender our control over the postal arrangements, which I conceive to be a most important department of the Administration. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. BROOKE. I accepted the modification proposed by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. Jones,] without much reflection; and I am now inclined to believe that my original proposition was the correct one; for by the contract, this company is entitled to compensation by law, and we cannot take it from them by this bill, or any amendment thereto. I propose, therefore, to restore my amendment to its original form; and in answer to the suggestions of the Senators from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] and Georgia, [Mr. BERRIEN,] I will state that my amendment may be further modified, by retaining, or reserving, the power to the Post Office Department, or to Congress, to reduce the postage whenever they may think proper. I am willing to receive a modification to that effect, and will propose it myself, if no other Senator does so.

The PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi propose to modify his amendment?

Mr. BROOKE. Yes, sir; to restore it to its original form.

The PRESIDENT. If the Senator wishes to modify his amendment, the yeas and nays having been ordered, it can only be done by the unanimous consent of the Senate. If there is no objection on the part of the Senate, the Senator can modify his amendment.

No objection being offered, the amendment was modified, so as to restore it to its original form.

Mr. RUSK. If I understand the amendment, it proposes to give the whole of the postages, in addition to the amount now paid, as a compensation for the extra trips.

The PRESIDENT. That is the way the Chair understands it.

Mr. BADGER. No, no. It is to constitute the compensation for all the trips.

Mr. RUSK. I shall vote against it upon two or three grounds. In the first place, if it should run for the balance of the contract—of which there is a period of eight years unexpired—it will take an immense amount, over and above what we propose to give them by this amendment. My own opinion is, that, before the expiration of that time, that amendment will so operate as to give the proprietors of this line more than double what we propose to give them by the amendment of the committee.

Then, sir, the reasons assigned by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BERRIEN] are very potent, and weigh a good deal with me, namely, that, by the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi, we will surrender all control over postal matter.

Again, sir, there is another principle which I do not like to incorporate with the post office law. I think the Senator from Mississippi had better look to the receipts of the Post Office Department before he proposes such a proposition for our adoption—a proposition to farm out the postages for their proceeds. It might be done in other quarters as well as in this; and then we should find that Texas and Mississippi do not pay into the Treasury so much as they receive to aid in the transportation of the mails; while some of the larger States, which pay more in the shape of postages than they receive for the transportation of the mails, might fairly ask for the adoption of the same principle with regard to the transportation of the inland mails.

Mr. DAWSON. Will the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads answer me a single question?

Mr. RUSK. Certainly I will, if I can.

Mr. DAWSON. I desire to know whether, from his knowledge of the amount of postages received on letters brought by this line, he does not anticipate that, in a few years, the amount received into the Treasury from postages by this line, will be equivalent, or more than equivalent, to the extra amount which it is now proposed to pay?

Mr. RUSK. I do anticipate it; and I anticipate it from this fact: that the Postmaster General, in his report, states that the postages by this line, in 1851, exceeded the amount received for postages in the year 1850, by the sum of $183,000.

Mr. BROOKE. I will modify my amendment, so as to add to it this proviso:

Provided, That power is hereby reserved to Congress to reduce the rates of postage between the said ports.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think it would be right to attempt to interfere with the contract as it now exists; and it appears to me that this amendment does interfere with it, and proposes to take from the proprietors of this line the amount of $385,000 which they now receive, and compel them to receive in lieu of that sum, such amount as may accrue from the postages of letters and other mail matter which they may carry between New York and Liverpool.

Mr. PRATT. Oh, no; the amendment proposes to give them the amount resulting from the postages, in addition to the sum they now receive under the contract.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, then, I am afraid that it would operate as the Senator from Texas has alleged. If the amounts likely to be received from postages in a few years are such as have been estimated, I cannot agree to give them all the postages, and this $385,000 into the bargain. I cannot vote for the amendment, under that view, neither could I vote for it under the other, because I hold that we have no right to interfere with the contract. It seems to me that the only way in which my friend from Mississippi can attain his object, or can put his amendment in such a shape as to secure my vote, would be to give these contractors the option of receiving these postages in lieu of their present compensation, because we cannot break a contract without a breach of good faith.

And then, sir, the objection would still remain, which has been started in relation to the power of the Government to reduce the rates of postages under such a state of things. This objection could, however, be removed by reserving to Congress the right of reducing the rates of postage on condition of reinstating the parties in the position they occupied under the contract; so that in that way there would be no obstacle—none whatever; no difficulty in getting round that objection. But the difficulty with me is to get round the contract, when it is acknowledged on all hands that this allowance of the postages, according to their present amount, would be vastly less than they now receive; while, on the other hand, if you give them the postages in addition to the compensation they now get, you will, in the course of a short time, make a much greater amount than the amendment of the committee proposes to give them.

Mr. BADGER. It would be a bad bargain.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It would be a very bad bargain in that point of view; and I therefore think, that unless my friend from Mississippi can modify his amendment in some other way, he had better withdraw it.

Mr. BROOKE. If it should appear at any time that these gentlemen are receiving too much for the service they render, more than is proposed by the amendment of the committee, the power that is reserved by Congress to reduce the rates of postage can always correct the evil. As soon as these parties are in the receipt of more than the sum to which they are justly entitled, Congress can reduce that amount by a corresponding reduction in the rates of postage; and if it should diminish the amount of their receipts, then the evil can be corrected on the other hand by increasing the rates of postage.

Mr. RUSK. That could not very readily be done, because the rates of postage between this country and England are established by treaty, and in order to change them we must change or annul the treaty.

Mr. BROOKE. I think the Senator from Texas is mistaken; the rates of postage are not established by treaty.

Several SENATORS. "Oh, yes, they are."

The question was then taken on the amendment, and resulted—yeas 9, nays 38; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Borland, Brooke, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Jones of Tennessee, Mallory, and Weller—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Badger, Bayard, Berrien, Bradbury, Bright, Brodhead, Cass, Clarke, Dawson, Douglas, Felch, Fish, Geyer, Gwin, Hale, Harlin, Houston, Hunter, James, Jones of Iowa, King, Manum, Mason, Miller, Norris, Pearce, Pratt, Rusk, Sebastian, Seward, Shields, Smith, Stockton, Sumner, Underwood, Upham, Wade, and Whitcomb—38.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BADGER. I now offer the amendment of which I gave notice yesterday. It is a proviso, to come in at the end of the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Provided, That the contract for the transportation of said mails be, and hereby is, transferred from the Navy to the Post Office Department; and the Postmaster General is hereby required to contract with said steam-ship company to carry said mail in their present steamers, at the rates aforesaid, payable out of the Treasury, for the unexpired term of the original contract; reserving, nevertheless, to Congress the right to direct the Postmaster General to put an end to the contract at any time after the first day of December, 1854, upon giving six months' notice thereof to said company.

Mr. BERRIEN. I believe that it is an amendment to an amendment.

The PRESIDENT. It is an amendment to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. BERRIEN. I cannot, therefore, offer to the consideration of the Senate as an amendment, that which is now before me; but I shall request the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BADGER] to accept it as a modification to his amendment, and I shall briefly explain its object. The amendment of the Senator from North Carolina contemplates a modification of the original contract. The United States, by a part of the contract which they entered into with this company, obliged themselves to maintain that contract for the term of ten years, unless, in the intervening time, they should exercise the right which, by the contract, is reserved to them, of taking these vessels at a valuation.

Now, when we are seeking to modify that contract, we are to understand that we are not in the exercise of our original powers as contracting parties; but that we are circumscribed in our action by an actually existing contract. When this subject was first presented to the consideration of the Senate, and engaged my own reflection, I was perfectly satisfied that, from the want of necessary information, we were not competent to determine what amount should be paid to the company, in addition to that provided for in the original contract. I was willing, however, to rely on the action of the Department, or the committee, and to acquiesce in what was recommended by the committee as an advance on the compensation mentioned in the contract. But I was not willing that that advance should of necessity run through the whole ten years of the contract, without any power being reserved on the part of Congress to withhold that grant, if circumstances should subsequently occur to show that it would not be proper to continue it. I therefore acquiesced in the proposal of the Senator from North Carolina, to reserve to Congress the power of terminating the contract at the expiration of the time specified; but after-consideration induced me to believe that we had better modify the amendment in the manner I propose. We have a subsisting contract, and our right to modify is restrained by the principle of good faith which binds us to its performance. We have entered into a stipulation by which we are bound to permit these persons to transport the mails across the Atlantic during a period of ten years; and we have not reserved to ourselves the right of terminating that contract at any time anterior to that period, unless by taking the vessels at a valuation as provided for in the contract. Good faith requires, then, if Congress should exercise the power which this amendment proposes to assume for it, and in that way to modify the original contract, that Congress should not leave on the hands of these individuals, at the end of four years, expensive vessels which they were induced to construct under a contract covering a space of ten years.

That is one consideration. Then, there is another, which appeals to our sense of what the public interest requires. If it shall be, unhappily, deemed necessary to terminate this contest with Great Britain on the ocean by the exercise of the power provided by this amendment, the considerations which were so forcibly alluded to by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. Cass] to-day, inculcate the propriety of carrying out in good faith what the contract enjoins on us—to take these vessels into the service of the United States. We cannot terminate, at the end of four years, a contract which we originally stipulated should last for ten years, and throw the vessels on the hands of the contractors. Government interests themselves require that we should avail ourselves of this stipulation in the contract which enables us to take the vessels at an appraised price. At any time, during the term of ten years, we have the right to take them at an appraised price, if we should terminate the contract before the expiration of that time; and I think the interests of the public will require that these vessels should be taken into the service of the United States. The necessity for such a course was strongly put by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. Cass.] It is certainly unquestionable that these vessels are better calculated for all the purposes of a protective steam marine than any others that could be built on the emergency of the moment.

I ask the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. BADGER,] therefore, to accept this modification of his amendment, and to add at the close the following words:

"And to take the vessels employed in the said line for the exclusive service of the United States on the terms provided in the original contract."

Mr. BADGER. When I drew up the amendment which is now under the consideration of the Senate, I was not aware of the particular terms embraced in the original contract. I had supposed that, according to the terms of that contract, the vessels would belong to the United States at an appraised value whenever the contract was put an end to. But it seems that my understanding of the contract was not correct. I realize the force and justice of our having the right to close this contract, and take these vessels at an appraised value. I cheerfully accept that modification.

Mr. HALE. Before the vote is taken on this amendment, I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, whether, if we continue to pay the $385,000 to this line, together with the amount proposed by the committee, the amount will come out of the receipts from the Post Office Department, or whether it will come out of the general Treasury?

Mr. RUSK. Of course it will come out of the general Treasury.

Mr. HALE. Then, if this amendment should be adopted, I apprehend the amount will be paid out of the Post Office Department. By turning this contract over to the Post Office Department, it would be an entire transfer of the whole arrangement to that Department; and the effect of it, in my judgment, will be—and I would call the attention of the friends of cheap postage to the fact—to put off any further reduction of postage for a considerable time; because it will increase, by the amount of $800,000 a year, the cost of the transportation of the mails; and, whenever the calculation is made, it is known that the people will look with very great reluctance to any direct appropriation for carrying the mails. The aim has been hitherto to keep the expenditures within the receipts. Now, if you adopt this amendment, it appears to me that you will have an increased charge upon the Post Office fund, equal to the whole amount which you have to pay to this line of steamers. It strikes me so, and I would be glad to be better informed if I am wrong. I do not care a cent how it is done, unless it is to have this effect. It strikes me that it will have this effect; and when gentlemen undertake to get up a comparison between the expenses and the receipts of the Post Office Department for the conveyance of the mails, there will be this item of $800,000 charged to the Post Office fund. But that is not all. The great and forcible purpose for which this appropriation is designed, and which has been so eloquently set forth by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. Cass,] makes it desirable chiefly as an addition to the Navy. It is with that view that it commends itself to those patriotic considerations which he has addressed to us.

Mr. RUSK. Will the Senator from New Hampshire permit me to interrupt him for a moment? If he will allow me, perhaps I can save him the trouble of pursuing his remarks.

Mr. HALE. Oh, yes; I shall be very glad to be spared that trouble.

Mr. RUSK. I would ask the Senator from North Carolina to withdraw his amendment for the present. It is now an amendment to an amendment, and I cannot offer what I think would obviate all objection. If the Senator from North Carolina will withdraw his amendment, I think he will coincide with me, and support this proviso:

Provided, That it shall be in the power of Congress, at any time after the first day of January, 1854, to terminate the arrangement for the additional allowance herein provided for.

I think that covers the whole ground. If this can be agreed to, the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina can be adopted as well afterwards as now.

Mr. HALE. If that course can be adopted, and the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina be withdrawn, and take the substantive proposition of the Senator from Texas it would obviate the difficulty in my mind; but as it now stands, it is liable to this objection—that is, that in the public mind it would be considered as a charge upon the Post Office fund, and would operate in such a way as to prevent a further reduction of postage. And as I hope to see the time when the rate of postage will be reduced both by land and by sea, I am not willing to do anything which can throw any obstacle in the way of its further reduction. If the Senator from North Carolina will accept the proposition of the Senator from Texas, it will obviate all difficulty in my mind.

Mr. BADGER. If my friend from Texas will send me that paper, I believe I can modify my amendment so as to please all parties. However, Mr. President, I will withdraw my amendment for the present.

The PRESIDENT. The question then recurs upon the amendment offered by the committee.

Mr. RUSK. I desire to offer the following proviso:

Provided, That it shall be in the power of Congress, at any time after the 31st of December, 1854, to terminate the arrangement for the additional allowance herein provided for, upon giving six months' notice.

Mr. CASS. I would much rather that it should be on the 1st of January, 1854. I have already stated, and I repeat it again, that I consider this as a great experiment, and at present we have no such evidence as satisfies us entirely as to the probable result. I want the matter within the control of Congress, as soon as it is practicable. If the honorable Senator does not move that amendment, I shall move it myself, so as to make it the 1st of January.

The PRESIDENT. The question must be taken on the amendment of the Senator from Texas, and cannot be amended, unless he chooses to modify it.

Mr. CASS. If it should pass, I cannot amend it. Is there any other way that I can accomplish my object?

The PRESIDENT. The Senator can offer his proposition as a separate amendment, if the proposition of the Senator from Texas should fail.

Mr. DAWSON. As I understand the original contract, the number of steamers to be built was five. But according to this bill, it will be reduced to four, and there will be no obligation to build the fifth steamer.

Mr. RUSK. Oh, no; this does not change the contract. It is only an additional allowance for increased service. The original contract requires them to build five steamers, and I am told they are building the fifth. They are bound to build it, and cannot get along without it.

Mr. DAWSON. Then I was mistaken. I was told they were not to build the fifth.

Mr. RUSK. This does not abrogate the original contract at all, it only gives an additional allowance.

Mr. DAWSON. And requires them to build five steamers?

Mr. RUSK. Yes, sir.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am a little startled by the fact just announced by the Senator from Texas. I have been informed heretofore that these ships made their trips in about twenty-two days, including the passages in both directions.

Mr. RUSK. Suppose they break a shaft, or something of that kind?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My calculation is, that in twenty-two days of sailing time, these trips are performed. Unless we have achieved that, we have nothing to boast of, and all the speeches about our triumphs must go for nothing. If we have triumphed in the way which it is said we have, then twenty-two, or at most twenty-four days are quite sufficient to make the round trip. We have four ships already, and all the arguments which have been addressed to us, were based upon the idea that we were not to employ more than four. Now, the Senator from Texas announces that it is necessary to build a fifth, in order to comply with the contract.

Mr. RUSK. Certainly, to comply with the contract, it is necessary to have another ship built.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. To perform the service, I mean. I understood my friend to say, that it was necessary to have another to perform the service.

Mr. RUSK. I say that the building of another will be necessary, for they may break a shaft or meet with some other accident, which will make it necessary to have another boat in readiness to supply the place.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now upon that point—

Mr. RUSK. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to put him right?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, certainly. I want all the information I can get.

Mr. RUSK. I said that, under the contract, they were compelled to build five ships. This amendment does not relieve them from that obligation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is no new information.

Mr. RUSK. The other was information without any investigation at all.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I now understand it. I knew that according to contract they were compelled to build five ships; but I understood my friend to say that five ships were necessary to perform the service.

Mr. RUSK. I meant that it would be, if they should break a shaft, or meet with any serious accident to any one of the present number.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand they make the round trip in from twenty-two to twenty-three days. I should think that to allow a month for each round trip would be quite sufficient.

Mr. MILLER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman forgets that these ships are under the necessity of remaining in the harbor a week or ten days.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is one of my great misfortunes to forget everything, [laughter,] because I have not time allowed me to get it out. I will get it all out if they will allow me time. I am afraid, as has been suggested, that I am striking a tender point. I say, from all the information I have and all that is based on the speeches I have listened to, that one vessel can make one round trip per month; our exultations and boastings have been made upon doing it in twenty days' running time. At the rate of each vessel making a trip per month, two vessels being kept constantly employed for twelve months would give us twenty-four trips per annum; which is within two trips of the number we are about to contract for, and to perform these twenty-six trips the whole number of five ships are necessary, according to the startling announcement of my friend. If a ship can make a trip in the month, the five ships ought to make sixty trips a year—just three times as many trips as we now get, and more than double we propose to contract for. Why so many ships to perform only twenty-six trips?

The gentleman answers, that there is danger of breaking shafts, or destroying wheels, or losing rigging, or getting a plank or a screw loose; and then it requires much time to make repairs, and therefore we must have two or three extra ships, like extra stages, always ready to take the places of those disabled, for the purpose of performing these twenty-six trips. Sir, there never was a greater humbug propagated by persons who are capable of looking into business transactions.

What are these three additional ships to do, when two ships, according to my showing, can perform the service required, unless accident prevents? It seems to me that one extra ship would be quite sufficient for every emergency.

But allow two ships to perform twenty-four trips in the course of a year, would it not be better in case of any accident happening, to permit a little delay of the mails? I think the lovers alluded to by the Senator from New Hampshire should consent to some little interruption in the regular receipt of their billet dour, when so much public economy is at stake. I think, that in the event of a little disorder in the ships, when a little repair is wanting, that we might afford to delay a little while, especially if we employed three ships, and they did not punctually perform the service. I am willing to go for three ships, and I made my estimate the other day upon that basis. If you employ three ships, and give them each $200,000—a sum exceeding the entire cost of keeping one of our national steamers in commission a whole year—you will then have an expense of only $600,000 in all. That would be a saving of $258,000 out of the sum which you are now about to allow. Sir, the facts have never been given to us; you have never had, to this day, the data for a business calculation with regard to the management of these ships. What we are to do with five, how they are to be employed, whether to be serving their owners or lie in port, and do nothing after we have paid for them, I know not. The amendment suggested to limit the operation of this appropriation and the new contract under it to one year, would remove some of the objections which I have had from the beginning to the end of this discussion. Such an amendment would allow us time before another appropriation to get the facts which have never been laid in a proper manner before the Senate. We could probably find out before the year expired, whether there was that skill, diligence, and economy in management which is required. At all events, some amendment should provide that these vessels should not be kept in our employment at an expense of $858,000 per annum, until the expiration of the contract, without reserving the privilege to terminate the new contract at the pleasure of the Government. The contract was made in 1847. It was to run ten years from the time it went into operation; but when the ten years commenced, I do not know.

Mr. SEWARD. There are eight years to run yet.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Very well; eight times eight are sixty-four. There will then be paid upwards of $8,000,000 out of the public Treasury, when you make the new contract, and extend the time through the eight years which the contract has yet to run. And then, according to the suggestion of the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. BADGER,] at the end of that time, we are to "shell out" $3,000,000 more, and take the vessels off their hands.

Mr. BADGER. I hope my friend from Kentucky will allow me to interrupt him before he makes a statement of that kind. I propose no such thing. I have not proposed anything like it. The gentleman says that I propose at the end of eight years to take these ships at their original cost. I said nothing of the kind; but that they were to be taken at any time by the Government, at their appraised value, after the Government no longer thought it politic to conform to the contract.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I stand corrected.

Mr. BADGER. I said that if Congress thought proper to put an end to the contract, they ought to take the ships at their appraised value.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the Chair please to send me the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina?

The PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from North Carolina is withdrawn. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I stand corrected in regard to time. It occurred to me that the gentleman stated 1854.

The PRESIDENT. That is not the amendment pending.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is not the pending amendment I was alluding to. It was the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

The PRESIDENT. But that amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am corrected, then, in point of time; but I understood that, at the end of the time specified, the Government was to take the ships at the price which it cost to build them; and, according to a statement which was made here the other day, the amount was within a fraction of $3,000,000.

Mr. BADGER. It is not to take the ships at any time at the original cost, but at the appraised value, whatever that may be, at the time they are taken.

Mr. SEWARD. If we take them at all. We are not obliged to take them.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I am mistaken in the Government having to pay the amount of the cost of these vessels originally. At the end of that time, instead of paying three millions, the Government will pay two millions, or one million, or ten thousand, or a thousand dollars, just according to the appraisement.

Mr. RUSK. The Senator from Kentucky is confused. If he will allow me, I will set him right.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, yes, I want light; I want to get at the facts.

Mr. RUSK. If the Senator will turn to Senate document No. 50, page 71, he will find a copy of this contract. It provides, among other things, that, for the purpose of carrying the mail between New York and Liverpool twice each month during eight months in the year, and once a month during four months in the year, for the sum of $385,000, these parties were to build five steam-ships, of not less than two thousand tons measurement, and one thousand horse-power each, to be built with the view to great speed, and also for war purposes; and that when these vessels are not employed in the mail service, they shall be subject to the orders of the Government for carrying dispatches. The United States, moreover, are to have the privilege of purchasing said steam-ships, whenever they may be required for public purposes, at a fair valuation. Thus the Government can take them under the contract, by paying whatever a duly-appointed board shall determine them to be worth.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is what I understood from the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. BADGER,] and what I have already acknowledged. I did labor under a misapprehension, arising out of a momentary supposition that these vessels were to be paid for at the building cost. Now, I find that if purchased, it will be at an appraised value. But that does not prevent the expenditure of $8,000,000 in the mean time—$858,000 multiplied by the eight years they have yet to run. It does not prevent the payment of nearly $200,000 to each of the five ships—almost $1,000,000 for the whole. My word for it, the people of this country away from the sea-board will look into the conduct of this Government, paying extravagant sums of money for purposes of this sort, supported by such speeches as that of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SEWARD,] who makes a patriotic and touching appeal to the pride of every American citizen, and causes our bosoms to swell with feelings of exultation at our triumph; or, like those of my friend, the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CASS,] descriptive of the race for superiority between this country and Great Britain, and the probable defeat of our ancient rival; our snatching the trident of Neptune from her grasp, and gloriously conquering in all battles both by land and sea; as if all these things depended on the success of the Collins line of steamships! We do not gain battles from considerations of that sort. We are the most military people on the face of the earth, I believe, and will continue to be so, while our institutions continue what they are, and while we continue as free as we are now. Our success in war proceeds from the freedom of our people, and the identification of the soldier and sailor with the citizen; from the knowledge of the fact, that every hero secures promotion to civil offices in the Executive Departments, or in the legislative assemblies of the States, or Halls of Congress, if he choose, by appealing to the admiration and sympathies of the people.

But I shall make a speech, Mr. President, if I proceed with the consideration of matters of that sort; and that would be entirely foreign to my purpose. My desire was merely to state my objections, growing out of the statement of the Senator from Texas, that these five ships would be necessary for the performance of the mail service. I do not believe that more than three are required, if the line is managed with skill and prudence.

Mr. BADGER. I am going to address you for a moment, Mr. President, on an untried field—that of arithmetic, in which I never boasted any great skill. My friend from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] who has a great deal of skill in that line, has said, that if for eight years we pay yearly this sum of $858,000, it will, in that time, amount to $8,000,000. Now, if it does amount to that sum, it certainly does not do so by the rules of arithmetic given us by Dilworth, in which I was wont to be instructed in my younger days, somewhat deeper than I liked. If the gentleman makes this sum, in eight years, to amount to $8,000,000, he must work it, not by the rules of arithmetic, but by the "square root." [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWSON. For the purpose of understanding the difference between the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] and myself, I voted against his amendment this morning. He said I did so under a mistaken apprehension of the fact. I thought not; and I have found now that I was correct. I will read a part of the contract originally entered into between the Government and the proprietors of the Collins line of steamers:

"That, whereas the said Collins and his associates submitted to the Postmaster General, on the sixth of March, Anno Domini eighteen hundred and forty-six, proposals to carry the United States mail between New York and Liverpool twice each month during eight months of the year, and once a month during the other four months, for the sum of $385,000 per annum, payable quarter-yearly, and for this purpose proposed to build five steamships of not less than two thousand tons measurement, and of one thousand horse power each, to be built for great speed, and sufficiently strong for war purposes—four of them to be ready for service in eighteen months from the day of the date of these presents, the fifth to be built as early as possibly practicable, and, when not employed in the mail service, to be subject to the orders of the Government for carrying dispatches, for which service a fair compensation to be paid; the United States, moreover, to have the privilege of purchasing said steamships, whenever required for public purposes, at a fair valuation, to be ascertained by appraisers mutually selected by the United States, and by the owners."

Now, the object is this: Five ships are to be built according to the contract. We are increasing the number of trips to be performed, and giving greater facilities for mail transportation; and, according to the speech of the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CASS,] we are also to continue these vessels for the purpose of increasing our naval strength, while we are giving additional facilities to our post office arrangements. If this contract be carried out, the only thing we are doing is doubling the service, and paying an additional sum for doubling the trips. If the Senator had not been misinformed in relation to the number of vessels, there would still have been no difference between us. But the amendment of my friend from North Carolina, confining it to four ships, being withdrawn, it throws the parties back on the original contract. So that, if we confine it down to the five steamships, the mail service will be increased, the naval service will be increased, and the objection of the Senator from Tennessee will be gone, and he and myself are entirely together on this question. The only error grew out of the fact that there was supposed to be four instead of five. We are doubling the compensation for these ships, and increasing the number of trips, and adding strength to our Navy.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I rise to make my acknowledgments to the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. BADGER.] I admit that, usually, he exhibits no great skill in arithmetic—that is proved by the votes he gives here. I admit, further, that I stand corrected, for once, by him, and that, calculating in my head, while speaking, I was in error in supposing that eight hundred and fifty-eight thousand, multiplied by eight, made eight millions. I did not make the calculation with any degree of care, but I have made it coolly and deliberately since the Senator called my attention to the subject, and find that the total amount is $6,864,000. But as millions amount to nothing; as they are mere trifles here, I hope my friend will excuse me for making a little blunder of only a million.

Mr. BADGER. My friend from Kentucky, who stands corrected by so poor an arithmetician as myself, will henceforward, I hope, learn the danger of calculating, as he did on this occasion—in his head.

I did not rise to make that remark, however. I am compelled to leave the Senate now, and hope I shall be excused for making the usual motion, that "when this Senate adjourns, it will be to meet on Monday next."

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I hope the Senator will permit me to make my acknowledgments to the Senator from Georgia first.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I hope that motion will not prevail.

Mr. BADGER. It cannot be argued.

Mr. HALE. Yes, it can.

The motion to adjourn over until Monday next was then agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Mr. President, I desire to make my acknowledgments to my friend from Georgia for his explanation. But I think he is somewhat in error. I stated, in conversation with him, that I apprehended it was not contemplated to build another vessel. I arrived at that opinion, not only from the arguments which had been made by the friends of this proposition here, but from the universal understanding that the four vessels now employed were more than competent to perform all the contemplated service. I could not imagine that there could be any necessity or importance, or that this Government would even require that these individuals should go on and build another vessel, when it was manifest, from the arguments of the friends of the proposition, that four vessels were more than competent to perform the service. But then, to show that I was correct in my opinion, I might refer to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, which was specific, and confined it to the four vessels themselves. This convinced me that I was right; and I so stated the matter to my friend from Georgia. If that amendment had been adopted, it would have carried out the express declaration of every friend of the measure on this floor.

While we are correcting each other, I beg to correct my friend from Georgia. He is laboring under a very egregious misapprehension if he supposes that this amendment contemplates increasing the service to the extent which he has stated. It does not double the service by any means. It only increases it six trips per year. If he thinks that six trips added to twenty, double twenty, then his arithmetic is much worse than that of the gentleman from Kentucky; and I beg that both of them should be put to learning arithmetic, if they cannot estimate things better. [Laughter.] It is only proposed to add six trips per annum to twenty. Double twenty trips would make forty. Now, twenty-six trips cannot be made out to be forty! If my friend from Georgia voted for this proposition under the apprehension that forty trips were to be performed instead of twenty-six, I hope he will move a reconsideration, and stand with me on that vote.

Mr. DAWSON. I am laboring under no mistake. I did not say, or I did not intend to say, that it was doubling the service. I only said it was increasing the service to twenty-six trips. If you call a voyage out and in one trip, then it is twenty-six trips; but if a voyage from New York to Liverpool, and again from Liverpool to New York, are to be counted as two trips, then they are to make fifty-two trips. But I intended to speak, and did only speak, of the increase of the number of trips to twenty-six. If the gentleman from Tennessee does not know the rules of arithmetic, I think it would be better for him to correct his lecture, and not to refer me back to Dilworth. I was not at all mistaken. I said that there was to be an increased service. It is certainly an increase; even if we add only two or three trips. I said that there ought to be increased compensation for the increased service.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. MALLORY. Is it in order to move to amend that amendment?

The PRESIDENT. It is not; because the amendment of the Senator from Texas is an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If we adopt that amendment, will it be in order for us to strike out "1854," and insert a shorter time?

The PRESIDENT. It will not be in order to strike out that portion of the amendment at this stage of the proceedings. But when the bill shall be reported to the Senate it will be in order to make any alteration in the amendments agreed to in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That will do.

Mr. MALLORY. I would suggest to the honorable Senator from Texas whether it be not now expedient to incorporate into his amendment the first part of the amendment, which was withdrawn by the Senator from North Carolina, that is to say, the following:

"That the contract for the transportation of the said mail be, and the same hereby is, transferred from the Navy to the Post Office Department."

Mr. RUSK. I think it is useless to insert that. It will cause a great deal of confusion. I can explain why in a moment. There is a peculiar law on the subject of appropriations for the Post Office Department. The proceeds of postages are paid directly into the Treasury by law. We have to make an appropriation out of the Treasury for the support of these steamers. But to support the Post Office Department proper, we are confined to the earnings of the Post Office. This, then, would be throwing these ocean mail steamers upon the inland postage, and produce confusion. I think the law in relation to them is a very confused thing; but there can be no good result from the amendment suggested by the Senator from Florida. It will produce more confusion, I think.

There is another difficulty about it. Everybody knows that this money is paid from the Treasury. Everybody knows where it comes from. It comes from the Treasury. So that neither the Navy Department nor the Post Office Department is charged with it. It is proper that neither should be charged with it as being on their own account.

Mr. MALLORY. I would suggest to the honorable Senator from Texas, that the very object I had in suggesting the proposition was to avoid confusion of ideas on this subject. I noticed a few moments ago that the honorable Senator from New Hampshire seemed exceedingly anxious to keep this expenditure of $800,000 where it stands now, namely: to the debit of the Navy. He evinced a strong desire to appropriate $800,000, therefore, for this purpose, and debit it to the Navy, which yesterday he seemed willing to withdraw to our own ports from foreign stations. Unless we adopt some such proposition as I suggest, this expenditure will go into the naval appropriation bill year after year, and the entire Navy appropriations of the country will stand charged with these $800,000. It is legislation of this kind which swells up the annual expenditures of the Navy proper, by adding these expenditures from which the Navy has never derived a single dollar of interest. During the existence of these ships the Navy has not derived the first benefit from them. I have suggested to the honorable Senator from Texas to place this appropriation where it properly belongs. If it be necessary to legislate specially that the receipts from postal regulations should go to the credit of the Post Office Department, let also the debit go there. That seems to be the most reasonable legislation. But, at all events, on no principle should the Navy continue to be charged with a debit of $800,000 a year, when, in fact, it derives no advantage from it.

Mr. RUSK. I cannot consent to change my amendment in the form suggested, because the Post Office pays into the Treasury all the money that it draws from the earnings of the mails. What does the Navy pay? Not a dollar.

Mr. HALE. Not one.

Mr. RUSK. The Navy is a charge, from the beginning to the end, on the Treasury. Does not everybody know the amount that is paid for this purpose? Is it not put down in the appropriation bills? Is there the slightest confusion of ideas in regard to it? Does not every one know how much money is paid for mail-steamers? It shows a great want of confidence in the people to suppose that, if such an argument were made use of before them, they could, for a moment, be brought to believe that the Navy proper was chargeable with the amount of money which we pay out for the Government mail-steamers. I do not think my constituents would so understand it.

Mr. HUNTER. I think there is a good deal in the suggestion of the Senator from Florida. This is a matter of complaint, not only in our service, but in the English service. If the Senator from Texas will look into the matter, he will find that Lord Auckland, when he was examined, in 1848, on this subject, said that he thought it did lead to a great deal of mischief to the Navy; that it was charged with £700,000 a year for sustaining steam-packet mail service, while the receipts from the packets went to the credit of the Post Office establishment. So it is here. The receipts from the mail-steamers, in the shape of postages, go to the credit of the Post Office establishment. Money is appropriated to the Post Office establishment just as it is to the Navy. You appropriate what is required for it. We have been appropriating more than is received for the Post Office, and I apprehend we shall continue to do so. It is but fair that you should know how much more we are appropriating than we receive. Therefore, as the Post Office receives the postages arising from the mail-steamers, so it ought to be charged with the expenses.

The PRESIDENT. That proposition is not now before the Senate.

The amendment of Mr. Rusk was agreed to.

On motion, the Senate adjourned until Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 7, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

On motion by Mr. WALLACE, by unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw from the files of the House, for the purpose of reference in the Senate, the petition of Whitmarsh B. Seabrook, praying that a law may be passed to pay the Edisto Island Company for services rendered to the United States, in the State of South Carolina, during the war of 1812.

Mr. GROW asked and obtained unanimous consent to introduce a memorial from George Catlin, now in London, in reference to the purchase, by Congress, of his Indian collection; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

THE PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I am instructed, by the unanimous vote of the Committee on Printing, to present a report to the House from that committee, accompanied by a resolution, which I ask to have read.

The Clerk then read the report and resolution, as follows:

The Joint Committee on Printing, who were instructed by the House of Representatives "to report what, if any, arrangement had been made to execute the public printing, and if any other than the public printer has been employed, to report what prices they have agreed to pay;" and who were also "instructed to let out such printing as the present contractor could not execute to the lowest bidder, after ten days' notice," respectfully report:

That under the resolution of the two Houses of Congress, adopted August 3, 1846, the proper officers of the Senate and House of Representatives let out the public printing to the lowest bidder, agreeably to the terms of the said resolution. That A. Boyd Hamilton, being the lowest bidder for each of the several classes of the public printing designated by the law, received the contract, and entered into bonds for its faithful execution on the 3d of March, 1851. The prices at which said Hamilton undertook to do the work are ruinously low, and in the opinion of experienced practical printers are scarcely more than sufficient to pay for the paper upon which the printing is required to be done by the terms of the contract. The officers authorized by the said joint resolution to let out the work and make the contract, in their report to the House of the 3d of March, 1851, estimate the aggregate amount of the contractor's bid at the sum of $87,631, supposing no greater amount of printing will be ordered by the present Congress than was executed under the order of the previous one. It is conceded by all that the next lowest responsible bidder who offered for the printing, and was willing to take it at his bid, was John T. Towers, an experienced practical printer of the city of Washington. The difference between the sum which the contractor, Hamilton, will receive by his contract and the bid of John T. Towers, for the same amount of printing, is $30,689, or a difference of nearly one hundred per cent. in the two bids. If compared with the bid of John C. Rives, another competitor for the same printing, the disparity between the sum agreed upon by the contractor and that for which Mr. Rives was willing to execute the work is much greater, being the sum of $108,741, or more than one hundred and twenty-five per cent. Both Towers and Rives are practical men, engaged extensively in the business of printing, and no doubt offered to do the work at what they deemed fair and reasonable prices.

As might have been expected under these circumstances, the contractor, Mr. Hamilton, has been unable at any time during the present session of Congress to execute the printing of the two Houses agreeably to the terms of his contract, in no single instance, to the knowledge of the committee, has he fully complied with the requisitions of his bond. Neither the bills, reports, calendars, Executive documents, nor any other specimen of work he has executed, is printed upon such paper, or done in such a style, as his written obligation requires of him. That description of the public printing intended for preservation, as part of the legislative records of the nation, is done upon paper greatly inferior to the standard of the contract, and in such an unskillful manner as to be absolutely disgraceful to Congress. The paper is not only below the standard in weight, but is of coarser texture and of smaller size than provided for by his contract. When bound and trimmed, the margin is necessarily so small as to disfigure the work; and if plates of the usual octavo size are used, they are clipped and seriously injured. The general appearance of the work, arising from the inferior quality of the material, and the unskillful manner of its execution, is shamefully bad, and believed to be worse than that done for any State Legislature in the Union.

It is not only in regard to the inferior quality of the material, and the defective execution of the work, that the committee find the contractor in default, but in point of time in the completion of the work intrusted to his hands, he has been and is now unreasonably behind. The President's message, which might have been completed in three weeks by an energetic and capable contractor, is not now, after a lapse of five months, one half done. There is not the slightest prospect, judging from the conduct of the public printer so far, that this document will be fully completed and ready for delivery to the members until after the adjournment of the present session of Congress. The two Houses will thus be deprived for a whole session of the most important and useful document for legislative purposes, which will be ordered by them, and the expense of its publication only so much money wasted. Other important documents, necessary for the use of the various committees, have been delayed in the same unreasonable manner.

Four months ago the contractor was called before the committee, and notified in regard to the inferior execution of the printing, as well as of the delay in furnishing it to Congress. He promised amendment in these respects; but, in utter disregard of his promises, as well as of the obligation of his contract, he has not shown the slightest disposition to furnish better material or better work, or to execute the public printing with more dispatch. The documents, such as have been furnished, are printed upon the same coarse and inferior paper, in the same unskillful and, in some instances, illegible manner, and with like want of alacrity.

Your committee were required by the provisions of the joint resolution directing the manner of procuring the printing of the two Houses of Congress, in the contingency presented to them by the gross default of the contractor, "to adopt such means to remedy his neglect and delay" in the execution of the work ordered by Congress as they might deem necessary. It was apparent to every member of the committee, not only from the state of the public printing, but the admissions of the contractor himself, that he could not comply with his undertaking, so as to insure to Congress work done upon the proper material, and as rapidly as the terms of his undertaking required. There was then left to the committee no other alternative than to permit Congress to submit to the imposition of inferior work and unreasonable delay, or exercise the power conferred upon them by law. They chose to perform what seemed to them to be their obvious duty, and entered into contracts with Donelson & Armstrong to execute so much of the public printing as had been or might be ordered by the House, and which the public contractor could not, or would not, do; and with Gideon & Co. to do that ordered by the Senate. Each of these firms has entered into bond in the penalty of $20,000, with good security, for the faithful performance of the work. The prices agreed to be paid to these firms, for the work they may execute under their respective contracts, are hereto appended, and made part of this report. They do not differ materially from the bid of John T. Towers, and are believed by the committee to be such as will afford the contractors no more than a moderate profit.

The arrangement made by the committee with these firms was intended only as a temporary measure to secure the prompt and speedy execution of the public printing, and extends no further than the execution of so much of the work as the contractor could not do. In all cases, if the contractor could execute the work in proper time, and in the manner required by his contract, he would be allowed to execute it. The gentlemen were selected because they were men of character, abundantly prepared promptly and faithfully to discharge their duty under their contracts.

The public printer has filed with the committee a memorial, stating various grounds of excuse for not being able to execute the public work in the manner provided for in his contract, and asking at the hands of the committee such relief as in their judgment may be just and equitable. We refer to this memorial merely because of its admission that the contractor has not been able to meet the obligations of his contract, and to indicate to the House his reliance upon Congress for ultimate relief.

The resolution of the House instructs the joint committee "to let out such printing as the present contractor cannot execute to the lowest bidder, after ten days' notice." The joint committee is created under the joint resolution of the two Houses of Congress, approved August 3d, 1846, and is composed of three members from each House. To this committee, thus created under a law of Congress, certain duties are assigned in regard to the public printing, which cannot be controlled by either House, acting separately. If the House may instruct the committee, so also may the Senate. In the event of conflicting instructions from these bodies, the organization of the committee is such, being composed of equal numbers from each House, that neither set of instructions could be effective. When these instructions contravene the law itself, and require the committee to disregard the obvious duties imposed upon them by that law, surely no one will maintain that they ought to be obeyed.

While your committee have no disposition to disregard the known will of either House, in all matters not involving a violation of law, they cannot, consistently with their obligations under the law, obey instructions not authorized by, but in their opinion against the law.

The second section of the joint resolution referred to is as follows:

"Sec. 2. And be it further resolved, That a committee, consisting of three members of the Senate and three members of the House of Representatives, shall be chosen by their respective Houses, which shall constitute a Committee on Printing, which shall have power to adopt such measures as may be deemed necessary to remedy any neglect or delay on the part of the contractor to execute the work ordered by Congress, and to make a pro rata reduction in the compensation allowed, or to refuse the work altogether, should it be inferior to the standard; and in all cases the contractor and his securities shall be responsible for any increased expenditure consequent upon the non-performance of the contract. The committee shall audit and pass upon all accounts for printing; but no bill shall be acted upon for work that is not actually executed and delivered, and which they may require to be properly authenticated."

Under this provision of the law, the committee have adopted the means they deemed necessary "to remedy the neglect and delay on the part of the contractor to execute the work ordered by Congress." They have entered into contracts which the law authorized, and taken bonds in heavy penalties for their faithful performance. For all damages which may result to the Government from the "neglect or delay" of the contractor, or "increased expenditure consequent upon the non-performance of the contract," a remedy is reserved by the law against the contractor and his securities. The House, by its instructions, require the committee to annul these contracts so authorized by the law, and after ten days' notice give the work to the lowest bidder. If the House, without the concurrence of the Senate, may control the action of the committee in this respect, it may in all others, and to the defeat of the whole purpose of the law, and thus the singular spectacle would be presented of one House, which has no legislative power independent of the other, exercising power which belongs only to the two Houses and the President together. If the House, by its separate action, may control the Joint Committee on Printing, why may it not regulate the conduct and annul the contracts of the members of Congress who are Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, or of any other officers whose duties are prescribed by an act of the two Houses of Congress?

The committee feel confident that they have in their action pursued literally the terms of the law, and believe they have no power to carry out the requirements of the resolution of the House, and abrogate the contracts made with Donelson & Armstrong and Gideon & Co.; and, however much they are disposed to respect the wishes of the House, they cannot execute them under the law without the assent of the contractors and the concurrence of the Senate.

In respect to the report of the members of the committee of the House, proposing to publish fifty thousand copies of the mechanical part of the Patent Office report, the members of the Senate belonging to the committee conceive that they have no jurisdiction over the subject. The law expressly requires that all motions to print extra copies of any document shall be referred to the members of the committee belonging to the House in which such motions are made; and these members having exclusive control of the subject, the members from the Senate decline to express any opinion in regard thereto. The members of the Committee of the House do not deem the number of the Patent Office Report proposed to be published unreasonable, or the price greater than the work will cost. The members of the House belonging to the committee submit the following resolution, and ask its adoption:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing, under the joint resolution of the third of August, 1846, "have power to adopt such measures as may be deemed necessary to remedy any neglect or delay on the part of the contractor to execute the work ordered by Congress, and to make a pro rata deduction in the compensation allowed, or refuse the work altogether, should it be inferior to the standard; and in all cases may hold the contractor and his securities responsible for any increased expenditure consequent upon the non-performance of his contract."

A true copy—attest: GEO. E. ABBOTT,
Clerk to Committee.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I have no desire to discuss this question, and I presume the House has none.
Mr. CLINGMAN. I have a desire to discuss it, and I announce that to the gentleman now, and I hope he will allow me to say something. I do not want the gentleman to move the previous question.

Mr. STANTON. I had intended to do so, unless the House should manifest a desire to discuss it.
Mr. FITCH. I also desire to discuss it.
Mr. STANLY. Will my friend [Mr. STANTON] hear a suggestion? I suggest that the consideration of this matter be postponed until Monday, a day which we generally waste, and in the mean time this report can be printed in the Globe, and every member can have an opportunity to see it.

Mr. POLK. Will not the gentleman make a motion to have the report and resolution printed, and their consideration postponed till Wednesday next?
Mr. STANLY. I would rather say Monday next, as that is a day we usually give to miscellaneous matters, and we generally throw it away. However, I do not care what time is fixed upon. I only make the suggestion.
Mr. STANTON. I simply desire to make the remark, that the resolution we have presented is in the language of the law—it is literally the law itself; and the Joint Committee on Printing desire to know of the House, whether they are bound to obey the law as it stands upon the statute-book, or to obey the instructions of the House? If required to obey the instructions of the House, against the law, we cannot do it, and our duties are at an end; and so far as I am individually concerned, I shall be compelled to wash my hands of it, and so also will the rest of the committee.

In reference to the postponement of this matter, I desire to say that I think it extremely doubtful whether the report can be printed at as early a period as Monday. I think it impossible to have it printed by that time. If the consideration of it is postponed until Wednesday next, or some other day thereafter, it can be printed.
Mr. POLK. If the gentleman will allow me, I will move that the report be printed, and that the consideration of it be postponed until Wednesday next; and on that motion, I call for the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I hope the gentleman will include in the motion to print, the memorial of the public printer.
Mr. POLK. I will include anything suggested. I wish light and nothing else.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I beg leave to remind my friend from Tennessee, [Mr. Polk.] that if he moves the previous question, it will cut off his motion to postpone. I presume that is not his object.

The SPEAKER. If the call for the previous question is sustained, it will bring the House to a vote directly upon the resolution.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the call for the previous question. I want to say something upon it. If the House, by general consent, will let it go over, will the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Polk.] give me the floor?

Mr. POLK. I hope the House will go to the consideration of private bills. I understand the report can be printed by Wednesday, but it cannot by Monday. I am willing to let it go over informally, if the discussion is to be stopped by my motion. I will withdraw my call for the previous question, if the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] does not intend to make a speech now.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I merely wish this question to be placed in a position where I can say something upon it; but I do not care to do it today. If the House will consent, and the gentleman will let me have the floor, I will make a proposition to let the matter go over.

Mr. POLK. If the gentleman will wait until Wednesday, he will have a full opportunity to give the House his views on the subject.

Mr. CLINGMAN. What motion does the gentleman from Tennessee make?

The SPEAKER. He moves to postpone the consideration of the report until Wednesday next, and that it be printed; and upon that he calls the previous question, which will cut off the motion to postpone.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Do you withdraw the call for the previous question?

Mr. POLK. I do. I prefer having the report go over informally until Wednesday.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I am willing that it should go over until Wednesday next.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to suggest to my colleague, [Mr. Polk.] that he make the simple motion to postpone the consideration of this report till Wednesday next, and it will be printed in the Globe as part of the proceedings of this House. A motion to postpone to a day certain is not debatable.

Mr. POLK. I make that motion.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is the motion to postpone the consideration of the report from the Committee on Printing until Wednesday, now before the House?

The SPEAKER. That is the only motion before the House?

Mr. HOUSTON. I would suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee to insert, instead of the word "Wednesday," the word "Tuesday." I know that he sympathizes with me and the rest of the House in the desire to have promptly acted upon the business pressing for our consideration. I would like to have this subject postponed until Monday, that we may have the report printed, reflected upon, and then decided upon finally. My object is not to have it postponed improperly, or to smother investigation, but that it may be as soon as possible, deliberately acted upon. We are having, day after day, matters taken up in preference to the business which urgently demands the attention of the House. I hope the postponement will be until Monday.

Mr. POLK. I am gratified at the suggestion of my friend from Alabama, that the House ought to examine this question properly. I must insist upon my original motion. I believe it is not debatable.

Mr. FLORENCE. I have no objection to the postponement of this report until Wednesday next, but I wish to correct an erroneous impression which prevails upon the floor to a great extent.

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]
The SPEAKER. The gentleman is called to order, and it is the duty of the Chair to enforce order.

Mr. FLORENCE. I move to strike out "Wednesday," and to insert in its stead "Monday." That is debatable, as I understand. I can state the reasons that operate upon me in moving it.

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable.

Mr. FLORENCE. Gentlemen have been speaking upon this and the other side of the House this morning on this subject, and all that I now desire, is to correct an erroneous impression entertained by some members of the House that this report could not be printed by Monday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair indulged gentlemen upon all sides so long as no objection was interposed. When, however, the gentleman addressed the Chair proposing to debate the question, he was called to order from all sides of the Hall. It is the duty of the Chair to preserve order.

Mr. FLORENCE. Then I ask the unanimous consent of the House to submit a statement.

[Cries of "No!" "No!" "Hear him!"]

Mr. FLORENCE. I desire to submit a few reasons why the question should not be postponed.

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is again called to order. Debate is not in order.

Mr. POLK. I move that the gentleman from Pennsylvania be allowed to print his speech.

[Laughter, and cries of "Agreed!" "Agreed!"]

Mr. CARTER. I wish to make an inquiry of the Chair as to whether the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Polk] moves the printing of the report, and the various propositions with regard to the public printing?

The SPEAKER. There is but one proposition before the House, and that is to postpone the consideration of the report until Wednesday next, unless the gentleman from Pennsylvania insists upon his amendment.

Mr. FLORENCE. I do not.

Mr. GORMAN. I call for the previous question.

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi. If the call for the previous question be sustained, in what condition will it place the report?

The SPEAKER. The seconding of the call for the previous question will bring the House to a direct vote upon the resolution of the committee.

Mr. BROWN. Precluding all amendments?

The SPEAKER. It would be to exclude all amendments and all debate.

Mr. GORMAN. I hope neither the Chair nor the gentleman from Mississippi will make a speech upon the subject, unless I am heard.

Mr. BROWN. I trust that the call for the previous question will not be sustained.

The SPEAKER. The Chair calls gentlemen on all sides to order, and will endeavor to keep himself in order.

The question was then taken upon the demand for the previous question, and it was not seconded, there being upon a division—ayes 45, noes 98.

Mr. BROWN. What is the motion now before the House?

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Polk] to postpone the resolution reported by the Committee on Printing, until Wednesday next.

Mr. BROWN. I ask the mover of that motion to give me an opportunity to simply give notice of my intention to offer the amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read, to the resolution of the committee, and to ask that it shall be printed.

Mr. POLK. I object.

Mr. BROWN. Does the gentleman object to the reading of the amendment?

Mr. POLK. I ought to be no more generous to the gentleman than he has been to the committee; but I do not object to the reading of the amendment.

The amendment was then read by the Clerk, as follows:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives has the right to direct the Committee on Printing as to the manner in which they shall discharge their duty in procuring the execution of the public printing, and that it is the duty of said committee to procure the printing to be done in the manner pointed out by the House of Representatives.

Mr. STANLY. I hope the gentleman will amend his proposed amendment, so that it will read, "and any law to the contrary notwithstanding."

Mr. BROWN. I will do no such thing. I am able to show that that resolution is right when I have the opportunity.

The SPEAKER. Discussion is not now in order.

The question was then taken upon the motion to postpone the resolution reported by the committee until Wednesday next, and it was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The first business now in order is the consideration of a private bill, which was reported from a Committee of the Whole on Friday last.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to allow me to report back from the Committee on Naval Affairs, the Senate bill "for the relief of the widows and relations of certain officers and seamen of the United States brig Washington, lost overboard in a hurricane."

Mr. McMULLIN. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the special order.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of Connecticut. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. STANTON. I hope unanimous consent will be granted for the purpose I have named.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Virginia insists upon his motion, that the House go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, it amounts to an objection to the gentleman's request.

Mr. McMULLIN. With great respect for the gentleman, I do insist upon the motion I have submitted. I desire that the homestead bill may be disposed of as soon as may be.

Mr. STANTON. I wish merely to refer the bill I desire to report to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. McMULLIN. I will withdraw, if the gentleman will renew my motion after he has accomplished his object.

Mr. STANTON. I will.

Mr. DANIEL. I object to the gentleman presenting a report.

Mr. SACKETT. There are on the Speaker's table, I understand, bills of a private character undisposed of, which have been reported, with a recommendation that they do pass, from a Committee of the Whole. I trust the motion to go into committee will not be pressed until they shall have been acted upon. They are private bills, and this is private bill day.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order, if we remain in the House, the Chair again states, is certain private bills which were reported from a Committee of the Whole House upon Friday last.

There being a special order in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, it is in order to submit a motion that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into committee for the consideration of that special order. That motion has been made. There has also been submitted another, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The question was put on the motion that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and it was not agreed to—ayes 65, noes 80.

Mr. CABELL, of Florida. Is not this objection day in the Committee of the Whole House?

The SPEAKER. It is.

The question was then taken on the motion that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar; and it was agreed to—ayes 101, noes not counted.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, (Mr. STUART in the chair.)

JOSIAH D. PILCHER.

The committee proceeded to the consideration of House bill No. 157, for the relief of Josiah P. Pilcher, late a private in Company F, 2d regiment Kentucky volunteers.

The bill provides for the payment to Josiah P.

Pilcher, of his monthly pay from the 7th of July, 1846, to the discharge of the company in which he was enrolled, together with his clothing, pay, mileage from New Orleans, three months' extra pay, and a land warrant for one hundred and sixty acres.

The report shows, from the evidence submitted, that Pilcher was received by Colonel McKee at Camp Jackson, six miles below New Orleans, as a recruit, on the 7th of July, 1846, to serve the residue of the twelve months from the date of the mustering of said regiment; that his name was not put upon the rolls of said company; but it is distinctly stated by all the officers of his company, that he served in the ranks as a soldier faithfully, except while he was on furlough to do service in the Quartermaster's Department; that the death of Colonel McKee was the cause of his name not appearing on the final mustering-out rolls of said company; and, although he served faithfully during the full term, yet he was refused his pay and allowances, owing to these circumstances.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ANTHONY G. WILLIS.

The committee next proceeded to the consideration of House bill No. 159, for the relief of the heirs-at-law of Anthony G. Willis, deceased.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the heirs of Anthony G. Willis, deceased, the sum of $251, as remuneration for the services of a wagon and team of their said ancestors, which was pressed into the service of the United States during the war of 1812.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

DR. S. R. ADDISON.

The committee next proceeded to the consideration of House bill 162, for the relief of Dr. S. R. Addison, passed assistant surgeon in the United States Navy.

The bill provides for the payment to Dr. S. R. Addison the difference of pay between that of passed assistant surgeon and surgeon, from the 4th of April, 1848, to the 21st of June, 1850.

The report shows that, on the 4th of April, 1848, by order of the Secretary of the Navy, Passed Assistant Surgeon Addison was required to perform the duties of surgeon on board the United States sloop-of-war St. Mary's; which he did perform to 21st of June, 1850.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside, to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

JACOB J. STORER.

The committee next took up for consideration House bill 163, for the relief of Jacob J. Storer.

The bill provides for the payment to Jacob J. Storer, of $1,361 82, a sum based upon a certificate of the Fourth Auditor, that that is the amount he would have been entitled to in pay and rations, had he been paid as a purser of the United States Navy.

The report of the committee shows that J. J. Storer, in August, 1847, received from Commodore Storer, who was ordered to the command of the squadron on the coast of Brazil, the appointment of secretary; in that capacity he served until May 21, 1848, when he was ordered by said Commodore Storer to the United States brig Perry, as acting purser, the purser of the Perry having been transferred to the flag ship, to replace the purser of that ship, who had been ordered home on "sick ticket."

Commodore Storer also appointed another person as his secretary, who received the pay and emoluments of that office until December 1, 1848, when another purser having been sent out by the Secretary of the Navy to take the place of J. J. Storer, he returned to the flag ship as secretary. While on board the Perry, he had drawn purser's pay, his right to it not having been questioned at the time. Subsequently, on May 7, 1849, Commodore Storer, at the request of the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury, caused to be checked against J. J. Storer's pay as secretary, the amount he drew as acting purser. Thus, from that time until the termination of the cruise, in December, 1850, J. J. Storer received no pay whatever, although constantly performing duties.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HENRY MILLER.

The committee next took up for consideration, House bill No. 178, for the relief of Henry Miller, a soldier of the war of 1812.

The bill provides that the proper accounting officer pay to Lieutenant Colonel Henry Miller, pension from March 18, 1818, to the 5th of April, 1824, at the rate of $8 a month.

It was ordered to be laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM LYNCH.

The committee then proceeded to consider House bill No. 179, for the relief of William Lynch, a soldier of the late war with Great Britain.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to place said Lynch on the roll of invalid pensioners, at the rate of $8 per month, commencing from the 8th day of July, 1848, and to continue during the term of his natural life.

The report was read, from which it appeared that the petitioner enlisted on the 1st of September, 1813, as a private soldier in the company commanded by Captain King, and that on the 15th of August, 1814, he was wounded, by the explosion of the magazine at Fort Erie, in the head and knee, and also received an injury in the abdomen, which resulted in hernia. In consequence of these wounds he was sent to the hospital at Eleven Mile Creek, in the State of New York, where he remained until the spring of 1815, when he joined his regiment, and served until the expiration of his service, on 1st of September, 1818.

The bill was then laid aside, to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

CHARLES STAPLES.

The committee then took up for consideration, House bill No. 182, for the relief of Charles Staples.

The bill authorizes the said Staples to be placed on the roll of invalid pensions, at the rate of $6 per month, from the 1st of January, 1848.

The report was read, from which it appeared that the petitioner enlisted as a sergeant, on the 10th of December, 1812, into the company commanded by Captain Oliver Hessick, belonging to the regiment of Colonel McCobb, in the service of the United States, in the last war with Great Britain. It appears that, from severe exposure, he became sick, and unable to perform his duty, and has, up to this time, been affected with a hard cough and lameness, which has rendered him extremely feeble.

The bill was then laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

AARON STAFFORD.

The committee then proceeded to consider House bill No. 183, for the relief of Aaron Stafford.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the roll of invalid pensioners the name of the petitioner, for the sum of $17 a month, from and after the 4th day of March, 1848, to continue during his natural life, after deducting such sums as the petitioner may have received since that period.

The report was read, from which it appears that the petitioner held a commission as adjutant on the 13th of October, 1812, in the sixteenth detached regiment of the militia of the State of New York, in the service of the United States, during the last war with Great Britain, and that he, on the 13th of October, 1812, accompanied by two hundred men, crossed over from Lewiston to Queenstown, and was engaged in the storming of Queenstown Heights, and in the battle that day. In this battle he received a wound above the right temple, from a musket ball, another from a bullet through his thigh, just below the groin, a third from a rifle ball in the left shoulder, just below the joint, and a fourth from a grape shot, which struck him in front of his left thigh, about five inches above the knee, dividing the muscles to the bone. Notwithstanding the first three wounds received by him, as above described, he still continued fighting until struck by the grape shot, which knocked him down the bank of the Niagara river, about one third of the way to the water, and he was only saved from being precipitated into the river and drowned by grasping in his right hand, in his descent, a shrub, upon which he retained his hold and thus saved his life. In this perilous position he remained until captured by the enemy.

The bill was then laid aside to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM P. GREENE.

Senate bill No. 66, being an act for the relief of William P. Greene, was next taken up for consideration.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the petitioner the sum of $324 26, for the faithful discharge of the duties of surveyor of the port of Providence, and measurer of salt at the same time.

The report was read; from which it appears that the two offices performed by the petitioner were by law not compatible with each other, but that the petitioner having been appointed as surveyor, and the Secretary of the Treasury having subsequently confirmed his appointment as measurer, without fault or knowledge of the petitioner that the offices were incompatible, the committee are of opinion that he is entitled to relief, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was then laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN B. ROGERS.

House bill No. 197, for the relief of John B. Rogers, of South Carolina, was next taken up for consideration. The bill authorizes the payment to the petitioner of $15 55, being the amount of twenty pieces of stamped paper purchased by him during the late war with Great Britain.

The report was read; from which it appears that several years since, when the United States were at war with Great Britain, the petitioner, being then in mercantile occupation, required for his business many stamps, and that at the close of the war he had several left in his possession, and was never aware until lately that any provision had ever been made by Congress for the redeeming of those which had not been used. The petitioner has been confined to the house from illness for some years, which, together with the stamps having been mislaid, is the cause of the amount never having been requested of the Department until August last. A few weeks since he sent the stamps to the Secretary of the Treasury, who returned them to him, with the information that provision had been made by Congress for all stamped paper, and referring him to Congress for relief.

The bill was then laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOSEPH AND PETER ARNOW.

House bill No. 198, for the relief of Joseph Arnou and Peter Arnou, heirs of Joseph Arnou, late of Florida, was next taken up for consideration.

This bill provides for an extension of the act of Congress, approved 3d of March, 1823, "to carry into effect the ninth article of the treaty concluded between the United States and Spain, the 22d day of February, 1819;" and is of like tenor with the act of 26th of June, 1834, and the act of 3d March, 1849.

The bill was then laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

[A message was received from the Senate, by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, Esq., its Secretary, stating that the Senate had passed a bill entitled "An act to provide for the holding of the United States district courts in cases of sickness or other disability of the district judges."]

BERNHART TODD.

House bill No. 199, for the relief of the legal representatives of Bernhart Todd, deceased, was taken up for consideration. This bill provides for paying to the legal representatives of Bernhart Todd, late of Baltimore county, Maryland, the sum of $4,315, being the appraised value of buildings and furniture, together with crops and other personal property, which were consumed by the British forces on the 11th of September, 1814, in consequence of the buildings of said Todd being occupied by the American troops for military purposes. The destruction of the buildings by the enemy being in consequence of such occupancy, brings this claim within the provisions of the act of 1825, and which referred such claims for adjudication to the Third Auditor; but it appears never to have been presented to him, and no action can now be had by the accounting officer, without authority of law.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

GEORGE SIMPTON.

House bill No. 201, for the relief of Captain George Simpton, was then taken up for consideration. This bill provides, that the Secretary of the Treasury pay to Captain George Simpton, of Galveston, Texas, the sum of $1,600, in full payment for his indemnification for the loss of the schooner Alert, while in the public service during the war with Mexico.

It appears by the report, that in March, 1847, the United States steamer Hunter made a prize of the French bark Jeune Nelly, while the said bark was attempting to violate the blockade of Vera Cruz. In the evening after the capture, Captain Simpton, who was then the owner and captain of the Alert, was ordered on board the steamer, and employed as pilot to bring the steamer, her prize, and his own schooner, to anchorage under Green Island. While in the discharge of this duty, a severe norther arose, and made a complete wreck of all the vessels, upon a reef at the mouth of the harbor. Under these circumstances, Captain Simpton claims compensation for the loss of his schooner.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

C. L. SWAYZE.

The next bill in order was House bill No. 232, for the relief of C. L. Swayze, in relation to the location of certain Choctaw scrip.

There being no objection to this bill, it was ordered to be laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

BILLS OBJECTED TO.

The following bills coming up in their order on the Calendar being objected to as indicated below, were laid over for future consideration under the rule giving precedence on the first and fourth Fridays in each month to those bills to which there should be no objection, viz:

House bill No. 200—a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of John H. Piatt, deceased. [By Mr. SACKETT.]

House bill No. 149—a bill for the relief of the heirs of Lieutenant Bartlett Hinds. [By Mr. JONES.]

House bill No. 161—a bill to provide for the payment of the companies of Captains Bush, Price, and Saurez, for military services in Florida. [By Mr. BELL.]

Senate bill No. 32—an act for the relief of Margaret L. Worth. [By Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee.]

House bill No. 168—a bill for the relief of David Myerle. [By Mr. DANIEL.]

House bill No. 175—a bill for the relief of Anthony Walton Bayard. [By Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee.]

House bill No. 177—a bill for the relief of E. V. Field. [By Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee.]

House bill No. 202—a bill for the relief of the widow and orphan children of Colonel William R. McKee, late of Lexington, Kentucky. [By Mr. HUNTER.]

House bill No. 203—a bill for the relief of the trustees of the Philadelphia Gas Works. [By Mr. FICKLIN.]

Mr. JENKINS. The bills remaining on the Calendar were only sent to the printer yesterday, and have not been printed yet. I therefore move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman of the committee reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had under consideration divers private bills, which they had instructed him to report to the House, and to ask the concurrence of the House therein.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL MONDAY.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE moved that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion, and I wish to make an inquiry of the Chair. If there should be forty-five or fifty gentlemen voting for the yeas and nays, and none against them, will the yeas and nays be ordered or not?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is not in order. The Chair will decide each question of order as it arises.

The question was then put upon ordering the yeas and nays, and on a division, there were—ayes 26, noes 70—no quorum voting.

Mr. PICKLIN asked for tellers on the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. While the Chair was in the act of announcing the result of the division, tellers were demanded on the yeas and nays.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I will withdraw my motion.

The motion was accordingly withdrawn.

DUTY ON RAILROAD IRON.

The SPEAKER stated as the business first in order, Senate bill No. 185, reported from the Committee of the Whole House on Friday last, "for the relief of the Raleigh and Gaston Railroad Company." On the passage of this bill the previous question had been demanded.

Mr. STUART asked for the reading of the bill.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask by what authority the Clerk is reading that bill? There was no quorum upon the last vote, and there has been nothing to test it since. Certainly it would be as competent for less than a quorum to take any question by the yeas and nays as to pass a bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee will recollect that the Chair stated, that whilst he was in the act of announcing the result upon the demand for the yeas and nays, tellers were called for.

Mr. JONES. Still there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the vote taken, or proposed to be taken, on the motion to adjourn over, had not shown conclusively that there was not a quorum present, for the reason that the Chair was propounding a question, made in time, that the vote should be taken with tellers, when the motion to adjourn over was withdrawn. Possibly, on that vote a quorum would have appeared, and the Chair, therefore, thinks that the conclusion is not irresistible that there was not a quorum present.

Mr. JONES. I object to doing any business until there is a quorum.

The SPEAKER. There is no vote shown on the Journal, the motion having been withdrawn.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move a call of the House, and upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. JONES. There was a motion made, that when this House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next; upon that motion I demanded the yeas and nays; upon that call, the Chair announced that there were twenty-six voting in the affirmative, and seventy odd in the negative. The Chair then decided that as there was no quorum voting, notwithstanding that one fifth the number present had voted in the affirmative, the yeas and nays were not ordered. Now, I suppose, in order to make a correct Journal, the Clerk must state that upon the call for the yeas and nays, no quorum voted, and the motion was then withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct in his statement, with the single addition, that when the Chair was in the act of announcing the vote, tellers were called for, and another vote was about to be taken, upon the effect of which, perhaps, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] and the Chair will never agree.

The Chair begs leave to state, that when no quorum was found voting upon the motion to adjourn over till Monday, in the opinion of the Chair the House could not order such an adjournment. It requires a quorum to do business; and it would also require a quorum to adjourn over till Monday. Less than a quorum can adjourn from day to day, and less than a quorum can compel the attendance of members. But upon a motion like that, to adjourn over, they could not make the order, and therefore less than one fifth of a quorum could not call the yeas and nays upon the motion. Now, while the Chair was stating the fact that less than a quorum had voted, and that, in his opinion, the yeas and nays were not ordered, tellers were called for, and he was dividing the House upon that call, when the motion was withdrawn.

The Chair therefore thinks that it was not conclusively shown by anything in these divisions, that a majority of the House was not present. However, the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS], now moves that there be a call of the House, which he has a right to do, and upon that motion, demands the yeas and nays. The question is now upon ordering the yeas and nays.

Mr. SACKETT demanded tellers to make the count; which were ordered; and Messrs. SACKETT and MASON were appointed.

The House was then counted, and the tellers reported—ayes 4, noes 113; the Speaker voting in the negative to make a quorum.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then taken upon the motion, that there be a call of the House, and it was not agreed to.

So the House refused to order a call.

The question then recurred on the passage of the bill.

Mr. COBB. Is the bill now regularly before the House?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. COBB. I desire the attention of the House for a moment. In the first place, I would inquire whether the previous question has been called?

The SPEAKER. It was called by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN].

Mr. COBB. I do not see that gentleman present; and I am sorry that he is not, for I wanted him to withdraw it, in order to allow me to offer an amendment.

The previous question was then seconded.

Mr. STUART. I rise to a question of order. I had called for the reading of the bill, and the Clerk had commenced reading it, when he was interrupted by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES], who rose to a point of order. I ask that the bill be now read through.

The bill was again read through by the Clerk. It postpones the payment of the bonds given by said company for certain railroad iron imported into the United States.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. Is a motion to lay the bill on the table now in order?

The SPEAKER. It is in order.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I make that motion.

Mr. SWEETSER. I was about to make the same motion. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HENN. I would inquire if there is an amendment pending, making the bill a general one?

The SPEAKER. There is not.

Mr. COBB. I desired to propose such an amendment, but I could not get the opportunity.

The question was then taken, and the result was—yeas 70, nays 74; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Willis Allen, Allison, John Appleton, William Appleton, Bartlett, Buell, Bunby, Joseph Cable, Carter, Chandler, Clark, John G. Davis, Dawson, Eastman, Ficklin, Florence, Floyd, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gilmore, Goodrich, Grow, Hamilton, Isham G. Harris, Hart, Hendricks, Henn, Hibbard, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Thomas Y. How, Ingersoll, Ives, Jenkins, John Johnson, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, George G. King, Preston King, Letcher, Lockhart, Mace, Mann, Humphrey Marshall, Martin, Mason, McDonald, McLanahan, McNair, Morrison, Murray, Newton, Samuel W. Parker, Peaslee, Perkins, Riddle, Robbins, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Smith, Benjamin Stanton, Abram P. Stevens, Stuart, Sweetser, Thurston, Townshend, Walbridge, Walsh, Washburn, Addison White, and Wildrick—70.

NAYS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Aiken, Ashe, Thomas H. Bayly, Barrere, Bell, Bowie, Bowne, Bragg, Briggs, Albert G. Brown, Geo. H. Brown, Thompson Campbell, Caskie, Chastain, Churchwell, Cleveland, Conger, Cottman, Daniel, George T. Davis, Doty, Duncan, Fitch, Fowler, Gaylord, Gorman, Grey, Harper, Sampson W. Harris, Haws, Hascall, Hebard, Holladay, Houston, Howard, Jackson, Andrew Johnson, Kuhns, Landry, McMullin, McQueen, Meacham, Miller, Millson, Miner, John Moore, Morehead, Murphy, Outlaw, Penn, Pennington, Porter, Powell, Sackett, Schermerhorn, Schoolcraft, Scudder, Snow, Stanley, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, St. Martin, Taylor, George W. Thompson, Tuck, Ward, Watkins, Welch, Alexander White, Wilcox, and Yates—74.

So the bill was not laid upon the table.

Mr. HIBBARD. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I appeal to the gentleman to withdraw that motion. I think we might pass the bills which have been reported from the Committee of the Whole House, before we adjourn, or at least those to which there shall be no objection. I appeal to the gentleman to withdraw the motion for that purpose.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Is it in order to move that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I make that motion.

Mr. JOHN W. HOWE. I demand the yeas and nays upon that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, the result was—yeas 77, nays 72.

So the House agreed to adjourn over till Monday.

The question then recurred upon the motion to adjourn.

PENNSYLVANIA CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. ASHE. I rise to a privileged question. I desire that the testimony in the Pennsylvania contested election case shall be printed. The testimony was not ordered to be printed with the report of the majority of the committee upon that case. Now, the House could not well pass judgment upon that case unless the testimony was printed. I therefore make the motion to print it.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ASHE. I will furthermore take this opportunity to give notice that on Thursday next, I will call up the case for the action of the House.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I now hope the House will, by unanimous consent, take up the bills which have been reported from the Committee of the Whole House with a favorable recommendation, have them read over, and, if there be no objection, let them be entered upon the Journal as passed.

Mr. HIBBARD. If that be the understanding, I will withdraw the motion to adjourn. But it is on the condition that no bills shall be acted upon to which objection shall be made.

Mr. STANTON. That is my proposition.

The SPEAKER. The proposition can only be entertained by unanimous consent.

Mr. CARTER. I object.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. There were two or three bills reported from the Committee of the Whole the other day which have not been acted upon in the House. If they could be embraced in the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee, I for one would not object to it, and I presume no one will.

Mr. STANTON. I embraced only those to which no objection should be made.

Mr. SEYMOUR. Then I object.

Mr. STANTON. I hope the gentleman will not object to taking up these bills to which nobody objects, and having them entered upon the Journal as passed. It will only occupy a short time.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I object to this informal mode of doing business.

Mr. EWING. In connection with the proposition just made by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. ASHE], to print the testimony in the Pennsylvania election case; along with the majority report, I desire to obtain leave to print the minority report along with the testimony. That report has not yet been presented, but I understand such a report is to be made.

The SPEAKER. That would be an irregular mode of doing business.

Mr. EWING. I know it would be irregular, but I suppose it can be done by general consent. [Cries of "Agreed!" "Agreed!"]

Mr. HIBBARD. I renew the motion to adjourn.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion for a moment, to enable me to call up the resolution which I offered yesterday to provide for a recess, in order to make arrangements in the Hall for summer.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. JOHNSON] asks the unanimous consent of the House to take up for consideration the proposition made yesterday in relation to the adjournment of the House from the first to the fourth of June, for the purpose of cleaning the Hall.

A Voice. I object.

Mr. JOHNSON. I rise to a point of order. I do not know, nor do I care, who it is that objects; but I will say this, that I know the objection kills all movements in this matter. But the point of order I make is this: whether there is any authority or right under the rules of this House for anybody to be recognized at all, in making an objection, unless he rises in his seat, and shows his face? It is outrageous, that gentlemen who will not take the responsibility of doing an act, should thus object, without making themselves known. I demand whether they can be recognized by the Chair, or in any way be noticed, unless they rise in their seats, and let themselves be distinctly known.

Mr. J. W. HOWE. I insist upon the objection upon my feet.

Mr. JOHNSON. And I hope the Chair will enforce it upon all occasions, that, when gentlemen object hereafter, they shall get up and show their face in doing so.

Can I move to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER. Such a motion is not in order except on Mondays.

Mr. FOWLER. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. STUART. I wish to raise a question for the consideration of the Chair. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his motion.

Mr. FOWLER. I withdraw it.

Mr. STUART. I wish to make an inquiry of the Chair, in connection with this proposition for adjournment. The Chair will recollect that when the House adjourned on yesterday, we had this resolution in regard to the cleansing the House under consideration, introduced by the unanimous consent, and I inquire of the Chair whether it is not the business in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that it is not in order, and will, in support of his decision, read the twenty-ninth rule of the House:

"Friday and Saturday, in every week, shall be set apart for the consideration of private bills and private business, in preference to any other, unless otherwise determined by a majority of the House."

Now, if the House were to dispose of all this private business, and also the question in regard to the spoliation bill, that resolution would be in order.

Mr. STUART. Is it not in order, then, under that rule, to move to take up that resolution for consideration?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is not in order.

Mr. STUART. Does not the last clause of that rule say, "unless otherwise determined by a majority of this House?"

Mr. POLK. I appeal from the decision of the Chair, for the purpose of getting at this business.

The SPEAKER. "Unless otherwise determined by a majority of the House," that is to say, unless a majority of the House determine to go into committee on other business, and it does not apply to this case. The Chair is very clear about it, and thinks it is not applicable to this case.

Mr. STUART. I am under obligation to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Fowler] to renew the motion to adjourn, and I do so.

The question was taken on the motion, and it was agreed to;

And the House adjourned to meet on Monday next.

IN SENATE.

Monday, May 10, 1852.

Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

Mr. BELL presented the petition of citizens of Baton Rouge, Louisiana, praying the establishment of a daily line of mail-steamer between Louisville and New Orleans; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. JAMES presented a memorial of inhabitants of the coasts of New Jersey and Long Island, praying an appropriation for the protection, preservation, and superintendence of the life-boats and apparatus, placed by the Government on the coast, for the preservation of life and property from shipwreck; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JAMES also presented the documents in favor of an appropriation of $1,000 to test the apparatus of Wilson & Meacham, for illuminating light-houses; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FELCH presented the petition of Anthony Ten Eyck, late United States Commissioner to the Sandwich Islands, praying additional compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HUNTER presented the memorial of M. F. Maury, of the Navy, praying the establishment of a line of mail steam-ships from Norfolk or Charleston, to Para, at the mouth of the Amazon, to connect with a line running thence to Rio de Janeiro; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

A motion by Mr. HUNTER to print the above petition, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. SEWARD presented the petition of the heirs-at-law of Derrick Schuyler, an ensign in the Army of the Revolution, praying to be allowed depreciation on commutation certificates; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Also, the petition of the heirs-at-law of Nicholas Schuyler, a surgeon in the Army of the Revolution, praying to be allowed depreciation on commutation certificates; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. MALLORY presented the petition of the heirs of John S. Budd, praying to be allowed the five years' full pay to which said Budd was entitled for his services in the war of the Revolution; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. UNDERWOOD presented the petition of Samuel Winston, administrator of Thomas Martin, deceased, praying to be allowed the difference between the pay of a lieutenant and that of a captain in the Virginia Continental line of the army, during the revolutionary war; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask leave to present the petition of the heirs of William Hazzard Wigg, of South Carolina, asking compensation for the services of his grandfather, a major in the revolutionary army. I do not know that this would be the proper occasion to say anything on the subject of the petition, further than to commend it to the attention of the Committee on Revolutionary Claims. The petitioner is the grandson of one of the most uncompromising of the patriots of the Revolution. His grandfather was one of those who were on board of a prison-ship when they received the information that they were held as hostages and would be executed in retaliation for any executions which should take place by General Greene's army; and he was one of those who signed a paper asking General Greene to go on and do his duty, irrespective of those consequences. I hope the petition will claim the early attention of the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to which I ask that it may be referred.

It was so referred.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, presented the petition of John H. C. Meyer, praying that a sum of money paid by him for land and not subject to entry, may be refunded with interest; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CASS presented the petition of Henry Allen, a pensioner of the United States, praying to be allowed arrears of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BRADBURY presented a petition of citizens of Wisconsin, praying the reorganization of the circuit and district courts of the United States, and remonstrating against the memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, asking for a restriction of the jurisdiction of these courts; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CLEMENS presented a petition of citizens of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, praying the construction of a bridge across the Potomac river, at some point west of the Alexandria Aqueduct; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Adam D. Stuart, late a paymaster in the Army, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORT FROM A STANDING COMMITTEE.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Commerce, to which were referred the several memorials praying to be allowed fishing bounty on wrecked vessels, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for the relief of the owners of the schooners Ursula, Forester, Grampus, and Stephen C. Phillips; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

SEAMEN'S HOSPITAL MONEY.

Mr. SUMNER submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be directed to consider the expediency of abolishing, by law, the exaction of twenty cents from the monthly wages of seamen in the merchant service of the United States, and of boatmen on the western waters, constituting what is called "Hospital money," so that when sick or disabled they may enjoy their present privileges at the marine hospitals, without the present tax.

LIEUTENANT DERBY'S REPORT.

Mr. WELLER submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to the Senate a copy of the reconnaissance of the Gulf of California and the Colorado river, made in 1850 and 1851, by Lieutenant Derby, of the corps of Topographical Engineers, together with a copy of the report made by said officer to the Department, in relation to the Tulare Lake and its vicinity.

JUDICIAL SALARY.

Mr. FISH submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire into the propriety of increasing the salary of the judge of the United States for the northern district of New York.

OUTRAGES ON SPANISH SUBJECTS.

Mr. MALLORY submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to inquire into the propriety of authorizing the President of the United States to have investigation made, whether any Spanish subjects, not citizens of the United States, have sustained damage, by loss of property or otherwise, in consequence of public outbreak or violence in the State of Louisiana, growing out of the late Cuban expedition; and into the propriety of authorizing the President to make indemnity to the Spanish Government for such Spanish subjects for said damage.

Mr. MALLORY. I deem it proper to say a word in explanation of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT. It has been adopted.

Mr. MALLORY. Precisely so; but I wish to direct the attention of the Senate more particularly to it. If, however, it is not in order I will not go on.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator can proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. MALLORY. The resolution is in terms precisely such a one as I had the honor to introduce a short time ago in reference to certain outbreaks, or alleged outbreaks, in Florida. If the members of the body were not sufficiently informed of the origin, character, and results of certain occurrences which took place in New Orleans and in Florida immediately after the late Cuban expedition, I would refer them to a demand which Spain has recently made upon this country for indemnity in favor of certain of her citizens—a demand which I think appeals strongly to the attention of the body. Without expressing any opinion as to the propriety of the demand, or the character of the outbreaks—as I do not desire to entertain the attention of the Senate long—I will assume that a treaty of amity and commerce has existed between Spain and the United States from 1795 to the present moment; that under the thirteenth article of that treaty, the citizens and subjects of Spain, and the citizens of the United States, are secured and guaranteed in the right to move into the Territories of either Power, for the purpose of carrying on trade or commerce, or otherwise. I will assume that citizens of the United States have removed into Spain for this purpose, and that Spanish subjects have removed and are still residing in parts of the United States for similar purposes. I will assume, further, that a body of Spanish subjects residing within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States, without any design of throwing off their allegiance to their crown—without any design of becoming American citizens, were assailed, their property destroyed, and their lives endangered, and that they were compelled, by flight, to consult that safety which the laws of this country were unable to throw around them. I will assume, further, that their property was thus destroyed, and their lives thus endangered—not because they had violated any law of this country; not because they had infringed upon any public or private right, but because they were Spanish subjects: and that, with this treaty guarantee in their hands, and under the broad shadow of our flag, they were thus assailed because they were subjects of Spain.

Now, assuming these positions to be correct, without expressing an opinion of their truth or character, I will ask, what is the mode and what is the measure of redress of parties thus injured? We are all familiar with the maxim, that there is no wrong without a remedy: and if a class of American citizens had thus been dealt with by Spain, or her colonies, I presume there is not an American who would not immediately respond, that a stern demand upon the Spanish Government, supported by all our force, and a strict indemnity for the losses sustained, could be the only mode, the only measure of redress. I concede, as it has been held, that the municipal authorities of the place at which the property was destroyed, are primarily liable, and may be justly held accountable for the damages sustained; but it is evident, that while this liability offers the shadow of a remedy, it affords no substantial redress whatever; it but holds "a promise to the ear, to break it to the hope;" it is making the mode and measure of redress dependent upon the party legally bound to make it. It is, therefore, as wrong in principle as it is in policy, to turn parties, who have thus been injured, over to the local or municipal authorities of the place where the wrong was committed. I think, sir, of course, that governments are no less bound by the rules of strict morality in this case than individuals; and that our Government, depending, as it does, upon the will of the people, and representing in the aggregate the virtue of the people, has always manifested in its foreign relations, and is bound to manifest, frankness and exact justice; and, in this case, if the assumptions I have made be correct, exact justice is no less dictated by a sound morality than by expediency, policy, and a far-seeing political forecast. Why, sir, foreign nations do not understand the workings of our political system. They do not understand that, politically and socially, our States are "As distinct as the waves;"

whilst, in our foreign policy, we are

"One, as the sea."

We have dealt with Spain as with the rest of mankind—as a unit; and if it be conceded that the subjects of Spain, whose property was destroyed, are entitled to indemnity, it will be difficult to make her understand why this indemnity should be sought from a single municipality or State, of whose very existence she may in some cases be ignorant. It was not thus that we treated with a sister Republic. We did not condescend to deal with departments or States. Our merchants were deprived of their property, and in many instances of their liberty by departments or States; and yet we did not hold them responsible. We dealt with Mexico as a unit. We made our demands upon her; and surely we are bound to concede to Spain all that we asked from Mexico.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair is unwilling to interrupt the Senator, but the resolution has been referred.

Mr. MALLORY. Well, sir, I will not detain the Senate by continuing these remarks. I have deemed it proper to say thus much, because the resolution which I introduced a few months ago, very similar to this, I have not heard of since. But I suppose attention has not been called to it.

SCHOOL LANDS IN MISSISSIPPI.

On motion by Mr. ADAMS, the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, "An act to authorize the Legislature of the State of Mississippi to sell the lands heretofore appropriated for the use of schools in that State, and approve the sales already made;" and no amendment being offered, it was read a third time and passed.

BILLS PASSED.

The engrossed bill granting the right of way to the Florida, Atlantic, and Gulf Central Railroad Company through the public lands of the United States, and appropriating lands to the State of Florida in aid of the construction of said railroad and branches, was read a third time, and its title being amended to read as follows, it was passed: "An act granting the right of way and a portion of the public lands to the State of Florida for the construction of a railroad and branches in said State."

The engrossed bill granting the right of way and making a donation of land to the State of Alabama in aid of the construction of the Mobile and Girard Railroad was read a third time and passed.

RAILROAD IN FLORIDA AND ALABAMA.

Mr. MORTON. If I had been in my seat on Friday last, when certain railroad bills were acted upon, I should have asked the Senate to consider the bill granting the right of way and making a grant of land to the States of Florida and Alabama, in aid of the construction of a railroad from the waters of Pensacola bay, in Florida, to Montgomery, in the State of Alabama, and for other purposes. It is a bill which was among the first that were introduced to the Senate, and has lingered to almost the last. I now move to postpone all prior orders, for the purpose of taking up that bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the several amendments which were reported by the committee, making the bill conform to the model bill, and which were in all respects similar to those which had been made to bills of a like character, were adopted.

Mr. MORTON. I wish to add, by way of amendment, an additional section:

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That all the advantages, benefits, and privileges that are hereby granted to the States of Florida and Alabama, and which are granted by this act, shall be extended to the said States for the construction of a railroad from the waters of the Pensacola bay to the waters of Mobile bay, or Tensaw river, in the State of Alabama; and of a railroad or branch railroad to the Chattahoochee and Flint rivers, in the State of Georgia.

Mr. BORLAND. I would inquire of the Senator from Florida, if he intends to embrace in this bill, by that amendment, the provisions of another bill which has been reported from the Committee on Public Lands?

Mr. MORTON. I do.

Mr. BORLAND. Then I think it is a proper amendment, and will save the passage of another bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was then reported to the Senate as amended, and the several amendments concurred in; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

RAILROAD FROM LOUISVILLE TO ST. LOUIS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I move to suspend the previous orders, with the view of taking up another railroad bill. It is "A bill granting lands and the right of way to the States of Indiana and Illinois, in aid of the construction of a railroad from a point on the Ohio river, opposite to Louisville, Kentucky, to a point opposite to St. Louis, in Missouri."

I hope this bill will be taken up. We can dispose of it in ten minutes, or perhaps in five minutes.

Mr. HUNTER. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Kentucky, whether this bill is likely to lead to any debate, or whether it is one of the same character as the bill we have just passed?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is of the same character precisely.

The motion to take up the bill was agreed to.

The bill was considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and several amendments having been made to it, so as to make it conform to the Iowa railroad bill, it was reported to the Senate, the several amendments were concurred in, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

PROSECUTION OF CLAIMS BY GOVERNMENT OFFICERS.

The bill to amend and extend the provisions of an act approved July 29, 1846, entitled "An act in relation to the payment of claims," came up on its third reading.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have performed my promise in preparing an amendment to that bill, but I am afraid the consideration of it will take up more time than the Senate will now be willing to bestow upon it. I can, however, very briefly state the object I have in view.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope that bill will be allowed to lie over till to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT. It will not be in order for the Senator to offer any amendment at this stage of the bill. It is now on its third reading.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I intended to state the object of the amendment which I propose to make to the bill, and then to move to recommit it. As, however, it might lead to debate, and, perhaps, consume more time than the Senate will be willing to devote to it to-day, it will be agreeable to me that it should be passed over informally until to-morrow.

Mr. HUNTER. Let it be passed over.

Mr. BADGER. I have no objection that it should be passed over to-day, provided it is understood that it will come up to-morrow, during the morning hour. My friend from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD] can call it up early to-morrow.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am perfectly willing to do so, immediately after the Journal is read. The bill was accordingly laid over.

THE DEFICIENCY BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1852," the question pending being upon the amendment of the Committee on Finance, as it had been amended. As amended, it is as follows:

For additional compensation for increasing the transportation of the United States mail between New York and Liverpool, in the Collins line of steamers, to twenty-six trips per annum, at such times as shall be directed by the Postmaster General, and in conformity to his last annual report to Congress, and his letter of the 15th of November last, to the Secretary of the Navy, commencing said increased service on the 1st of January, 1852, at the rate of $33,000 per trip, in lieu of the present allowance, the sum of $236,500: Provided, That it shall be in the power of Congress, at any time after the first day of January, 1854, to terminate the arrangement for the additional allowance herein provided for.

Mr. WADE. I do not rise with the intention of making a speech, or rather of inflicting a speech on the Senate respecting this amendment. I have now been in this body for more than five months, and I am very forcibly impressed with the idea that although we have had speeches and arguments here of the most splendid and showy description, they are among the most useless and worthless things for which this Government pays. I have, generally, contented myself with giving a silent vote on any question proposed, believing that, at all events, other gentlemen understood the several questions as well as I do, perhaps better; and, as I was not in a position to enlighten them, I thought it best to content myself with a simple vote. But, on this occasion, I thought that it possibly was my duty to assign the reasons briefly, why I should vote against the amendment under consideration.

It has now been under consideration for nearly four weeks, and I doubt very much whether the members of the Senate understand it much better than when it was first introduced. [Laughter.] I am induced to come to this conclusion by the fact that most of the gentlemen, who have assigned the reasons why they should support, or why they should oppose the measure, have not generally agreed. And, although I have listened with great attention to the arguments adduced in support, and also to those in opposition to the amendment, I confess I know very little more respecting its merits than I did when it was first proposed. Some gentlemen appear to think that there is involved in it something of that great principle of protection to American industry, which they advocate. Others think it is not incompatible with the great doctrines of free trade, which they generally support; and, therefore, that they may, without any impeachment of their principles, vote in its favor. Others suppose that these steam-ships may be beneficial to the Government, as an arm of the Navy in time of war. Others have supposed that they were, in that view, perfectly useless, and could not answer any beneficial end. And some gentlemen have thought that there is in this measure the hand of "manifest destiny," and appeared to fear that even destiny itself would be frustrated, unless supported by their votes. Others have thought that the broad Atlantic ocean separated many affectionate hearts, which yearn to commune with each other; and they saw no other practicable mode of removing the difficulty than by supporting these huge leviathans of the ocean. I believe all have seen in this measure a means of attaining some desirable object, while, in reality, it is only calculated to gratify national vanity, by beating John Bull in a boat-race across the Atlantic. There is not much else in it after all.

Now, I should be very well pleased to beat John Bull in a boat-race, or in any other race, if it could be effected without this hot-house process of forcing; if it could be done by the natural growth of the skill, and the ingenuity, and the enterprise of our people. If we could beat him in that way it would undoubtedly gratify my national pride. The trial is not now to be made for the first time; it has been tried before, and we know that, giving us an equal chance, we can and will beat John Bull anywhere. It is not necessary we should be at the expense proposed by this amendment to settle that point; and I conceive that this experiment is too expensive to recommend itself to our favor.

But, then, what is really the measure, and what is the objection to it? It cannot be disguised that it is an open, palpable monopoly, granted to a private company, in order to enable it to compete with others who navigate the Atlantic ocean. I have heard nothing in the arguments of any Senator upon this floor which has removed the difficulty. If I understand it, you propose to give this company something like $7,000,000 in the course of eight years to come, to enable them to carry your mails across the Atlantic ocean. Well, what is that? What is the great principle of free-trade, except it is that you shall purchase in the market where you can buy the cheapest? I believe that is a leading doctrine of that creed. Will not your mails be carried unless you grant this large amount of money for the purpose of enabling your steamers to compete with those of Great Britain? If I understand it, it is conceded that they will; but then the consequence will be that the mails will be carried in British steamers. Very well, provided they can do it cheaper than we can, and if they will perform it as well, on the principles of free trade, I do not see that we should complain of that. It cannot be disguised but that it stands on the same principles as protection stands upon in all other cases. How can you distinguish it from protection to your great iron interests or to your manufactures generally? It stands, and is really argued here, upon the same principle. What is the reason that we are asked to give some $7,000,000 in the course of the ensuing eight years to sustain this line? Why, we are told that unless we do, Great Britain will do the service with her steam-ships. And why will she do it unless we grant this aid? Reasons are assigned. It is said that labor is cheaper in Great Britain, that coal is cheaper, that engineers can be hired at a cheaper rate there than in this country, and that insurances can be obtained at about half the price which must be paid here. That is the course of argument by which this amendment is attempted to be sustained; and I am astonished to see those who are the strenuous advocates of all other kinds of free trade avowing their intention to vote for this amendment, for it seems to me to be a direct impeachment of that doctrine.

I say not these things because I am not myself an advocate of the principle of protection generally, for I am an advocate of that principle; and my national pride is not gratified at all by attempting to force up this line of steam-ships like a hot-house plant; for I know that if the vast powers of this nation are brought to bear upon this especial interest, we may beat out Great Britain or any other country. But, regarding this project in the light in which it appears to me, that of a mere monopoly, which comes into direct antagonism with the navigating interest generally, I think this amendment ought not to pass, for we cannot disguise the fact, that it is a monopoly. It seems to me to be the rankest injustice to confer this boon upon these proprietors of steam-ships in conflict with all the other navigating interests of the country. It is said, perhaps, that this appropriation is merely for the carriage of your mails across the Atlantic. But, sir, these huge steamers can carry many other things across the ocean besides your mails. I have no knowledge of such matters myself, but it must be very clear that such immense vessels cannot be required for that purpose. I should like that some gentleman understanding it should tell me how much of these monstrous steamers are to be occupied with the mails. I do not know how it is with regard to the fact, but it seems to me that the mails cannot very much incumber them. I suppose that in addition to the carrying of the mails, they will be freighted with the costliest merchandise to an immense extent, thus coming in direct conflict with other navigating interests; and so far as that is likely to be the case, I hold it to be rank injustice to them; and no argument which I have yet heard in favor of this appropriation has been strong enough to remove this objection in my mind.

Mr. President, if you desire to compete successfully with Great Britain, I think I see a way in which it can be done—a way which will not minister to national vanity in this manner, but which will minister to the laudable pride of any man who truly loves his country. If you will protect the industry, and talent, and ingenuity of our people generally, instead of according your protection to some special interest, as in this case, making an atrocious monopoly, you may in a few years bring us as far in advance of Great Britain as our magnificent rivers, and our country generally, are superior to hers. Give our people an equal chance with the people of Great Britain, and there is no doubt that your national pride will be gratified—not your paltry national vanity in regard to a boat-race, but in regard to those permanent advantages which will administer to the just pride of any lover of his country. In that I will go with you to the fullest extent; but when you ask us to grant this enormous boon, for the purpose of bolstering up the interests of this particular company to the injury of other interests, it seems to me to be rank injustice, and for one, I cannot lend my support to it.

There is another reason why I cannot, as a Western man, vote for this measure, and that was the principal reason that induced me to make any observations upon the subject. It is because, as a Western man, I have looked at the neglect, and I think I may say the injustice of this Government, in fostering any great Western interest, while you propose to grant this enormous appropriation for the mere purpose of carrying your mails across the Atlantic. About twenty years ago—I recollect it very well—this Government, in a fraternal spirit, undertook to cherish the great interests of the West. They commenced a system of internal improvement, of improvement to our rivers, and of improvement to our harbors; and the Government was at an enormous expense in procuring machinery to carry all these great and beneficent purposes into execution; and they progressed to some considerable extent in it. They built harbors along the coast, but did not complete them. They had only just commenced the great measures they had prepared to perform; and some sixteen or seventeen years ago, with all this expensive machinery for carrying out these measures, it came into the head of the Government, somehow or other, that there was fresh water only in the lakes.

All at once, this expensive machinery was packed up together, and Uncle Sam—if I may so express myself—like an absconding debtor, sold out the whole of it at a mere nominal price, and abandoned that part of the country; and he has not been seen there since. We have advertised for him; we have petitioned for him; and endeavored in every way to ascertain where Uncle Sam had gone; but we have not seen him there since, and I suppose it was with the view of ascertaining his residence, that certain interesting questions, as was reported, were addressed to the distinguished Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CASS.] in 1848, amidst "noise and confusion."

Mr. CASS. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him? This is an old friend of ours, and I believe I have a prescriptive right to get up when those words are uttered. I wish to ask the honorable Senator if he ever saw Governor Wood's letter on that subject?

Mr. WADE. Yes, sir, I have seen it.

Mr. CASS. Then I would ask if the Senator ever read the letter?

Mr. WADE. Yes, sir, I have read it.

Mr. CASS. Then the gentleman knows there is no truth in the story.

Mr. WADE. I understood that the Senator contradicted the statement, and, of course, I said that there was no truth in it.

I suppose that the queries on that occasion, grew out of the anxiety of our people to learn the whereabouts of Uncle Sam, and they thought the distinguished Senator from Michigan might know as well as any one else. But these questions are no less pertinent now than they were then, and there is no particular "noise or confusion" in this Senate chamber—

Mr. CASS. Not a bit.

Mr. WADE. And the Senator proposes now to give seven millions of dollars within the next eight years, for the purpose of building up and fostering this line of steam-ships?

Mr. CASS. No, sir, I do not.

Mr. WADE. It will amount to but very little less than that.

Mr. RUSK. If the Senator will allow me to ask him a question, I should like to know if he has read the contract, and whether he knows that all the revenue from postages goes to the Government?

Mr. WADE. Yes, sir, I understand all that.

Mr. RUSK. Then, how can the Senator say that the whole is given to the company?

Mr. WADE. I do not know how much will ever get back to the Government again; gentlemen do not know themselves, and they do not pretend to tell us. The honorable Senator from Texas [Mr. RUSK] informed us that he had reason to believe that this project would ultimately remunerate the Government for the outlay, though he said it was matter of opinion.

Mr. RUSK. I showed the reasons; I showed the receipts at the Post Office Department.

Mr. WADE. Yes, sir, you showed the receipts of the Post Office Department, but you are obliged to make the supposition that there will be required an enormous increase, in order to cover the expense which is to be incurred. It is a mere matter of opinion, and the very fact that these gentlemen are asking for this bounty after they have made the trial, is ample proof that they cannot sustain themselves now, and whether they ever will or not, must remain a matter of opinion.

Then, the Senator from Michigan does propose to give his support to a measure which is to take from the Treasury of the United States, within the next eight years, not much less than $7,000,000, and all for the purpose of enabling this steam company to compete with Great Britain in the carrying of the mails across the Atlantic. That is all there is of it; and now the question that I am about to propose to the distinguished Senator, seeing there is no "noise and confusion" here now, is, whether he will go along with me—whether he believes it is constitutional, just, and reasonable that the same amount shall be appropriated within the same time towards the construction and improvement of our harbors, and the improvement of our rivers in the West and Southwest?

Mr. CASS. Does the honorable Senator from Ohio wish me to answer him now?

Mr. WADE. Yes, sir; and I want to know whether I can count upon the aid of the Senator from Michigan, at this session, for such an object.

Mr. CASS. The Senator talks about that as he does about my old friend, the "noise and confusion." Let me say on that point, that my views were fully disclosed at the last session of Congress. I shall vote for any reasonable appropriation for internal improvements, the items of which have been examined and reported by the War Department. I shall vote for any such bill, which does not extend the appropriation to an unreasonable amount; but I am not in favor of establishing a great system of internal improvements, either for harbors or rivers. When such a bill as I have indicated comes up, I shall vote for it.

Mr. WADE. I am very happy to hear it. I had no doubt the Senator from Michigan would do so. I am glad to hear his response—glad that his "position," in this respect, "is defined." I rejoice that I may count on his support of these great measures of internal improvement. I am somewhat surprised, sir, that after six months of the session have expired, not a single word has been heard of any such measures, and yet our harbors on Lake Erie are running down and going to ruin; and for sixteen or seventeen years we have not been able to obtain one single cent from the Treasury to maintain them.

But, sir, it is said that this is a great war measure, and that we ought to maintain it as an arm of the national defenses in times of war with England. Sir, it is of infinitely more importance to us that we build up and maintain our harbors on Lake Erie and the other lakes, which divide us from the shore of the British provinces. What should we do in case of a war now, when our sailors on the lakes have to combat the elements as well as an enemy, and have no harbor—no place of safety to fly to in case of storms? What should we do in such a case, seeing that the General Government has virtually withdrawn its consideration from all such improvements and defenses? Talk of war with Great Britain! and let me ask whether it is not a matter of infinitely more importance that you should build up some place to which your ships could resort on these lakes where your commerce is scarcely inferior to what it is on the Atlantic coast itself? Is not that of as much importance as to try this miserable experiment of fostering these steamers for war purposes? Sir, no two men are agreed as to whether these steamers will be of any kind of advantage in time of war. I know that you can get a delegation from our Navy Board to report anything you please. It is precisely like getting the opinion of an attorney in a case. None of them have the least experience in regard to such matters.

I know nothing of war, or of naval operations, nor do I profess to know anything about them; but any man of the least common sense, at the very first glance at these steamers, would perceive that they were not designed for the purposes of war. Nor are they compatible with it at all. Why one cannon ball, raking the paddle-wheels—which form a most palpable mark—of one of those steamers, would cripple her as effectually as a man could cripple a goose on the wing. Talk about their utility as vessels of war! I know they would not be of the slightest use.

Again, if you look at the furniture of these boats, do they look as if they were calculated for the rude conflicts of war? They are fitted up with expensive mirrors, which would grace the palace of a prince, and all the other furniture is on a similar scale. Yet they speak of these vessels as being fit for war! I have heard of an elephant in a china shop, but I think his ravages among the brittle ware would be fully equaled by the raking of a cannon shot through this furniture. I wish I knew the expense of furnishing these boats. No one has told us anything about that as yet, but a bare inspection of them will show that they are better calculated for eastern seraglios than for ships of war. [Laughter.] No, they were not built or designed for that purpose; there is no disguising it, they were not intended for the rude conflicts of war. They are much better calculated to foster and minister to the luxury of those wealthy citizens who desire to cross the Atlantic at a cheap rate; and that, too, at the expense of the hard-handed laboring man. That is the design; and every cent that is paid out of the Treasury for these ships is drawn from the pocket of the poor laboring man, to minister to the luxury of persons who choose to cross the Atlantic. Talk about war! There will be no war with England—none at all. I know that the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. Cass] always talks about a war with England; but there will be no war with England as long as you permit her to reap all the benefits of free trade. There will be no war with England as long as she can give dinners to your Walkers, and other free-traders. As long as she can retain her influence over that class of men England will not go to war.

A SENATOR. You are right.

Mr. WADE. I know I am right. You cannot kick Great Britain into a war while you permit her to enjoy all the benefits of free trade with this country.

We all know how we can humble the pride of Great Britain, and that is by giving protection to labor generally, and not by undertaking to run a boat-race with her. That will do no good. You will not humble the pride of Great Britain if you do run such a race, and even beat her. Sir, from the shores of Canada they can see your utter nakedness; and while you are putting forth all your power to beat that country in a boat-race across the Atlantic, and while its people see the manner in which you neglect other interests, John Bull is shrewd enough to see your folly and to laugh at it. He likes very well to cater to your vanity at such a price. But, sir, go along with me, and we will do John Bull substantial injury, and build up our own interests, and our own country, to such an extent that no man will want the vanity of beating John Bull in a race across the Atlantic; but you will beat him everywhere, and put your country as far and as permanently above his as your means are superior to his.

I know, sir, that a very patriotic appeal was made to the Senate by the Senator from Michigan. He talked of war; he talked of ministering to our national pride, and called it patriotism to undertake to beat John Bull by fostering and building up this one special interest at the expense of the whole country. I have no pride nor vanity of that kind. I have as much national pride, and as much anxiety to see this country in advance of every other country in the world, as any other man; but I cannot be deceived by any of these hot-house operations—not at all. I want to see the country placed in a condition in which it will grow up prosperously, and supersede others without partial favors being bestowed by the Government on particular and special interests. Besides, as I have already remarked more than once, I think it would be doing injustice to other navigating interests on the Atlantic. These enormous steamers running every week, must come in ruinous competition with other shipping interests not fostered by the Government. Anybody can see that.

I believe, Mr. President, that we have had some remonstrances here on that subject, yet I have not heard a single word said about them. Sir, if I am not mistaken, we have had a great many of these remonstrances presented here from various branches of the shipping interest, showing that those who were not protected by the Government, are materially injured by the protection which is given to this favored company; that they were injured by these boats running once a week in opposition to them, and coming in conflict with their interests. This is a proposition too plain to be argued; anybody can see that this protection would be rank injustice to the other shipping interests. Sir, I wish to see a disposition on the part of this Government to build up and foster the great West, to which I belong. You have withdrawn from the West all aid for more than sixteen years. The voice of the Government has not been heard there; and I cannot consent to grant this enormous sum to the Atlantic coast until I see at least a disposition to do something for us. Then, sir, I am disposed to be liberal; for no man will rejoice in the prosperity of the whole of this country, and in that of every part of it, more than I. I want to see justice done in all its parts; and I must say, that in the West, the justice due to that section of the country has been shamefully neglected. I do not hesitate to say that, and I call upon members of this Senate who live along the Mississippi river and its tributaries, and along the shores of the great lakes of the West, to join with me, and put a face of brass against any further expenditure along the Atlantic coast until a disposition is shown to do justice to us. When that disposition is shown, we will talk with you, and we will be liberal with you; but until that is done, I will not consent to give you another dollar to foster and build up your navigation interests. Your shipping interests, if I am not greatly mistaken, is now protected, and ever has been, under this Government, while all other interests have been comparatively neglected.

Then I cannot consent to go any further until a disposition is shown here, earnestly, sincerely, to do justice to us in the West. Everybody knows, sir, that immense losses in property occur every year upon the lakes for the want of harbors to which our sailors can resort in time of rough weather and storms. We all know the serious obstructions along the Ohio river, and particularly that which has existed for years, for the want of a little help from the Government, at the falls of the Ohio river. These things come more immediately under my own observation; but I have no doubt the same obstruction meets the eye of every Senator here, in his own locality, upon the streams in which he has an interest. They all want the fostering and protecting arm of the Government, and that they have not had for twenty years past. Our people call for it in vain, and almost six months of this session have passed by, and I have not heard a word about it; though they are calling for enormous sums along the Atlantic coast and along the Pacific coast for all sorts of projects. There are your dry-docks, and your marine railways, and you have expeditions to Japan, and you can go over the whole land and ransack heaven and earth for the purpose of finding an interest to be fostered, but you do not yet know that you have a West.

Mr. CLARKE. You happen to know it.

Mr. WADE. Yes, sir, thank God, I do happen to know it; and if I can, I shall try to make it understood. I wish to see that great interest brought up. I do not intend to be illiberal; I will minister, so far as my voice and my vote can contribute to it, to the building up of every great national interest in every part and parcel of this Union, I care not where it may be located. But I know the West and Southwest have been shamefully neglected; and when you talk to me about engaging in the doubtful project of rearing up a great monopoly on the Atlantic coast, and bring it in conflict with others, until you have at least shown a disposition to do justice by the West, you cannot have my support. I will not say that under any circumstances I would support a measure like this; because I do not think it is just. I do not believe in fostering one company of men and giving them such an enormous sum of money for the purpose of enabling them to compete with Great Britain or anybody else. If Great Britain can carry our mails so much cheaper, on the principles of free trade, I would say, let them do it. You say you can buy your iron cheaper in England than you can here. Then why should I protect you? If the mails can be carried cheaper than at present, why not, on the same principle, allow Great Britain to do it? The fact is, that the free-trade principle is either correct or incorrect. There is no principle applicable to the trade in iron, coal, or to manufactures generally, which is not equally applicable for the purpose of carrying the mails. No Jesuit can draw the line of demarcation on this point, and no Senator has attempted to do it.

These steamers are spoken of as likely to prove an important branch of the naval service, although the Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTER] has shown as plainly as argument can show, and as plainly as the experience of naval men can show, that they would not be worth a straw in time of war; and that comports with what the common sense of every man, even though he were not a naval man, would render apparent. But that was not the object. If the object was merely to carry the mails, then they can be carried at a much less expense than the amendment proposes. Further, if the object was to carry the mails, there was no necessity for this costly furniture, this thousand dollar mirror, and those other articles of luxury which have cost such enormous sums. If your object was anything more than this, then these articles are equally useless, and show that there is no intention to use these vessels as war steamers; but that the idea is to foster and build up this line with special privileges to conflict with every other interest in the country. I, for one, will never consent to it.

Mr. BAYARD said: Mr. President, had this debate closed during the last week, I should not have been disposed to trouble the Senate with any remarks on the merits of the appropriation recommended by the committee for the support of the line of steamers between New York and Liverpool, called the Collins line. As it is, however, I shall endeavor to occupy the attention of the Senate but a brief period while presenting my views with reference to the question.

From the very high estimate I have formed of the statesmanlike qualities of the honorable and distinguished Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER], arising from a close observation of his political course since I have been a member of this body, and anterior to it, and from the profound respect I have for his judgment, I differ from him with both hesitation and regret; and I accede, also, to the truth of most, if not all, of the general rules of policy stated in the very able address which he made to the Senate. I admit, too, that, as a general rule, the less a government interferes in matters of individual enterprise and individual competition, the wiser the policy. But it is not alone in the assertion and vindication of general principles that the sagacity of the statesman is tried; it is taxed to a far greater extent in the application of those principles practically, with their proper modifications and limitations, to the varied affairs of the world. Pickleness of policy on any subject is a source of injury to any nation, and, to a great nation, it is a disgrace.

Now, sir, what policy have you adopted in reference to this question of a steam commercial marine? In 1847, Congress determined that they would adopt this line of policy—that, by Government assistance, they would construct a steam commercial marine, which would be available for purposes of war during war; and during the more natural, and, it is to be hoped, the more prolonged, state of the country—that of peace—would be employed in the transportation of your mails. In pursuance of this policy, you caused advertisements to be sent forth throughout the country; an association of merchants in New York made proposals to you to establish a line of steamers between New York and Liverpool. Those proposals you accepted, and the contract, on being made, was carried out under the superintendence of your own officers, and, after its completion, every vessel constructed under it was accepted as properly constructed, according to the terms of the contract, by your own Departments. The enterprise was new, and, as in all new enterprises, the cost, of course, was greater than had been previously contemplated. The increased cost had been superinduced by a patriotic desire on the part of the contractors to construct vessels which should accord with your avowed policy. And, in a first effort, with American models and the aid of American skill and American genius, they surpassed the rival English line, which had been in existence ten years previous. Is there no merit in this? Those contractors come here now, and tell you, nay, they prove to you, that the cost of this experiment is too great for them. They have shown you that they have already sunk a half million of dollars in carrying it out for the benefit of the country. If the policy which you adopted in 1847 is not to be changed, then two questions arise: Are not these parties entitled to the relief they ask? and, to what extent should that relief be granted?

Sir, in this matter of steam navigation we have followed the lead of Great Britain; and though it may be, and undoubtedly is, true that we should not follow her example in all things, yet in many we may certainly profit by it. What was the state of things as regards this mail service anterior to the introduction of steam navigation for the purpose of traversing the ocean? Great Britain performed all her postal service on the ocean in mail packets, which were owned by the Government, exclusive of all individual connection. Subsequent to the use of steam for the purpose of ocean navigation, (I think either in the Mediterranean or in the East,) Great Britain attempted to follow the same course in reference to steam packets, but the experiment was found too costly, and she abandoned it; and after it was demonstrated by the experiments of the Sirius and Great Western that the Atlantic, in defiance of the predictions of Dr. Lardner and others, could be safely crossed by steamers, she established the Canard line—she established the contract system, by which the aid of the Government, in order to lessen the expense in the transportation of the mails, was given to private citizens, who received, in addition to that aid, such emoluments as they could obtain from the ordinary pursuits of commerce. Such was the origin of this policy. My impression is clear, and I do not think I can be mistaken, that in the first contracts of Great Britain with the Canard steam company, there was no clause in reference to the purposes of war. The steamers were not so constructed. Subsequently that was adopted, and therefore they had a double object in view. The primary one was, that they should have steamers which could transport the mails in time of peace; and next, that they might be available for purposes of war, in the contingency of war ensuing. Sir, you adopted this same policy in 1847.

There are two leading objections. I shall not pause to notice all the varied arguments which have been urged against the appropriation recommended by the committee. The first is, that the steamers are not adapted to war purposes; and the second, that their employment in the mail service is an improper and unwise interference with private enterprises, which should always be left free from Government connection, and that, by your appropriation you encourage a commercial monopoly. These I understand to be the substantial objections urged, and strongly urged, by the honorable Senator from Virginia. I propose to examine them in their order.

The objection, that these steamers are not available for purposes of war, is an objection founded on opinion only, and on a conflicting opinion too; (according to all the evidence in this case,) between naval men and naval architects. If you resort to fact,—fact is favorable to their use. The solitary instance you have is that stated by my friend from Texas, [Mr. Russ,] in which, within the last year, the British Government, on three days' notice, have armed and equipped four of their commercial steamers for the purpose of forcing their way in a hostile expedition against heavily armed fortifications. The fact stands against the speculative opinions of those who are opposed to the possibility of such a use of these steamers. I presume it will not be denied, that the steamers of the Collins line are as strongly built—as well built—as speedy and as effectual for purposes of war as any commercial steamers in the British marine. If you have the fact, then, of their actual employment, and conflicting opinions, is it wiser to take fact and opinion combined as the basis of your determination, or to rely on conjectural objections as to the impossibility of the use of these steamers in war? But there is much in the meaning of the term. If you mean by “adapted to the purposes of war,” that these steamers are not adapted to all the purposes of war, I admit that the objection of the honorable Senator from Virginia is unanswered; that is, when I say “all the purposes of war,” that they are unfit for a naval engagement in the line of a fleet or in single combat. But if you mean by the words, “adapted to the purposes of war,” that they are adapted to some of the uses and purposes of war, and can be made available as an auxiliary force in the support of your navy proper, in the event of a war, then I beg leave to differ from the conclusions which the Senator has drawn from the evidence before him. I have the facts with me as regards the state of things in India, in an expedition which has lately been sent from Bombay to Rangoon. I have at least equal weight of opinion for their availability for purposes of that sort—as dispatch vessels—as vessels for the transportation of troops; for take their speed, or their size, can you question their use in that respect? and are not such vessels adapted to purposes of war? But I go further. I cannot see why they should not be adapted to the purposes of cruisers. I will endeavor to illustrate my view in this respect.

You have speed in a side-wheel steamer, and in vessels of this particular line—and to them alone I confine my remarks, and to all such as are equivalent to them in speed and construction—you have extraordinary speed; a speed with which, (in their present state,) on the ocean, they can overtake any vessel which they pursue, and escape from any vessel which they wish to avoid. They are capable, as they stand now, of carrying a light armament, even without the alteration of cutting down the upper deck, which would be all-sufficient for the purpose of a cruiser in order to attack your enemy (if that enemy were Great Britain) in her most vital part—her commerce. They could sweep it from the face of the ocean; because no ship could escape them which was defenseless; and no ship with sufficient power to overcome, could overhail them.

But it may be said that, on account of the construction of these side-wheel steamers, they are unfit for cruisers, because they could not carry a sufficient supply of coal. It is not necessary that a side-wheel steamer should depend alone upon her coal. I ask you to take facts here again. Do not Senators bear in their recollection the fact, that in 1851 the Atlantic, leaving Liverpool in the month of December, one of the most tempestuous seasons of the year, and having crossed more than half the ocean, when eight days out broke her shaft? She was left then in the middle of the ocean with nothing but her sails to depend upon. After attempting to combat with adverse winds and reach America, she abandoned that on the 11th of January. She then returned towards England, and in eleven days crossed more than half the ocean under canvas alone, and that canvas but such as is usually carried by a ship of somewhat less than six hundred tons, whilst she was a ship of over three thousand two hundred. I ask you, Mr. President, to what are you to attribute that, but to the perfection of her model? I ask you if such a steamer, properly rigged and properly soared, could not go upon the ocean as a cruiser as successfully as your Saranacs and Susquehannas; and with a power and speed equal to sixteen miles an hour when using steam, and the capacity which she has exhibited with her limited amount of canvas which would give her a sailing power of great extent when ordinarily sparred, would she not be the very perfection of a cruiser in time of war? She can carry from twelve hundred to fourteen hundred tons of coal—a sufficient supply for at least eighteen days. In what requisite for a cruiser is she defective?

I know there are conflicting opinions in reference to the side-wheel steamer and the propeller; and if the question was one as to your Navy proper, and the true form of vessels to be constructed for the Navy proper, I assure the Senator from Virginia that he might command my vote upon such a question at all times; that I would vote for no appropriation for the construction of any but a screw-steamer, as applied to the Navy proper. But the reason of that is very obvious. We do not require extreme speed in a war steamer; and the difference between the two is, that in the side-wheel steamers you have speed; and with the propeller or screw-steamer you have economy and comparative invulnerability, but they want speed. That is the difference. As a cruiser, chasing the commerce of your enemy on the ocean, the exposure of such a vessel as the Atlantic amounts to nothing. From a man-of-war, she could escape by her speed; and those vessels which she desired to overtake, could not hope to escape. She could carry coal for eighteen days, and, with the capacity exhibited with a deficiency of canvas—that is, with one fifth what she ought to have to traverse the ocean, she returned at the rate of one hundred and fifty miles a day—her superiority cannot be doubted. The Atlantic then showed a capacity which would eminently fit her for the purpose of a cruiser. If that is so, she is certainly “adapted for the purposes of war;” though it may be, that such a vessel could not safely encounter, in a naval engagement, either a sailing frigate, or a screw-steamer, because she is more vulnerable. But the objection does not apply to this line. The objection would be well taken if applied to your Susquehanna, or even perhaps to your Mississippi. Those vessels may be more strongly built; but as to vulnerability—the danger of being disabled—they are in a very little better condition than any of the vessels of the Collins line. They are not equal to the Collins vessels in speed; that is certain. But when you come to the question of defense, you find that the machinery is not the principal part of these steamers which is exposed. The wheels are most exposed. If you cripple a wheel, the vessel is as effectually disabled as if you broke her machinery. The wheels are the most exposed portions; and that objection applies to the vessels which you have built solely for war purposes as much as to the Collins steamers.

Have I not a right, then, to say that one of these vessels is adapted to the purposes of war? But I will go further. I was speaking of her qualities as a cruiser. Allow me to bring before the Senate the evidence of a gentleman whose evidence has been referred to for another purpose by the honorable Senator from Virginia, and which I shall notice hereafter—an engineer in your Navy, Mr. Isherwood. I found on Saturday, in the “Journal of the Franklin Institute,” an account by this gentleman of the performance, dimensions, power, and character of the crack screw-steamer of the British Navy, the Arrogant. He gives the entire dimensions of the vessel, and a description of her boilers and of her whole machinery. He gives her working power; and afterwards, from her log, he gives her performances under all circumstances. What do you suppose is the result? Why, the speed of that vessel in smooth water and in calm weather was but 3.08 knots per hour. The same steamer working with full power, in very fair weather, in a smooth sea, with steam alone, was 5.08 knots—something short of six miles per hour. The Atlantic, under sails alone, in a disabled condition, and with all the embarrassments arising from her wheels, and with but one fifth of her proper canvas, exceeded that very much. This gentleman also gives the speed of the Arrogant steamer in coming from Gibraltar to Lisbon, with all her sails set under full power, and with a free wind; and it was but 10 knots an hour. One of Collins's steamers would run away from her.

The ordinary speed of the Collins steamers under steam is 14 knots an hour, and oftentimes 15. I speak of a fact of which I am personally cognizant. I timed them day after day for two voyages across the Atlantic, in the steamers Atlantic and Pacific. I speak of what I know with certainty. In an ordinary smooth sea, the common speed of these vessels under full, but not extraordinary pressure of steam, was 14 knots an hour. Is there no difference of comparison here in their favor? Then compare the power of these vessels as cruisers with this crack screw-steamer of the British Navy. The same account states that this screw-steamer can carry fuel for eight days in her bunkers. Shall I be told, then, that a vessel which can probably out-sail, with her sails alone, a screw-steamer using both her screw and her sails is not better adapted for cruising purposes? The best time of this crack screw-steamer, with both her sails and her steam power, was but 10½ knots, or about twelve miles per hour. The Atlantic made nine miles an hour with her sails alone, and with only one fifth of her proper canvas, and without a bowsprit.

Shall I be told, then, that a vessel capable of carrying eighteen days' fuel, instead of one capable of carrying only eight days' fuel—a vessel running at the rate of sixteen to eighteen miles an hour, while the other is capable of running at the rate of twelve miles only an hour, would not be invaluable as a cruiser? It might be, if those two vessels were to come into collision in single conflict, or in a fleet, the vulnerability of the one would render her more exposed than the other. The two vessels might not be equal for all the purposes of war; but for some of those purposes the swifter vessel would be essentially superior. Therefore, in my judgment, these steamers are within the declared purpose of your policy, and are adapted to the purposes of war.

This I judge to be the opinion of Commodore Perry. Nor is that opinion contradicted by the long array of evidence of British officers, brought forward by the honorable Senator from Virginia. They did not touch the question. They spoke of propellers, as compared with side-wheel steamers, for all naval uses. I concede that, for the purposes of the Navy proper, a propeller is the better of the two. With my consent, no future vessel shall be built for the Navy which is not modeled after the fashion of that steamer which was planned and constructed under the superintendence of my gallant and distinguished friend from New Jersey, [Mr. Stockton,] and which did such good service during the war with Mexico—of enlarged dimensions, if you will. As applied to the Navy, I believe such would be the best mode of construction; because, in the naval service, it is essential that a vessel should be able to enter into combat with any vessel of equal force. The pride and honor of the Navy demand this. The auxiliary power, in the contingency of war, that you would derive from the Collins steamers is, however, of immense importance in a country like ours. Notwithstanding the opinions cited by the Senator from Virginia, the Government of Great Britain has not abandoned her policy of aiding in the construction of mail steamers for traversing the ocean. She has extended it; and she has adhered, also, to the clause which requires them to be adapted to the purposes of war. That policy is a wise one, in my opinion. At least, it is but a matter of opinion and fact opposed against opinion, and the policy has been previously adopted by Congress.

The defect, then, in my judgment, of this objection is, that it assumes that these vessels are not available for the purposes of war, because they cannot be used for all the purposes of war. There can be no doubt as to their utility as an auxiliary force. I am not going to repeat all the evidence of this now. I need only refer to the statement of Commodore Perry. He is an officer of high character, and great professional knowledge. He superintended the construction of these vessels, in part. He gives you their dimensions, their strength, and their structure. He tells you that they can be made available for purposes of war, and he also tells you the mode in which that can be done. He gives the reasons why they can be made available. He gives you the cost at which it can be done, which is a mere trifle. You have a statement as to the time in which it can be done, from the evidence of the British experiment lately made in the East Indies, where such vessels were got ready for purposes of war in the short period of three days. Such a species of force is peculiarly necessary in a country like ours, in addition to your Navy proper. I have no hostility to the Navy proper. I would vote for appropriations to sustain it, entirely apart from these lines; but as an auxiliary force, I hold them to be of great importance, and to be available for war purposes in the contingency of a war. In this country, taking the character of our people and the character of our institutions, Senators cannot doubt that we shall never be thoroughly prepared for war, until it is actually upon us. Therefore, if the uses of these vessels should be but temporary, if they did but enable us to resist until we could buckle on our armor fully in the event of a war, I should still say that they were available for the purposes of war, and were worth the full extent of their cost to the nation.

I have compared these vessels to our war steamers proper. Will the Senator from Virginia tell me that the Susquehanna, the Mississippi, and the Saranac, all, I believe, side-wheel steamers, are not war steamers, and not "adapted for the purposes of war?" Where is the difference between their structure and that of these steamers? As I said before, it may be that the machinery of the Collins steamers is somewhat more exposed than the machinery of these frigates. It was mentioned that these frigates may be somewhat more strongly built; but the speed is with the Collins steamers, and as regards vulnerability, this defect in their structure for purposes of battle, for naval engagements, rests more in the exposure of the wheels, which are prominent objects—a defect common to both—than the exposure of the machinery. My information is, that even as regards the propeller, in scarcely a single case has one of them ever been constructed in which the entire machinery has been below the water line; and in no case is it so with a side-wheel steamer. I conclude, therefore, that the Collins steamers will answer for some of the purposes of war, and that they were built in pursuance of our policy, according to the terms of a contract made by our Executive Department, and sanctioned by that Department as suitable vessels, and those which were adapted to the purposes of war.

But the Senator from Virginia tells us that their capacity in this respect is all a humbug, and that as dispatch vessels, and as vessels for supplies, they might be useful, but that it would not be necessary to maintain them for these purposes, because we could always command vessels enough for these purposes from our commercial marine. Before this policy was adopted, how did our commercial marine stand as regards ocean steamers? Was there a single sea-going American steamer upon the ocean? Sir, the fate of the Home and the Pulaski, and the melancholy catastrophe which attended their destruction, will warn Senators of the necessity of the clause, "adapted to war purposes." It tends to give strength and security to these vessels. Then you have, in my view, the benefits of your policy fully developed in this line, which has been constructed under contract. Will you now abandon those who, in pursuance of that policy, have constructed these vessels, to a ruinous loss, arising out of their faithful adherence to their contract? Is that worthy of so great a nation as these United States?

Passing from this question—for I will not further enlarge upon it, as it would consume too much of the time of the Senate on a subject which has been already extensively discussed—I come to the use of these steamers for the purposes of the transportation of the mail. That is the prolonged use—that is the principal use to which they were intended to be applied at the time you authorized their construction. I come to the question of their use in the postal service of the country, because your policy had a double object. It was not for war purposes alone that you built these steamers. You contemplated the contingency of war; but the principal object was their utility during the continuance of peace, for the transportation of the mails; and for that purpose their utility is not questioned, and it is unquestionable. The mail service in this, and in all countries, on land, is a Government duty, and with all great maritime nations which have the power to control that service on the ocean, it is as much a Government duty, where their maritime interests are concerned, where their extensive commerce is concerned, as is on land the proper transportation of correspondence. The mail service with foreign countries, on any principle that I can appreciate, is as much a governmental duty, and demands as much the expenditure and the attention of the Government as the transportation of correspondence in the interior of the country. This I suppose to be the principal object of your policy. Certainty and speed are essential to the transportation of the mails. It cannot be doubted, then, that these vessels are fit for the service. Compare the propellers with the side-wheel steamers, and what is the result of the comparison, reasoning not upon opinion but upon fact? It has been tried over and over again. The average voyage of a propeller (and there have been some very fine ones built in England, and some here) is from eighteen to twenty days between this country and England; and the average voyage of a side-wheel steamer, taking the Collins line, or the Cunard line, is from eleven to twelve days—a difference of nearly one half. Does the Senator suppose that a vessel which could by one half less time traverse the ocean, would not command the entire transportation of letters and passengers to the exclusion of a vessel which dragged after her at the rate of two days for one? The argument need hardly be urged in that point of view.

But let me compare for a moment the system which you have adopted on land and on sea; for the duty is the same, as regards the transportation of your mails, whether on land or at sea; whether on the waters of the interior, on land in the interior, or on the ocean. The transportation of the mails is a Government duty. On land, what is your system? Where your post offices are located between points sparsely populated, and there is no sufficient travel to justify an expenditure for transportation in post-coaches, you adopt transportation on horseback; and in that event the entire cost of transportation, as well as the profit of the carrier, must be paid by the Government. Wherever population is sufficiently dense, and your communication is of sufficient importance, then to save yourselves expense in the performance of an avowed duty of the Government, you employ post-coaches, and you pay them such reasonable compensation as, in addition to the emoluments the contractors may derive from passengers, will enable them to transport your mails. Post-coaches are not used for the transportation of the mails alone, but also for the transportation of passengers. Your object in this mode of transporting the mails is to save expense to the Government; and there is no other object whatever. Distinguish it if you can, in principle, from the application of it on a larger scale, to the payment of a line of ocean steamers for the purpose of transporting your mails across the ocean—a line which could not exist, from its costliness, unless the Government aided in its establishment.

It has been objected that these grants create a monopoly. That was the argument of the honorable Senator from Virginia, though he did not much enlarge upon it. It has been repeated to the Senate to-day more than once, by the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] who last addressed you. If the argument be true, I ask you if it does not apply with equal force to the transportation of your mails on the land? I ask you if, when you give a contract for $3,000 a year to a line of post-coaches, you do not, on the same principle, create a monopoly on the part of the contractors for that line, and prevent others running in opposition to them between the same points? Then, the whole Government action is a series of monopolies as regards the post office service. That is the answer to the argument. But the argument itself comes too late. The objection of monopoly, if true, existed as strongly when the policy was adopted in 1847, which authorized the erection of the steamers, as it does now, and it would be gross injustice, and that species of fickleness which is disgraceful to a nation, if, having adopted that policy, and having involved individual capital and individual fortune under your own action, you should recklessly abandon them to destruction, because you choose now to raise the cry of monopoly.

But, Mr. President, this is no monopoly in any sense of the term. The business of transportation between Europe and America was a monopoly before the Collins line was established. That is a line established by the American Government to encourage and sustain American competition for the purpose of destroying a British monopoly; and on that ground alone, if no other, this appropriation should be made. Gentlemen can neither evade nor deny this answer to their allegation of monopoly. Anterior to the establishment of this line, the Cunard line controlled the entire postal service between England and the United States, and you may say between Europe and the United States. Since this Government authorized the construction of the Collins line, we have gone far in the competition, and ultimately we will divide the receipts. Is that the establishment of a monopoly? or is it not that you aid American enterprise and American skill in a very costly undertaking with a view to break down a British monopoly. The answer, to my mind, is conclusive. The cry of monopoly can have no rational weight as an objection to this appropriation. I repeat, that if it be a monopoly, your whole postal service system is a monopoly; and that this is peculiarly free from such an objection, because the line cannot exist without Government, and by its establishment you broke down the monopoly which had existed on the part of Great Britain anterior to its establishment. Abandon these steamers now, and you give to Great Britain the entire control of your postal service on the ocean between Europe and America; and you give to her, further, all the passengers, except the emigrants, and a very large share of the freight on light and costly goods.

This does not depend upon opinion. Facts establish it conclusively. Cunard established his line in 1839. At that time the Great Western was running as a private vessel across the ocean. It had commenced the business to New York before him. The Cunard line ran to Boston. The ships of that line were not superior in any respect to the Great Western, which, after an ineffectual contest, was obliged to draw off, because the business would not support it. The British Queen and the President were then established by a British company, running between New York and Bristol, I believe, the Cunard line still running to Boston, which certainly, as a commercial place, has no equality with New York. The President was lost in the depths of the ocean. The British Queen, after a serious loss in the business, was obliged to withdraw, and was sold, I believe, to one of the continental Powers. The Great Britain, a screw-steamer, attempted the same thing; but it is perfectly well known that her losses of capital were very serious during the time she was engaged in the trade. I hold it, therefore, to be certain, that if you abandon this line for want of governmental aid and support, it must go down, and you do, by that act, abandon to Great Britain the entire transportation of the mails across the ocean between Great Britain and America. You abandon to Great Britain the entire transportation of passengers, except emigrants, between England and America, and the great part of the Continent and America, and abandon a very valuable and costly freight, which would otherwise be beneficial to American citizens.

Sir, no American citizen ventured in the lapse of ten years to enter into this business in opposition to the Cunard line. They could not contend with a line which was sustained by the Treasury of Great Britain, when they knew that that line was established by a Government which gave its allowances according to the exigencies of the case, and which, if the allowance was not sufficient, would instantly increase it, in order to establish her commercial policy, and in order to maintain such a line as would aid in giving her the controlling power in reference to the commerce of the world. But the Senator from Virginia said:

"Does any man suppose that, if we were to advertise and dispense with the unnecessary clause in relation to war purposes we would not have ships of our own that could be made suitable for carrying the mail, and suitable for commercial purposes?"

This is but an opinion, and, I confess, one to which I cannot assent. Security and confidence in the strength of a vessel are always great essentials in the carriage of passengers; and most surely these vessels would all be built stronger in consequence of the war clause. Mr. Livingston, in his remarks, to which the honorable Senator from Virginia referred, says, that in consequence of this war clause, the cost of the construction of the steamers was $200,000 more. I ask you if these steamers are not infinitely stronger when built under such a clause, and with such additional expenditure, than when built otherwise? The cost adds to their security. You must pay for such vessels as you employ in the mail service, whether you employ fragile or substantial vessels; whether your policy be to uphold vessels which could be made available for purposes of war, and which would give security to life during peace, or you disregard both these purposes, you must still pay for them. The question is merely a question of amount, as to what you shall pay for the transportation of the mails over the ocean. For my own part, I shall place the safety of a single vessel, containing one hundred American lives, if preserved by this clause, above the entire sum which you have to pay for the transportation of the mails in these steamers.

But, sir, the honorable Senator from Virginia used an argument which, I believe, was repeated to-day, by the honorable Senator from Ohio, that this line either pays, or it does not pay; and that if it does not pay, and if Great Britain chooses to be foolish enough to transport your mails at a loss to herself, let her do so; for it would be no injury to you. I think this argument is what we lawyers would call a non sequitur. It may be perfectly true, that while Great Britain enjoys a monopoly in the transportation of mails and passengers between Europe and America, a line would pay, both to her and the contractors; but when you establish a rival line, by the aid of the Government, it may also well be, that it would not be profitable to her, because the business would be divided. Shall we weigh $300,000, or $500,000, the excess of cost over postages, in comparison with a surrender to our great commercial rival of a business which is profitable so long as she has the monopoly of it, and which enables her to transport the entire trans-Atlantic mails, and thus places them under her control? I believe the British Post Office have not always been remarkably scrupulous in reference to the inviolability of mails in their own country, and I know of no reason to suppose that they would be more abstinent in reference to mails within their custody on the ocean. Will you adopt a policy which will place the entire transportation of your mails under their control; which will put into their hands the transportation of passengers; which will lay a tax on American citizens for the advancement of British commerce, by giving them the freight of light and costly goods between the principal sea-port of your country, and the principal sea-port of England? Will you do all this for the sake of saving from $300,000 to $500,000 a year? Such may be the judgment of the honorable Senator from Ohio, but it is not mine, and I trust it will not be that of the American Senate.

As to free competition, it is out of the question, as long as Great Britain makes advances and sustains, by her Treasury, her Cunard line. Our propellers may run, but will our propellers, with a speed of one half that of the side-wheel steamers, carry passengers, or will they carry the mails? No man acquainted with commercial correspondence, or the habits of commercial people, can, for a moment, hesitate as to that. They may attempt it for a time; but they must ultimately give way to the superior advantages arising from speed and certainty, such as have been exhibited either by the Cunard line or the Collins line.

To defeat this appropriation, the honorable Senator from Virginia also throws in this further objection. By a comparison of the postage, made from the month of April, 1850, I think to December, 1851, he exhibited the receipts from the Collins line, in order to show the great extent of cost which it was to the country. I submit—though it is not very material to my views of this question—that the honorable Senator hardly makes a fair comparison in such a case. This line commenced in April, 1850, and had but two ships; they ran at irregular periods—at no stated days. The line was not in full operation till the month of November, 1850. Then the receipts would not afford a just inference as to future receipts, except for a single year, up to the time the returns were stated to be made.

Mr. HUNTER. The Senator is mistaken as to the period. I took the period given at the Post Office Department, which was nearly two years.

Mr. BAYARD. I am perfectly aware that the intention of the honorable Senator was not to make an unfair comparison. What I mean by "unfair" is, that the comparison is not a just one, for the purpose of ascertaining the probable future receipts from the Collins line.

Mr. HUNTER. The period to which the statement went was up to the 31st of March, 1852.

Mr. BAYARD. Conceding the fact to be so, still these vessels ran from the 27th April, 1850, down to the month of November, for which time the honorable Senator includes the receipts of postage. Now, during that time but two vessels were on the line. They ran at irregular intervals. They were bound to run twice a month, but there was no regularity then, as in the case of the Cunard steamers which ran every week during eight months in the year. Does any gentleman suppose that with an old line established, for ten years, the commercial community would abandon a regular line of postal communication, for the uncertain days at which these two steamers were then running, and that, too, when their merits had not been tested upon the ocean so as to give confidence in the certainty and celerity of their voyages? But again, there were other difficulties, as regards the transportation of the mail by the Collins steamers, which should be considered in reference to the account of the anterior postages, if any inference is to be drawn from them as to what will be the amount of postage for the future. You may not, it is true, receive hereafter an amount of postage sufficient to reimburse your existing allowance to this line of steamers, but I contend that no fair calculation of your receipts for the future can be based upon the previous receipts of postage from the Collins line. After the steamers of the American line were started in the year 1850, so much importance did the British Government attach to the mail system—so much were they opposed to the American line, so much were they determined to destroy it if they could, that a Post Office order was issued, by which they gave notice to the world that every sea letter mailed in Great Britain, which was not indorsed with the specific name of the United States steamer by which it was to be sent, though mailed before the sailing of the American steamer, would be retained until the sailing of the subsequent Cunarder. They adhered to this—after remonstrance by our Government—until they were threatened that the postal treaty would be abandoned if they did not abrogate that order, and they ultimately yielded. This is not all, as to the unfair course which was taken by the Government of Great Britain, in order to prevent the transportation of the mails by the Collins line. Under the postal treaty, France was not included; and on a letter sent from the United States which would be prepaid to the amount of twenty-one cents, that is, five cents for American postage, and sixteen cents for sea postage, the British Government, down to May, 1851, charged sixteen cents additional sea postage, as well as transit postage for transmitting it to France; in other words, a letter going to France from the United States by a Collins line steamer paid precisely double the sea postage of a letter going to France by a Cunard steamer. This course was persisted in down to May, 1851. Again, as regards the transit duty, Great Britain still retains for that duty from twenty-four to forty cents an ounce, for letters sent by our line to the continent and to France. We charge her twelve and a half cents an ounce on closed mails sent from New York to Canada. She charges twenty-four cents an ounce on all letters sent to France, and from that up to forty cents an ounce on letters sent to the Continent.

With these obstacles on the part of the British Government—with this disposition manifested by that Government—is it wonderful that with a line which was not fully organized until the commencement of 1851, you should not have had returns of postage equivalent to what you may expect when that line has evinced its superiority of speed and certainty of passage, and has become by our aid certainly and permanently established? The Postmaster General, at the commencement of the present session of Congress, recommended to our serious consideration the propriety of putting an end to the postal treaty, unless Great Britain should recede from her system, by which she charges twenty-four cents transit duty on letters going to France and the Continent of Europe. I understand this morning from him, that the probabilities now are, that she will recede, and will accept a transit duty of twelve and a half cents, which is the sum she pays to us on closed mails from New York to Canada; and that such a treaty will probably be negotiated. But this difficulty has heretofore existed, and has afforded a sufficient reason why, in an estimate of the amount of the postage hereafter to be received, you cannot safely and fairly resort to that which has been hitherto received. I cannot doubt, when this line is established alternating with the Cunard line between New York and Liverpool, that at least one half, if not more, of the postage between the two countries will come into the Treasury of this Government.

There is another exception which was urged by the honorable Senator from Virginia, and that is, that this amendment embodies in it some of the worst features of the protective system; and he instances, in support of this objection, as a fact, that certain iron-masters of Pennsylvania, who came here this winter for the purpose of claiming an increased duty upon iron, represented to him, as one of their difficulties, in consequence of which they required protection, that these steamers brought over large quantities of iron in ballast. That has been denied by a Senator on this floor. I think there is an error as regards the fact. I do know—for to my misfortune, though I never was an iron-master myself, I had those intimately connected with me who were engaged in that business—that long anterior to the establishment of this line of steamers, it was a common complaint that transport vessels, passenger vessels, from Scotland, from Wales from Liverpool, brought over iron in ballast, at little or no cost, or that the freights were so small that the American iron-masters could not compete with them, when they brought their iron from the interior of the country to the sea-board. I have never yet understood that that objection applied to these steamers. At all events, the evil existed before to just as great an extent, and did not arise out of this system. But I mean to express no opinion now on the propriety or expediency of increasing the duty on iron, either one way or the other, but I do say, that if it is to be increased it must be from considerations totally different from those which apply to the present appropriation.

It is not a parallel case to say that the iron interest is depressed by the capital and wealth of Great Britain, and therefore ought to be protected. That cannot be compared with the case of the Collins line, which asks an increased allowance from you, based upon the fact of the direct action of the British Government, in support of their line. The British line stands sustained by the treasury of Great Britain. If gentlemen will show me that the iron interest, or any manufacturing interest, or any other interest in this country, is affected by the governmental support of a conflicting interest in another country, I will agree to go to any extent in countervailing that. I will give to the honorable Senator a parallel case, in my judgment: Suppose the Government of Great Britain were to grant a bounty of £5 per ton, or any other sum you please, on iron exported to the United States, I ask that honorable Senator if he or any other man on this floor would count the cost of countervailing that? Would he not impose a corresponding tax on British iron, for the purpose of shielding American industry from the direct action of the British Government? Sir, this is an exceptional case. The very basis on which it stands makes it entirely defensible.

Mr. President, free trade, even by those who advocate it to the utmost extent, must be founded upon the doctrine of reciprocity. Reciprocity is the doctrine of our Government. It is true, that foreign Governments may force you, by their action, into a course of policy which, if they abstained from action, would be unwise on our part. I am willing to trust American skill and American industry in competition with any people on the globe, when they stand nation opposed to nation, without governmental interference. But if the treasury of a foreign nation is poured into the laps of individuals for the purpose of destroying either the iron interest of my country, or for the purpose of building up a commercial marine at the expense of the commerce and prosperity of the United States, I, for one, will count no cost in countervailing such governmental action on the part of Great Britain, or any other foreign power. This is a case, therefore, of the direct application of the funds of the British nation in sustaining their line, which makes it exceptional to the general rule which the honorable Senator from Virginia advocated, and in which I mainly agree with him. This line stands in a different position from others; and in the vote which I shall give in reference to this appropriation, I do not commit myself to an appropriation for any other line, unless it can be brought within similar circumstances and is affected by similar causes.

There is yet another objection on the part of the distinguished Senator from Virginia, that the effect of this grant is to build up New York to an extent which is invidious and wrong. He spoke of other parts of the country, and said if you made this grant to New York, it would be your duty to make grants for lines from other cities in the Union. Sir, I cannot so view this appropriation. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. Cass] has fully answered this point. The reason why you make this grant to a line from New York results from her locality. New York is the great center of your commerce. Two thirds of it is concentrated there. She is connected with the great center of European commerce—Liverpool. This line runs from the one place to the other. In my judgment, the principle upon which your mail facilities must be granted is, the wants of the community and the course of your commerce. As a general rule, correspondence and travel will follow in the pathway of commerce. I hold, therefore, that this grant is not founded upon any peculiar favor to New York, but is given to her because of her local position, and for the benefit of the interests of the whole Union. The foreign commercial interests of the United States are concentrated at New York. Necessity, therefore, requires that you should establish a commercial line of steamers in connection with that great point of your foreign commerce. Hence I conclude that this line ought to be sustained.

The next question is as to the extent of compensation which is necessary for that purpose. The owners of the line have proved to you, by the oath of an indifferent person, that is an uninterested person, that the average annual amount of their expenses exceeded the amount of their receipts from all sources by nearly $17,000 a voyage. It is said that this testimony is ex parte. Why, that is a strange objection to be heard in this Chamber, when there is not a claim which you pass upon which is not founded purely upon ex parte testimony, and testimony, allow me to say, of the loosest character. You have here a detailed statement of the items of cost, taken from the books of this company, sworn to by an uninterested party, showing exactly the amount of their loss. What is the reply to that? The honorable Senator from Virginia tells you that he has had a conjectural statement made by a young gentleman of talents and promise, who is an engineer in the Navy, and that his statement shows that $300,000 a year ought to cover the running expenses of these vessels; and he goes on to argue upon that basis to show that the extent of the proposed grant would be entirely beyond what ought to be paid by the Government, and that no further extension of aid was necessary to sustain this line. But if the basis of the calculation be wrong, the calculation itself, of course, cannot be right.

Would the honorable Senator oppose a conjectural statement, of which not even the items are given, made out by an individual, who, however talented he may be, can have no particular knowledge of all the expenses incident to a sea-going line of steamers between New York and Liverpool; the dock charges; the extent of the supplies necessary for passengers, and all the incidental expenses of vessels of such a size, in which he may have never traveled, and as to which he can have no practical knowledge, to a statement which gives us the details of actual expenditures? Are we to take an estimate, a mere estimate in gross, without knowing what items enter into the calculation? Are we to take a conjectural estimate, which places the cost of running these vessels at $300,000, in opposition to the actual expenditures proved by the oath of an uninterested party?

But there is another answer to this species of evidence. You have facts sworn to on the one side; and you have a conjectural estimate, without items, on the other side. You have also the fact that the owners of this line, anterior to its establishment, had been successful merchants in the city of New York, as ship-owners; that Mr. Collins conducted a packet line in New York, with skill and success, for years anterior to his embarking in this business. You have the further fact, that there could be no motive for making the expenditures lavish and unnecessary, with a view to contingent chances of a successful claim upon the bounty of Congress for an enlarged appropriation. It is vain to suppose that such a motive could have entered into the minds of rational men. When you take these undeniable facts connected with the matters sworn to by a disinterested witness, taken from the books of the company, on what ground is it that you can rely upon conjecture, as opposed to facts so supported?

But the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Underwood] makes an estimate against these facts also, not in order to show that these expenses have not been incurred, but to show that they have been improvidently incurred. His estimate excludes almost all the important items; and because he, as well as I, are both ignorant of the subject, he draws inferences against the expenditures. Now, I should suppose that the former management of these parties in the business in which they were previously engaged, the want of motive on their part for an extravagant expenditure, and the general character of the contractors, may well rebut the inferences of the honorable Senator from Kentucky. The honorable Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. Jones,] will not go beyond $25,000 a voyage, because, he says, that is larger than the allowance which the British Government makes to the Cunard line. Allow me to remark, that the allowance by the British Government is no criterion for us; but if you will take the example of England, take the whole of her example. Cunard established his line in 1839. At that time the rate of compensation allowed him by the British Government was £65,000 or $325,000; and after a short time the expenses of the undertaking were so heavy in proportion to the receipts, that he suspended payment. The British Government did not then abandon him, but they advanced his compensation to $425,000 a year; and in pursuance of their policy, when we determined to establish a line between New York and Liverpool, (for they had no line running there previously,) they doubled the grant to Cunard in order to enable him to establish a rival line. They have gone on and encouraged that line by appropriations sufficient to sustain and enlarge it.

I have said that the amount which they allowed, is no criterion for the allowance which should be made by us. Let me point out here what I consider an error in one of the calculations of the honorable Senator from Virginia, as it affects in part, the argument of the honorable Senator from Tennessee, inasmuch as it shows that the allowance to the Cunard line is greater than is supposed even on the admitted facts. The honorable Senator from Virginia says, that the allowance per trip, or voyage, to the Cunard line, at £145,000 per annum, is $14,000 a voyage. Now, I make it $16,354 a voyage. The basis of that calculation, I will state, and if there be error it, the Senator can point it out. Taking £145,000 sterling, which was the sum paid to Cunard anterior to his being ordered up to weekly trips, it would amount to $703,000, computing the pound sterling at $4 85, which is about the average rate of exchanges. The variance, however, can be very little, whether you take it at $4 80 or $4 85 to the pound. The reduction of the pound sterling to dollars at these different rates produces the difference between the statement which we have heard, of $696,000 and $703,000. If we divide $703,000 by forty-three, the number of trips which the Cunard line were bound to perform before they were ordered up to fifty-two trips, and it gives $16,354 per trip.

Mr. HUNTER. The Senator will perceive that he is bringing up the old difficulty, as to whether the compensation is £170,000 odd, or £145,000. The statement of £145,000, or $696,000, was the statement emanating from the Post Office Department, and furnished by the chairman of the Post Office Committee. I took his statement in preference to the one which was made upon a supposition. Now, according to the last accounts we received, the Cunarders were ordered up to fifty-two trips a year. Well, fifty-two trips at $696,000 would give something less than $14,000 a trip; but it is now stated that, owing to the fact that they had been ordered up to fifty-two trips, they had already had a pro rata increase, making the compensation £179,000. Even taking that statement, it leaves but a little over $16,000 a trip.

Mr. BAYARD. I concede that if you divide £145,000 by fifty-two trips, it will only give about $14,000 a trip; but what warrant have we for the assumption that they only receive £145,000 since they have been ordered up to fifty-two trips? The papers show, and the British Admiralty accounts show, that when the contract was for weekly trips during eight months in the year, and semi-monthly trips during the remaining four months, they received £145,000.

Mr. HUNTER. There was evidence in the Post Office Department that the Cunarders had been ordered up to fifty-two trips, but there was no evidence that there was any increased compensation for those trips.

Mr. BAYARD. The learned Senator then presumes that, because there was no evidence in the Post Office Department that the increased compensation had been made, (and it is a matter which will not be ascertained until the Admiralty reports are published,) it was not to be inferred that when the Cunard line were ordered up to fifty-two trips, their allowance was not increased. Is it reasonable to suppose so? Such has not been hitherto the course of the British Government. The British Government assisted the Cunard line when there was no opposition to it, and raised its compensation from $325,000 to $425,000 a year. Afterwards they raised the compensation to £145,000, when they required increased service. Then by what reasonable conclusion can the Senator deduce his argument, that when they ordered up the Cunarders from forty-three to fifty-two trips, they did not also give a pro rata increase in the compensation?

Mr. HUNTER. This is no inference of mine. I have given the facts as far as they are known. I can reason upon no imaginary statement of facts in opposition to what is known. The Senator infers that the compensation has been increased. In my argument I have given this line the benefit of this supposition; and if you assume that the Cunarders now receive £175,000, their compensation will still be but $16,000 a trip. If you assume the old compensation, (and there is no evidence that it has been changed,) it leaves $14,000 a trip; and both sums are far under what we already give to the Collins line.

Mr. BAYARD. I concede that it is a statement of facts, so far as the alteration of the service goes; but there is no statement of fact to warrant the presumption that the compensation was not increased commensurately with the increase of the service. But the natural inference from one fact to the other would be that the compensation was increased, arguing from the previous conduct of the British Government. I shall, therefore, still contend that, upon the facts cited by the honorable Senator from Virginia, he ought to have drawn the conclusion as an inference of fact that an increased allowance was made, commensurate with the increased service to be performed. Whether the fact had come to the knowledge of the Department or not is of no moment. It is not, at any rate, a matter of much consequence, except as affecting the question of relative amount, and in my view, as I have already stated, that is no criterion for us. But, in truth, you cannot tell what is now allowed by the British Government to the Cunard line. Do you know what is allowed for the line which they have established from Havre to Liverpool, which carries goods without charge at the time when a Cunard vessel is about to sail from Liverpool and an American steamer from Havre, until the American steamer has left the port of Havre, and then charges freight and raises the price across the ocean more than double? Can you tell what allowance is made to the Cunard line by the British Admiralty for this purpose? Can you tell what allowance is made for the Antwerp line, which has been just established in connection with the Cunard line, in order to break down your commercial intercourse across the Atlantic with the continent of Europe? The difference between the modes of transacting business in the two countries is, that in England all those allowances are a matter of Admiralty discretion. They require no legislative discussion, as they do here, and are not brought before the public. The Admiralty, at their will and pleasure, allow such amounts as they may deem proper. The allowance may be made in the name of one man or another. We have seen enough, in the course which the British Government has taken for the purpose of breaking down the Collins line, to justify us in the belief that they will not be very restrictive in the extent of the grant they would make for the purpose of destroying a rival line. They have already consented to, if not advised subsidiary, lines, which tend to diminish the receipts from freight and passengers of the Collins and the Havre lines. There it is not a matter of parliamentary discussion. You do not know but that the sum granted to-day will be increased by one third more to-morrow. Their alleged allowance, therefore, affords no criterion for that which we should make.

There are also two elements for increased allowance in this case, which do not exist in reference to the Cunard line. The first I presume will be admitted—that there is an increased tonnage and an increased power to propel the tonnage, which is essential to the Collins line; and that increase of tonnage and of power, and consequent expense was incurred in order to enable them to surpass the British line upon the ocean. The boat race, as the honorable Senator from Ohio chooses to call it, was not with a view to a mere exhibition of national vanity; for he may rely upon it that speed and certainty in ocean transit will command the mails and passengers between Europe and America. It is no trivial matter, such as he seeks to represent it. You have the fact that the entire tonnage, according to the British system of measurement, of the seven Cunard steamers is 13,286 tons, while the tonnage of the four American steamers, according to the same measurement, is 13,702, an excess of over 400 tons on the part of the four American steamers.

Mr. HUNTER. That is very different from the statement which I have received from the Navy Department.

Mr. BAYARD. It may be so; but my information is totally different. My information is, that our system of tonnage measurement increases nearly one fourth upon that of Great Britain. Our steamers do not rate by our tonnage as much as they do by British tonnage. The Pacific and Baltic are, I believe, according to our tonnage, over 2,700 tons; the Arctic and Atlantic are, I believe, 2,800 tons. Their average tonnage, according to British measurement, would be 3,425 tons.

Mr. HUNTER. My statement was made out by Mr. Isherwood. He puts the Collins steamers in this way: the Atlantic and Pacific 2,686 tons each; the Arctic and Baltic 2,772 tons each. The two largest of the Cunarders, the Asia and Africa, he puts at 2,226 tons each; and he informed me that including the Canada, there were eight Cunarders, and their average was a little over 2,000 tons. Therefore, the aggregate tonnage of the Cunarders would be something like 16,000 tons, whilst the aggregate tonnage of the four Collins steamers would be only about 11,000 tons.

Mr. BAYARD. I will state to the honorable Senator that, as regards the registered tonnage of our own steamers, there is an error in that calculation from whoever it comes. It will be found to be so, by reference to the published reports from the Navy Department. Commodore Perry's letter [Ex. Doc. No. 91, p. 83] gives you the registered tonnage of the four steamers; the Atlantic is over 2,845, the Arctic 2,856, the Pacific 2,707, and the Baltic 2,727 tons. I am sure of the fact that the Atlantic and Arctic are over 2,800—that is American tonnage. It must be recollected that there is a difference between American and British tonnage.

Mr. HUNTER. In this account, Mr. Isherwood also states, that the average time of the trips of the Collins line is about eleven days and seventeen hours, and of the Cunarders, twelve days. The average for the Cunarders includes the Europa and Canada; but if you take the average of the Asia and Africa alone, they are about equal to the Collins average.

Mr. BAYARD. I am not discussing the question of average time. I know that the Asia and Africa of the Cunard line, are nearly equal to the average of the Collins line. But you must take the average of the two lines together. I do not understand that communication to say that the tonnage stated is registered tonnage; if it does so, then I deny its authenticity. I deny that the registered British tonnage, and the registered American tonnage, are the same. In the one case, you have given you the British registered tonnage for the British vessels, and the statement of American tonnage for American vessels, when, in point of fact, the American tonnage is one fourth greater. I repeat the assertion that, measured according to the British system of measurement, there is a difference of over four hundred tons in favor of the four Collins steamers, as against the seven Cunard steamers; nor are there more than seven steamers in that line, including the Canada. I say, therefore, that the aggregate tonnage of the seven Cunard steamers amounts to 13,286 tons, while the tonnage of the four Collins steamers, according to the same system of British measurement, is 13,702 tons. No man, in his senses, who ever saw the Asia and one of our steamers alongside, can doubt that ours are one third larger, measure them by what system you will.

I submit, therefore, that the average tonnage, which, in the case of the Collins line, is 3,425 tons, against 1,900 on the part of the Cunard steamers, must necessarily have increased power to propel it. With this increased power the Collins steamers have obtained superior speed, for though it may be true that the Asia and Africa approximate very closely to the average time of the Collins steamers, and I admit that they do, yet, taking the average of the British line, they are excelled by at least a day in speed by the Collins line. If we have equaled them in this respect, we have done all that we could expect, and what few men thought could be done at the time this enterprise was entered upon by these gentlemen in New York. Failure was prophesied almost universally. The idea of competing with Great Britain in the construction of steam-vessels which should be able to cross the ocean with speed and certainty was considered a mad scheme. Instead of equaling, they have actually excelled the Cunard steamers. The quantum of excellence is a very material matter in this point of view. It is more creditable than the honorable Senator from Virginia seems willing to allow to the enterprise, and genius, and patriotic exertions of his countrymen.

There is another element which must also be taken into the account, for the increased cost of these vessels. I am not going into any details about the question of cost, for it is one which I cannot undertake to determine. The rate of interest in the two countries is essentially different. When the British Government are dealing with capitalists in their country, where capital commands but two and a half per cent. interest, and for the purpose of inducing them to enter into a new and untried business, which is to be of great advantage, both as regards commerce and the national pride, and when the American Government are entering into a similar contract with a capitalist here, and that, too, against previously established and successful lines, the rate of interest here being six per cent. instead of two and a half, I ask whether, in the allowance which ought to be made by this Government to the American line of steamers, that is not an element to be taken into the account, with a view to its increase? I will now state to you a view which I have taken, of a calculation which was brought as evidence before the Senate, by the honorable Senator from Virginia, which, I think, corroborates strikingly the amount recommended by the Committee on Finance as a proper appropriation; and the amount sworn to as a necessary appropriation, by these contractors. I refer to the statement of Mr. Williams, manager of the Dublin Steam-Packet Company, cited by the honorable Senator from Virginia. The estimate of Mr. Williams, I shall show, conforms to the statement made out in detail by the owners of the Collins line. The Senator produces this testimony here, for the purpose of throwing doubt upon the propriety of this appropriation. Surely, I am entitled to have the benefit of his information in favor of its being granted. Mr. Williams was a competent person to judge of the expenses of such an undertaking. He was the manager of the Dublin Steam-Packet Company; and, therefore, better acquainted than the honorable Senator from Virginia or myself, with all the details connected with the management of steam-vessels. He was a man who had been practically engaged in the business, and who knew the average cost of sustaining a line of sea-going steamers. He was under examination by a parliamentary committee, and his statement is, that the average sum necessary to carry on a fair business, is from twenty-four to twenty-five per cent. per annum upon the capital invested. This is exclusive of the amount of running expenses. So the Senator from Virginia admits, and so the rest of his testimony shows. This gentleman then goes on to estimate the items that are always counted amongst business men, for the purpose of ascertaining the cost and probable success of the business. Let us compare his estimates with the statement here, and see if it does not corroborate it. This gentleman states:

"We calculate eight per cent., at least, for maintenance; that is, the ordinary price for keeping the vessel always up in the most perfect order; keep her in running condition for business. Some companies consider it should be ten per cent.; we have found eight is sufficient. I should say the insurance alone would be five per cent., and there is the depreciation, which would require at least four, six, or seven per cent.—say, four per cent. at the lowest—the fund for replacing the vessel, and six per cent. profit."

I will now take the sworn statement of these individuals as to the items, about which there is no room for mistake, or miscalculation—I mean the ordinary and running expenses of the vessels. They are proved to us, in a detailed statement, sworn to by the secretary of the company, who says he has no interest in it. The wages of the crew amount to $3,845 64 per trip. Fuel is $8,612 28 per trip. The ordinary expense of passengers' provisions, port charges, and so forth, are $12,762 73. These three items alone constitute what may properly be called, the running expenses of the vessel; and they amount to $30,220 65. The average receipts per voyage, from passengers and freight, amount to $29,036 85, thus leaving an average on twenty-six trips of $1,183 80 lost on each trip, irrespective of what they receive from the Government—irrespective of the twenty-five per cent. which Mr. Williams says is required. The capital employed is about $3,000,000 in round numbers; twenty-five per cent. on that would amount to $750,000. Add that to the $1,183 80 for each of the twenty-six trips, which amounts to $30,778 80, and you have $750,778 80 as the sum which an intelligent, thoroughly-informed, and practical man, says is necessary to enable any line of steamers to do a fair business; and on this but six per cent. profit, mere legal interest, is allowed.

It must be remembered, too, that he was stating the expenditure for a company running their steamers between Dublin and Liverpool, where they were not exposed to the dangers of a voyage across the Atlantic, and therefore did not require the same allowance for wear and tear. Calculating from this, and the estimate approximates within two and a half per cent. with the amount, which it is proved under oath here, that this Collins line have actually expended. Is it not then corroborative of their statement?

I will go further. I will take the other items in order to show what is necessary. The manager of the Dublin Steam Packet Company estimates from eight to ten per cent. for the purpose of keeping the vessels in running order. He allows five per cent. insurance. In this country, it is six per cent. Adding the ten per cent. to six per cent., we have sixteen per cent. Then allowing six per cent. for profit—either as profit or interest, whichever you choose—and we have twenty-two per cent. Then comes the other item of deficiency; that is to say, five per cent. renovation. That makes twenty-seven per cent. on the cost of the vessel independent of the running expenses. Add the twenty-seven per cent. to the running expenses, and you reach the full amount which these parties say they must have in order to enable them to sustain this line. Is not this corroborative testimony of the highest kind? It is given by a man familiar with steam operations—with the conduct of business of this kind. It is given without relation to this appropriation; and he proves to you the average amount which must be earned, over and above the running expenses. That average amount shows that these contractors must have hitherto sustained a heavy loss compared with their receipts from all sources; and that the sum now asked for is not more in addition to what they now receive than is equivalent to give them barely six per cent. interest on their money invested. I say, then, that the Senator's own evidence is strongly corroborative of the propriety of making this appropriation.

But there is an amendment which has been passed by the Senate which prevents the possibility of anything like an exaggerated appropriation. By that amendment, you authorize Congress, at their discretion, to withdraw this increased allowance at any time after December, 1854. If the Senate desire to investigate the future receipts of the line, they have the right to order it to be done. If you find the compensation to be too great in the next two years, you have the power to withdraw the increase. The power to determine the allowance includes the power to reduce it; and surely, with the loss already sustained of half a million of dollars, there is no possible risk that these parties can remunerate themselves for that loss within this brief period of time. The amount of their loss I trust Congress are not unwilling should be returned, as that would be but just and equitable, even if you subsequently determine to abandon your policy.

The honorable Senator from Kentucky urges what seems a strange argument against this appropriation. He tells you that this twelve and a half per cent. is a large bonus to grant to this company. He tells you what they now get—$385,000 a year—exceeds twelve per cent. on the capital invested. He tells you that the proposed allowance will pay their capital back in four years, and that paying back the capital of a company in four years is a thing unheard-of in this country. If the honorable Senator will take the trouble to look into the contracts of the Post Office Department, I think he will find that the ratio of allowance is not dependent upon the amount of capital invested in the performance of the service, but the annual expense incurred by the contractor in the performance of his contract. And it must be so. Take the case of horse-service. A horse will cost from $125 to $150. His keep, and the services of a driver, of necessity amount to more than the capital invested in the purchase of the horse. What is the result? Your contract would be more than one hundred or two hundred per cent. on the amount of capital. Then, what is the argument of the honorable Senator worth? How can he object to giving $858,000 a year to this company, because it is one fourth of the capital that is embarked in the enterprise? The amount to be paid under the contract depends on the annual expenditure far more than it does upon the capital invested in the undertaking. You may take your post-coach system, and you will find the same principle there. You will find the amount paid for carrying the mail is from thirty to fifty per cent. upon the capital invested by the contractor in carrying out his contract. I derive this information from the Post Office Department. They have no accurate statement of the matter; but they said that there could be no doubt about the fact that the rate paid for carrying the mails in post-coaches was from thirty to fifty per cent. upon the capital. The inference is irresistible, if the honorable Senator will only give to it an unprejudiced consideration; and therefore his argument falls entirely without weight as opposed to this grant, if there should be no other objection to it.

The honorable Senator from Virginia has made an estimate of the postages in this case, with a view to show how great the loss would be to the Government, in the future. I concede, frankly, that I have not been able to come to the conclusion which has been arrived at by some of those honorable Senators who, in common with me, support this amendment, that it is probable that the receipts from postages will repay you the outlay during the term of this contract. I do not believe they will. It is more than probable, from the best estimate that I can make, that you will divide with the Cunard line, and that the amount of your receipts, taking the average for the remaining eight years, will probably reach $500,000 a year. If you would improve your laws in reference to the transportation of letters on board sea-going vessels; if you would render them more stringent, and have them more efficiently enforced, as regards the illicit transportation of letters, to the exclusion of their transportation in the mail, then I think it not improbable that the future receipts of this line might repay the sum which is now asked. But, in the absence of that, without any supposition that any such legislation will be effected, I admit, upon any estimate that I can make, I do not suppose the receipts will go beyond $500,000 a year. This would leave a deficiency of $358,000 a year, to be paid out of the Treasury. Then I would ask the Senate, is this too much to grant to a line which connects the great center of our own commerce with the most important commercial point in Europe?

But it has been said, that it has been the practice to make the revenues of the land service pay the cost of transportation. This may be true. It may be the practice as regards the whole Union; but what is the result as regards States? Perhaps some Senators may learn something of a lesson of liberality from inspecting that. I find, in Executive Document number 2, page 488, that, taking the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Illinois, Mississippi, Tennessee, Alabama, Missouri, Arkansas, and Texas, the amount of the cost of the transportation of the mail in these twelve States, over and above the net revenues of the Department from the postage received in them, was $527,563 for the year ending June 30th, 1851. In the State of New York, the net receipts over and above the cost of transportation, were $609,007. In my own little State of Delaware, the receipts are double the cost of transportation; and the excess is absorbed, and more than absorbed, in the cost beyond receipts of the transportation of the mail in the State of the honorable Senator from Tennessee, which amounts to nearly $10,000.

I do not state this in any captious spirit, or as a matter of complaint. I do not state it because I suppose a single Senator would desire to curtail the service in the different States of the Union, in proportion to the amount of the receipts of the post office within their borders, though I think such an argument might be quite as justly urged, as any argument which can be urged against the grant to this line, because it happens, from the locality of New York, as the center of your commerce, to be established there. I submit to the Senate, when your practice as a whole does not apply to your practice as regards the States severally, that if you expend $527,000 more than you receive to afford the advantages of mail facilities to the people of the twelve States I have mentioned, you have the same reason, when mail facilities are essential to the commerce of your whole Union, two thirds of which is concentrated at New York, to afford the requisite mail facilities for that commerce, at a cost of $385,000, or even $500,000, a year, above the amount of postages. There is no reason that can be given for affording the interior facility for mail communication in the one case, that does not in principle obtain just as strongly as regards the facility which ought to be afforded to your foreign commerce in the other.

It is needless for me to go over the different States, in order to repeat the separate deficiencies. I have given the names of the States where the receipts for postage do not equal the amount expended. Some of those honorable Senators who are opposed to this appropriation, may perhaps find, upon looking over the list, that the people of the rest of the United States are paying an excess of postages, which is appropriated to the transportation of the mails in the States in which they reside.

MR. HUNTER. The case which the honorable Senator from Delaware suggests, is not a parallel one. When I write a letter from Virginia to my correspondent in New York, is it supposed that I pay or do not pay the postage upon a letter which I write upon my own business? You cannot ascertain who pays the postage, by taking the receipts at any one post office. All you can do is, to take the general results. Besides, here we have been paying more than the post office returns, because we have been keeping up mail steamers, the money for which comes out of the general Treasury.

MR. BAYARD. I do not think the answer sufficient; but I do not object to this mode of allowance, because I think that mail facilities should be granted to every State, whether the amount received from postages meets the cost of transportation or not. But I do not think there is any force in the case put by the honorable Senator. He writes to New York, and pays the postage; and he wants to know how we can tell where the postage is paid. I think that the amount of the correspondence of a State is fairly indicated by the amount of postages paid in the State. I think the enterprise, and business, and population of a State combined, will, in general, be in proportion to the postage received within the State.

MR. PRESIDENT, I have now, imperfectly I am aware, developed to the Senate the views which strike my mind in reference to this question. My only regret is that it has not been within the limits of my capacity to urge them with greater force. If that capacity had equaled the strength of my convictions, I could have left no doubt as to the propriety of this amendment. I am personally unacquainted with Mr. Collins. I believe I saw him once on the deck of the Atlantic; but I should not know him again if we met. His personal interests weigh not with me in any view which I have taken of this appropriation; nor have I had any regard to the peculiar interests of the city of New York in advocating it. I consider it a national question, in which not only the reputation and pride, but the commercial prosperity of this country is involved. With these interests at stake, I am not willing to count closely the cost necessary to sustain this line. The necessary result, if you refuse this appropriation, will be the abandonment of the line. Its abandonment yields to Great Britain the entire postal service between England and America certainly, and between a great part of the continent of Europe and America; for if this line goes down, your other lines of ocean steamers must follow it. Its abandonment yields to her the entire transportation of passengers, except emigrants. It yields to her a tax upon American industry and upon American property, in the shape of freight upon light and costly goods. With success just achieved, I am not willing to surrender this prize to the English Government, to which they attach so much importance, and which, having embarked in the contest, we are just on the eve of dividing with them.

I bear no hostility toward England, peculiarly; but whenever I find that the honor, the reputation, the pride of character of my country is concerned, or her interests, I would assert them without regard to cost, and the more certainly against a haughty and overbearing power like England, than against a feebler State. Sir, withdraw this appropriation, let this line be abandoned, and can you tell me that it will not pass into the hands of a foreign Government? That it will not pass into the hands of your commercial rivals? What would be the feelings of Senators who now oppose this appropriation, if, at a future day, in the contingency of war, these derided vessels should make their appearance on your coast with the British flag flying at their foremast, and aid in the devastation of your country and the destruction of your commerce? Such a thing is entirely within the range, not of imagination, but, I may say, within the range of probability. If you determine that you will abandon this line, you compel the sale of these magnificent steamers, which have been built at so much cost, in pursuance of the policy indicated in your act of 1847, and you know not to whom that sale will be made. It is from these feelings, and because the deliberate result of my own judgment on this appropriation is, that it is a national matter, in which the national interests, national honor, national pride, and national reputation are deeply concerned, I am unwilling, for the sake of $300,000 or $500,000, or for any cost, even though it reach millions, to sacrifice them; and give the ascendancy in this contest to Great Britain. Admitting the amount to be requisite, and the principle of relief in accordance with a wise policy, I shall vote for the amendment as reported by the committee.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, I desire now to renew the amendment which I suggested on Friday last. It is to add to the amendment of the committee, as it now stands, the following:

Provided, That the contract for the transportation of the said mail be, and the same is hereby, transferred from the Navy to the Post Office Department.

I will briefly explain my object in offering this amendment. The Senate Committee on Naval Affairs, I believe, is unanimous in its recommendation that this transfer shall take place, and that for the obvious reason that year after year an immense sum of money is appropriated for various objects in the naval appropriation bill, which would have been thus appropriated if no Navy actually existed. I do not desire to detain the Senate long, but I will advert to some of those objects, and I will say here, that appropriations for books and maps for hydrographical offices, appropriations for meteorological observations, the testing of magnetic power, the preparation and publication of a nautical almanac, the removal of the wreck of the steamer Missouri, the annual appropriations for steam mail lines, for the suppression of the slave trade, for the survey of certain bays on our coast, for the purchase of vessels captured on Lake Erie, are all subjects which have been appropriated for under the denomination of "naval appropriations," and have tended year after year to swell up these appropriations. The swelling them up has done more to place the Navy improperly before the country than anything which has ever occurred to it.

I perceive that the estimates for the year ending June 30, 1853, framed by the Navy Department, are $8,540,693. The bill which has been reported by the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives cuts that amount down $1,835,226; thus reducing the appropriations to $6,705,467. This service, which carried us so gloriously through the war of 1812; which, as was remarked by the honorable Senator from Michigan, [Mr. Cass,] was the first to wrest from Great Britain the wand of naval supremacy—this service, which has been dear to the country ever since 1812—it is quite common now to assail in both Houses of Congress, as useless and expensive. We have heard within these Halls within a few days past an expression of opinion that our naval vessels should be withdrawn from our foreign stations, and that steam lines should be multiplied in their places. As a reason for so doing, appeals were made in regard to these annual exorbitant expenditures, nominally for the Navy, but which really would be appropriated for their purposes if no Navy existed.

It is the opinion of the Naval Committee, after full investigation, and I believe it is the opinion of every man who has the good of the Navy at heart, that these appropriations should be called by their right names; and that if this amendment shall pass—if we are to spend $2,000,000 for the transportation of the mails on the high seas, under the belief that the vessels thus transporting them may be converted into war steamers, we should not call the money so expended a "naval appropriation." Where is the propriety of calling them naval appropriations, until the vessels shall have been transferred to the Navy? It must be remembered, too, that before the transfer can be called for, these steamers may have been entirely annihilated, or may have become unfit for service. This cannot be considered a naval appropriation until the Navy can have something to do with these ships. I must insist, therefore, upon this amendment, providing for the transfer of the contract for the transportation of the mails from New York to Liverpool from the Navy Department to the Post Office Department.

Mr. BADGER. Mr. President, I wish merely to make a brief statement to the honorable Senator from Florida, and not to discuss this matter. What is said by the honorable Senator is strictly correct. The Committee on Naval Affairs were unanimously of the opinion that this contract should be transferred to the Post Office Department, and it was as the agent and under the direction of that committee, that I had prepared an amendment which I offered a day or two ago for that purpose. That amendment I withdrew in deference to my friend at the head of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, in order to give him an opportunity of presenting an amendment which was adopted by the Senate the last time this subject was under consideration. I wish to say now that I hope the Senator from Florida will withdraw the proposed amendment to the amendment; for although I agree with him, as every member of the Naval Committee did, in the propriety of the transfer, I look upon it as a matter of secondary importance to the adoption of the amendment. I hope, therefore, that the amendment of the Committee on Finance will not be embarrassed with it. If it shall be thought by Senators to be a proper proceeding to make this transfer, it can be just as well done in one of the general appropriation bills as upon this amendment. I hope the Senator from Florida will withdraw the amendment for the reasons which induced me to withdraw it, that it is likely to produce embarrassment and difficulty.

On motion the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, May 10, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

The Journal of Friday was read and approved.

Mr. McMULLIN. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, upon the special order.

PURCHASE OF MOUNT VERNON.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. McMULLIN] will allow me to introduce a resolution merely to have it referred. It will not take one minute. It is a courtesy which I have not asked before, and I am sure that when the gentleman knows the object of the resolution, he will agree to it.

Mr. McMULLIN. I will withdraw the motion for a moment, but it is of importance that we should dispose of this special order.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask the consent of the House to introduce the resolution which I send to the Clerk's table.

The resolution was then read for information, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and grounds be instructed to inquire into the expediency of purchasing, for the public use, Mount Vernon, the last residence of George Washington, and the resting place of his remains; and, also, at what price the same can be purchased, for that purpose, and as to what national use it can with most propriety be dedicated; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. BOCK. I object to its introduction.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the rules of the House be suspended, to allow me to introduce the resolution.

Mr. McMULLIN. Objection having been made to the introduction of the resolution, I hope the gentleman [Mr. CULLOM] will excuse me for now urging my motion.

Mr. CULLOM. Let it be referred. It can do no mischief. The committee will have a right to report according to the propriety of the thing, after they shall have examined the matter. I ask that it may be referred.

Mr. AVERETT. I object.

Mr. FOWLER. I merely wish to make an inquiry. If the House do not sustain this motion to go into committee upon the special order, what will be the regular order of business?

The SPEAKER. The business in order will be petitions from the State of Maine. That is the business in order in the morning.

The question now being on the motion of Mr. McMULLIN—

Mr. COBB demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, and STEPHENS, of Georgia, were appointed.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 68, noes 45; no quorum voting.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move a call of the House.

Mr. HIBBARD. I call for the yeas and nays upon the motion to suspend the rules and go into committee.

The SPEAKER. Upon a division of the House, no quorum voting, strictly speaking, no motion can be in order except a motion for a call of the House, or a motion to adjourn.

Mr. STEPHENS. I ask for the yeas and nays upon the motion for a call of the House.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken, and there were—yeas 37, nays 126.

So the House refused to order a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs upon the motion to go into Committee of the Whole upon the special order, and upon that motion tellers have been ordered. The tellers, Messrs. STEPHENS, of Georgia, and JOHNSON, of Arkansas, will again resume their places.

The tellers accordingly resuming their places, the question was taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 91, noes not counted.

HOMESTEAD BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the special order, (Mr. HIBBARD in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. The business first in order, is the consideration of House bill No. 7, for the promotion of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, &c. The question before the committee is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PARKER] to the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. CLARK.] The gentleman from Iowa moved to amend the first section, in the tenth line, by striking out the words,

"free of cost" and inserting the words, "at fifty cents per acre." The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PARKER] moved to amend that amendment, by striking out the word "fifty," and inserting the word "twenty-five." The question now is upon the adoption of the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The question was then taken upon the amendment offered by Mr. CLARK, and it was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no further amendment to the first section of the original bill, the question recurs on the substitute for the first section, submitted by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JOHNSON.]

Mr. CLARK. I move to strike out from the first section the words "free of cost," and to insert the words, "and hold the same as a preemption for the term of three years, according to the preemption laws now in force, except as to the time which the preemption has to run."

Mr. CLARK. I stated the other day that I had some constitutional difficulty in reference to this section. I did not say that my mind was positively made up upon these questions. I shall be happy to receive light upon them, and that the difficulties should be removed, if gentlemen are able to do it. The gentleman from Ohio, near me, [Mr. CARTER,] said that this constitutional difficulty was all gammon. Now, that is a very hazardous expression. There may be game in it, but I do not see any constitutional light in it. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DISNEY,] who sits furthest from me, was very confident that no gentleman need entertain any constitutional scruples upon the subject. He said they looked everywhere for light but in the Constitution itself, and commenced a search there for the authority which was to dissipate all doubt; but not finding it, he said he had confounded the original resolution on which the cession of territory was made to the United States with the Constitution itself; but that it was equally strong in one instance as the other—meaning, as he said, the resolution of Congress of 1780, the language of which was, "to cause them to be settled."

The gentleman from Mississippi, also, [Mr. FREEMAN,] alluding to the same resolution, stated that contemporaneous history, of the same nature with the Constitution, were in pari materia, and that they must be construed together. That our title to the public lands was not derived from the Constitution, but from the resolutions of the Congress of the Confederation, and the grants of the several States based thereon. But if we admit the statements made as true in their whole extent, they apply only to those lands which were then proposed to be detached from particular States, and conveyed to the United States. The proposition involves no question of the manner in which the public lands shall be administered. The question was as to detaching vast amounts of lands from particular States, and giving them to the United States for the purpose of being converted into separate States, to prevent those particular States from overriding, in a political point of view, the smaller States. What position would the State of Virginia occupy in this regard as to her compeers did she wield all the political power of the States northwest of the Ohio in addition to her own? Why, she would be like the fat kine of Egypt, which swallowed up the lean kine. What would the position of Georgia be in point of political power did she wield that of Alabama and Mississippi in addition to her own? The object was to build up separate independent States, so as to divide equally the political power; and there was no question here of the manner in which the public lands should be administered.

Will gentlemen undertake to say that the resolution of 1780 referred to those lands which have been acquired since the donation by Mississippi and Georgia to the United States? Will they undertake to say that the sentiments therein contained apply to those immense tracts of land which have been purchased and paid for out of the general Treasury? Will they undertake to say that the doctrines they have started apply to the Louisiana purchase, to the Florida purchase, and to the purchase on the Pacific? I should like to hear gentlemen upon this point. I should like to hear them prove, if they are able, that this doctrine, which they brought before this House the other day, includes these purchases—if they were purchases for the same purpose for which grants were ceded from the States of Virginia and Georgia?

Mr. AVERETT. I avail myself of this occasion to reply to the arguments of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DISNEY,] made the other day upon the constitutional power of Congress over the public lands. He said, with an air of great confidence, that, if he had the physical strength, he could, even in a five minutes' speech, convince any man, whose mind was not biased beyond redemption, of the constitutionality of this measure. Forthwith, the gentleman went on to quote the Constitution, as he said; but the very first sentence that he quoted was a quotation not to be found in the Constitution itself.

Sir, it seems to me as clear as a sunbeam, that this bill is at war with the Constitution, with the equal rights of our people, and abounds in bad faith towards the old States.

"The Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, the territory or other property belonging [not to Congress, but] to the United States."

It is that clause that gives Congress power to dispose of the public lands. The United States, then, held no territory except such as had been ceded by the old States. Upon what terms did the United States hold that territory? Why, sir, under a solemn compact and obligation that it should be appropriated to defray the expenses of this Government; to aid the States to defray the expenses of this Government, in proportion to the charges upon them respectively, and "for no other purpose whatsoever." That was the solemn obligation which had been entered into before the formation of the Constitution; and if the gentleman means to say that the power to pass this bill, or any similar bill, to divert these lands from those purposes is given in the Constitution, he means to charge the framers of that instrument with repudiating a solemn contract which had been entered into at the instigation of the Federal Government. The practice of the Government, for fifty-odd years, has conformed to this obligation, and proves that I have truly interpreted the Constitution; indeed, there can be no doubt about it. Unless the gentleman means to say that the framers of the Constitution meant to repudiate that obligation, it seems to me he is bound to admit that the power to divert the lands from these purposes is not given to Congress by the Constitution. It cannot be denied, that power over the public domain was meant to apply to the public domain then in the possession of the Government, which had been acquired from the old States, under the express stipulations just mentioned. Those stipulations give us the true interpretation of the Constitution indubitably. The Government, I repeat, had no other lands, and held them under this obligation; and I repeat that the practice, for more than fifty years, has conformed to it; and it proves that this was what the framers of the Constitution meant, in the clause which I have quoted, the only clause giving Congress power over the public domain. I say, then, to divert these lands from purposes specified in the deeds of cession made by the old States, is usurpation, say what you may about precedents. I look to the Constitution itself, and I defy gentlemen to show the power to pass such a bill as this. I will take this occasion to inquire why it is our Western friends are so eager to kick out of the traces, and divest us of our rights in the public domain. They cannot expect to settle our immense domain in a minute. Their fathers or themselves have gone to the West of their own free will and accord. With what reason can they complain, since we have nurtured them in their territorial condition, yea, petted them, and defended them against the Indians at immense expense? With what reason can they complain that the buffalo and buck are still within the reach of their rifles? Why is it? Is it because they wish to get somebody upon the public lands to tax? Yes, sir; they wish to locate people upon the lands to tax them! It is for that purpose that they are striving to divest us of our rights. They would prefer having the power to tax the lands, to the gift of them. Are we not joint owners of them? Are not the old States members of this copartnership of States? Are you, my Western friends, determined to repudiate the obligations of your fathers? Unquestionably, you cannot show your power, in the Constitution, to do what you are aiming at; and I proclaim here, if you pass this bill you not only violate the Constitution, but you desecrate the memory of your fathers!

Mr. HALL. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "three" years and inserting "two." I wish to answer the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. AVERETT,] who inquires why it is that members of the West desire to see these lands taken out of the hands of the Federal Government? I answer, that we do desire it. We who own lands in the West are taxed exorbitantly for the purpose of making roads and bridges, that the laws may be administered over the settlers on these public lands. These the Federal Government own; and while we, the small landed proprietors of the new States, are subjected to these expenses, for the purpose of adding value to your public domain, you stand by, let your public domain improve by our expenditure, and refuse to give us a single cent. We have felt the evil, and have suffered long enough under the operation of this unjust system. I tell the gentleman from Virginia, that if he will deal equitably and fairly with all the parties to whom these lands belong, he will insist that they shall all contribute their fair share towards giving value to the public lands. It is, at present, a one-sided operation. The new States have not only paid the taxes, but have made roads and bridges, and have been at the expense of administering the laws to protect settlers upon your public lands, and we have received nothing in return for it. Now, we think that this thing has gone on long enough. You keep these lands, and speculate with them off of the new States. We have asked you to sell the land for what it is worth, but you will not do it until we, by our expenditure, add value to it; and then when we ask for a fair and liberal policy, accuse us of robbing and plundering you of your property.

Now, sir, I am sorry that the gentleman from Virginia has left, as I wished to call upon him to tell me for what object the Government of the United States has ever acquired territory. For what purpose has any Government upon the face of God's earth ever acquired territory? Was it not solely and exclusively for the purpose of peopling it?—for the purpose of adding to the strength and power of the Government, and for the purpose, in that way, of adding to the greatness and wealth of the nation? And, sir, we have recognized that this is the only purpose for which we have acquired this history, because, from time to time, we have passed laws with reference exclusively to its settlement. We have passed preemption laws to induce people to go and live upon the land. We have established a credit system at one time, and then we have established the cash system at another time, all the time selling the land at a comparatively low price, in the opinion of gentlemen from the old States, with a view of encouraging people to go and live upon it. If we acquire these lands for the purpose of peopling them, I ask the gentleman from Virginia, now, as I inquired the other day, why Congress cannot, in the exercise of a sound discretion, pass a bill, the object of which is to settle the public lands? That is the ground upon which I rest this bill. I do not claim all power at the hands of Congress over the public domain. I do not claim that you have a right to pass a distribution law, like the famous bill of Henry Clay. I do not claim anything of that kind, but I do say, having acquired this land for the purpose of extending population and settlement, that we have a right to adopt a bill which has for its object, in good faith, the extension of our population of this territory. That is the ground upon which I rest this bill, and I am willing to meet gentlemen of the old States in the defense of it. Gentlemen from the old States ought not to complain if the new States are a little restless under the operation of this system. The new States have asked you to graduate the price of the public lands. They have only asked you to sell it for what it is really worth, and this you have refused.

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Chairman, it was not my purpose to say another word, but that which has fallen from some gentlemen this morning seem to call for a reply. I feel fully the folly of attempting to make a constitutional argument in a five minute speech, nor shall I attempt it, but submit only a word or two by way of answer to gentlemen. By the way, gentlemen appear to pride themselves remarkably upon the fact that, not having a copy of the Constitution before me, I inadvertently quoted, as a passage from the Constitution, words which are to be found in the resolutions of 1780. Permit me here to say, that that resolution is more germane and more binding, with regard to the power of Congress over these public lands, than, if possible, even the Constitution itself; because that portion of the Constitution in relation to this measure grew out of and was based upon the language of the resolutions of 1780. As I said before, I repeat now, that, as a mere question of constitutional power, it can be demonstrated beyond all sort of doubt. Prior to the passage of the resolutions of 1780, claims were set up by the different States to large tracts of this unsettled public domain. The other States objected. One of the objections was that to which I have adverted before; that the possession of such large tracts made one State too powerful for the safety of the rest. Congress felt the force of that with other objections. If gentlemen turn to the history of the times, they will find that the entire colonies were at war upon this one subject; and Maryland absolutely refused for a while to enter into the Confederation on account of it.

The difficulty was universally felt, and hence Congress passed that resolution inviting these cessions from the different States, pledging itself to cause them to be settled and formed into separate independent States under a republican form of Government. This was done to quiet the apprehensions, and it was upon this resolution of 1780 that Virginia acted. It was that which induced her to make the deed of cession. She stipulated that these lands should be used as a common fund. The dispute in relation to the unsettled lands continued up to the meeting of the Convention which framed the existing Constitution. The dispute was found to have existence there; and, after various unsuccessful efforts in that Convention to settle the question, they finally abandoned it, simply adopting the words which are in the Constitution as it now exists.

I say to this committee, as has been said already, that the only possible object for which any Government can want a public domain is to have it settled. What want you of jurisdiction over trees and barren acres? It is men only that constitute the strength, power, and the glory of a State. It was to induce the settlement of men—living, breathing men—upon this domain that induced Congress to ask and Virginia to make the cession—that induced North Carolina and Georgia to cede this domain that it might be caused to be settled and erected into distinct States with a republican form of Government. It is true that one of the original objects was to provide for the common debt which existed and hung over the Confederation, growing out of the war of the Revolution; but that object has been accomplished. The debt has been paid, and so far as that condition or limitation is expressed or implied it has been fulfilled. It ceases to apply to the Government of the United States, which is in possession of this domain. There is, then, nothing of the conditions or limitations of deeds of cession but the application of them for general purposes—to that necessary, unavoidable, general intention of causing the domain to be settled.

The question then arises, will the granting of these lands to actual settlers be to the promotion of the common benefit? If it be not for the common benefit, it must be for the exclusive benefit of some particular class or portion of the community. But, sir, will it be denied that the settlement of the wild and uncultivated lands would be for the general benefit of the Republic?

The question was then taken upon Mr. HALL's amendment to the amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. McMULLIN. I move to amend the amendment, by striking out "three," and inserting "ten." I shall endeavor strictly to confine the remarks which I may make to the subject-matter contained in my amendment. If I should, in the least degree, deviate from that determination, I beg that the Chair will enforce the rules upon me. I would also request of the Chair, that when any gentleman shall attempt, under the operation of the five minutes rule, to discuss the general features of the bill, that he will enforce vigorously the rule.

Mr. OLDS. I call the gentleman to order. He is not speaking to the point presented by his amendment. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the gentleman is not discussing his amendment, and therefore is out of order. The amendment is, that three be stricken out, and that in its place ten be inserted. Is the point of order insisted upon?

Mr. OLDS. I will not insist upon my point of order.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the gentleman from Tennessee, and the gentleman from Virginia, who have peculiar charge of this bill, do not insist upon the proper and faithful execution of the five minutes rule of debate, I shall endeavor to do so myself, although I have no more right than any other member of this committee. If the rule is not strictly enforced, we shall never get through with the bill. The whole object of that rule is entirely destroyed by its non-enforcement.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Virginia will now proceed.

Mr. HOUSTON. I object, if the Chair decides that he is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that his remarks were not in order.

Mr. McMULLIN. I have effected my object, which was to call the attention of the Chair and the members of the House to the five minutes rule of debate, and to request its enforcement, and shall, therefore, withdraw my amendment.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. CLARK, and it was disagreed to.

Mr. MCNAIR. I submit the following amendment, to come in at the close of the second section, viz:

And also every officer, soldier, sailor, and marine who shall have served in the war of 1812, and in the war with Mexico, shall be entitled to a bounty land warrant for one hundred and sixty acres of vacant and unappropriated public land as above; and in case of his death, his widow and children, including what he may have had under the act of 28th September, 1850.

Mr. HALL. I submit the point of order that the gentleman's amendment is not germane to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not prepared to say that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. MCNAIR. I do not introduce this amendment with any design of producing confusion or difficulty; for I expect, unless this bill is very materially changed from what it is at present, to vote for it. It may be, however, in my judgment, amended with advantage. It is not, as it is, quite equal or just. While, with a liberal hand, there is extended a home to a great many citizens of the United States, I contend that liberality should also be extended towards those who have, in the hour of peril, gone out in the defense of the land; who have stood up, battling for their country's right and protection; and to the widows and orphans of those whose fathers and husbands have died bravely defending their country against the assaults of its foes. I ask gentlemen, whether it is equitable or just to give more to persons who have remained at their homes, subject to no peril, but coolly looking on, than to those who have marched out at the first moment of alarm to defend the country; and who, in so doing, have risked their lives? The widows and orphans of thousands whose bones are now bleaching on the plains of Mexico, are suffering for the want of bread to sustain life; and yet you give more to those who have remained at home than to the soldiers who have endured hardships and privations for their country; and to the suffering widows and children of those who died in their country's service. Our soldiers have fought as bravely, as gallantly, and as successfully, as men ever did before. They contended with the foe arm to arm, and with steel to steel; with the knowledge that if the Mexicans conquered them, they would have been destroyed at the point of the bayonet, or driven into the ocean.

A large majority of these soldiers who had granted to them land warrants for forty acres, are now selling them at $20 to $23 each. What kind of bounty, I ask, is that? It is a very small pittance; indeed, to the defenders of the Republic—to those who pressed forward in the van, to the glory and fame of the country. Extend to them, and to the widows and children of those who have died in the service, the same liberality you propose for those who remained at home.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. HALL,] and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DISNEY,] have advanced positions which I do not wish to let pass without reply. They say, that the object of the old States in their cessions of the public lands was to procure their settlement and the formation of new States. The gentleman from Ohio says, that the objects were settlement, population, and new States.

Now, I join issue with these gentlemen upon these points. The object of these cessions can only be known from the deeds of cession themselves. I appeal to the record, and I have before me all the deeds of cession, to which I beg to call the attention of the committee. The first was made by New York the 19th of April, 1780; and contains this language—

Mr. HOUSTON. I make a point of order upon my friend from Georgia, and will let the Chair and committee dispose of it. It is, that the rule requires that only one speech shall be made in favor, and another in opposition to an amendment. I understand the gentleman to be now replying to speeches made in the early part of the morning, when, under the rules his remarks should be confined to the precise amendment before the committee, which is an amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MCNAIR,] proposing to give bounty land to marines.

Mr. STEPHENS. I think, if I may be allowed a word, that the gentleman from Alabama is a little too fast. If it be that we have not the authority, under the deeds of cession, to grant these lands as proposed by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MCNAIR,] of course I am in order in showing it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is not debatable. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] rises to a point of order. The remarks of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] are not in order. The question before the committee is upon the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MCNAIR.] The gentleman from Georgia is entitled to the floor upon that amendment. The Chair does not see the pertinency of the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. STEPHENS. If it is not in order to recur to the deeds under which we held these lands when the pending question is a disposition of them, I do not know what is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. It is difficult for the Chair to say that the remarks of the gentleman may or may not be in order. He is not disposed to rule the gentleman out of order, but would rather beg leave to suggest to all gentlemen, and the committee, the propriety and necessity of confining themselves as strictly as may be practicable to the amendment.

Mr. STEPHENS. I will then proceed.

The first of these cessions was made by New York, the 19th April, 1780, and contains this language:

"And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the territory which may be ceded or relinquished by virtue of this act, either with respect to the jurisdiction, as well as the right or preemption of soil, or the right or preemption of soil only, shall be and inure for the use and benefit of such of the United States as shall become members of the Federal Alliance of the said States, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever."

The next cession came from Virginia, on the first day of March, 1784, and contains the following limitation:

"That all the lands within the territory so ceded to the United States, and not reserved for or appropriated to any of the before-mentioned purposes, or disposed of in boundaries to the officers and soldiers of the American army, shall be considered as a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become, or shall become, members of the Confederation or Federal Alliance of the said States, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever."

Massachusetts ceded her interest in these lands on the 13th September, 1786, and her commissioners appointed for this purpose used the following language:

"Then we do by these presents, by virtue of the power and authority aforesaid, in the name and behalf of the said Commonwealth of Massachusetts, transfer, quit claim, cede, and convey to the United States of America, for their benefit, Massachusetts inclusive, all right, title, and estate of and in, as well as the soil as the jurisdiction which the said Commonwealth hath to the territory or tract within the limits of the Massachusetts charter, situate and lying west of the following line," &c.

The next session in order of time was from Connecticut. This was on the 14th of September, 1786. The language used in that session is as follows:

"Now, therefore, know ye, that we, the said William Samuel Johnson and Jonathan Sturges, by virtue of the power and authority to us committed by the said act of the General Assembly of Connecticut before recited, in the name, and for, and on behalf of the said State of Connecticut, do, by these presents, assign, transfer, quit claim, cede, and convey to the United States of America, for their benefit, Connecticut inclusive, all the right, title, interest, jurisdiction, and claim which the said State of Connecticut hath in and to the before-mentioned and described territory or tract of country, as the same is bounded and described in the said act of Assembly, for the uses in the said act of Assembly disclosed."

The cession of South Carolina was made on the 9th of August, 1787, and is in these words:

"Now, therefore, know ye, that we, the said John Kean and Daniel Huger, by virtue of the power and authority to us committed by the said act of the General Assembly of South Carolina before recited, in the name, and for, and in behalf of the State of South Carolina, do, by these presents, assign, transfer, quit claim, cede, and convey to the United States of America for their benefit, South Carolina inclusive, all the right, title, interest, jurisdiction, and claim which the State of South Carolina hath in and to the before-mentioned and described territory or tract of country, as the same is bounded and described in the said act of Assembly, for the uses in the said recited act of Assembly disclosed."

North Carolina made her cession on the 2d of April, 1790. The language used in it is as follows:

"Thirdly. That all the lands intended to be ceded, by virtue of this act, to the United States of America, and not appropriated as before-mentioned, shall be considered as a common fund for the use and benefit of the United States of America, North Carolina inclusive, according to their respective and usual proportion in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully disposed of for that use and purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever."

The last cession made, sir, was by Georgia. This was on the 24th of April, 1802. The language of limitation used by that State in her deed of cession, is as follows:

"Thirdly. That all the lands ceded by this agreement to the United States shall, after satisfying the above-mentioned payment of $1,250,000 to the State of Georgia, and the grants recognized by the preceding conditions, be considered as a common fund for the use and benefit of the United States, Georgia included, and shall be faithfully disposed of for that use and purpose, and for no other use and purpose whatever."

Now, sir, I have read that part of each one of those deeds of cession relating or pertaining to this point, and in no one of them is settlement one of the objects had in view in making the cession. On the contrary, the leading object in all of them was to create a common fund for the use and benefit of all the States of the Union (the ceding State included) and for no other use or purpose whatever. I therefore not only protest against the doctrine advanced by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. HALL,] and from Ohio, [Mr. DISNEY,] that the main object of making those cessions, was settlement and population and the formation of new States; but, sir, as a Representative of one of these old States, making one of these cessions, I protest against any disposition of the public lands so ceded in opposition to the express words of the grants under which we hold them.

Mr. EVANS. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. McNAIR,] by inserting after the words "war with Mexico," the words, "revolutionary war, war of 1812, and Florida war."

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I make a question of order upon this amendment, that it is contrary to the fifty-fifth rule; and that it is upon a different subject from the one before the committee. We have had up this whole subject of the bounty lands for weeks, and discussed it.

Mr. EVANS. I submit to the Chair that it is too late, when I have offered it as an amendment to the amendment. The gentleman should have raised the question upon the amendment itself.

Mr. JONES. I take it upon the original amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question must be now upon the amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. McNAIR.] The Chair is of the opinion that it is in order, as extending the benefits proposed by the amendment.

Mr. JONES. I take an appeal, and ask for the reading of the fifty-fifth rule.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be read, unless objected to.

The fifty-fifth rule was then read, as follows:

"No motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration, shall be admitted under color of amendment. No bill or resolution shall at any time be amended, by annexing thereto, or incorporating therewith, any other bill or resolution pending before the House."

Mr. JONES. I take an appeal upon the original amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is too late.

Mr. JONES. It is not too late, while it is pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. EVANS] is in order, to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. McNAIR.] That is the only question before the committee.

Mr. JONES. I make the question of order upon the original amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the two questions cannot be made, both at the same time. It is too late to make the point of order now.

Mr. JONES. If I withdraw it upon this one, as the Chair understands it, cannot the point of order be taken upon the original amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the impression that it is too late to take it upon the original amendment. That has been received. The question of order raised upon the original amendment was overruled, and acquiesced in by the committee.

Mr. JONES. It has not been acted upon.

Mr. EVANS. I call the gentleman from Tennessee to order.

The CHAIRMAN. It is the opinion of the Chair that it is too late to raise the question of order.

Mr. JONES. I take an appeal from the decision of the Chair. If that decision is overruled, then I will take an appeal upon the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. McNAIR.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] raises the question of order, that the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McNAIR] is not in order. The Chair rules that at this time the objection comes too late, and cannot be received. From that ruling the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] appeals, and the question is now, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. EVANS. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McNAIR] has certainly made some patriotic and proper remarks, but what struck me with a great deal of surprise is, that in offering an amendment which he had evidently drawn with great care, and to which he had given a good deal of consideration, he should have overlooked everything that occurred prior to 1846, and should have forgotten that during the revolutionary war and in the war of 1812 we had sailors and marines in our service, who contributed greatly to our honor and renown. The gentleman is not a very old gentleman, but certainly his reading, if not his recollection, goes back to those times. Every one present must know that the most deserving men that we have ever had in service are these very sailors and marines, in the war of 1812. You had no prestige of success, or any probability of it until they made your flag triumphant. You never gave them any reward for their services, but you have given bounty lands to the soldiers and marines who were engaged in the war with Mexico.

Mr. McNAIR. I think not to the sailors.

Mr. EVANS. Well, I think we have; but we have never granted any to the sailors who were engaged in the war of 1812. For what reason? You state, as an objection, that the sailors are entitled to prize money. Were not those engaged in the Mexican war also entitled to prize money? But take the Florida war, where the sailors and marines of the United States went on shore and fought with the land troops, for years, and never received one particle of bounty land; though they could not by possibility have any prize money. Why is it, I ask the honorable gentleman, that he has forgotten these illustrious men?—has overlooked men of the highest desert and the most brilliant reputation; men who have graced their country by their deeds of arms?

Mr. McNAIR. I will vote for the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. EVANS. I hope the gentleman will vote for it; and I hope the House will not overlook it. It has been said in this House, in former times, that these sailors, who are a class of men scattered over the whole world, and who are seldom at home on the day of election, do not vote, and, therefore, it is useless to stretch our gratitude beyond the borders of our interest. Well, I am prepared to relinquish my share of the interest so that there may be more to distribute among other members; and shall only ask that I may display my gratitude to the gallant sailors and marines who are embraced in my amendment by pressing its adoption upon the committee.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Chairman, I object to the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. EVANS.] It makes an unjust distinction between persons equally meritorious, supposing the bill to be right in principle. And what I have to say will meet the views presented by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DISNEY,] already properly criticised by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS.]

The public lands originally belonged to a portion of the States, and not the whole. But, because the title to, or, rather, possession of these lands had been secured by a war in which all the States had spent their treasure and made great sacrifices, it was considered that justice demanded that the territory thus secured against a common enemy should become the common fund of all the States, to pay a common debt and provide for their common interest. But we propose now to reverse this policy. We propose to take the territory from the whole, and give it to a part.

The gentleman from Ohio says that the territory was ceded to the Union for the purpose of having it settled and erected into republican States, to be admitted into the Union. He confounds the conditions of the cession with the object. The object was to provide the Union with a common fund to discharge a common debt. But these States, which were the original proprietors, refused to make the cession, except upon the condition that the United States should carry out the policy which it was the intention of the original proprietors to pursue—that is, put the lands into market, and thus promote their settlement, and when sufficiently populous, admit the different districts or divisions into the Union as States, on the terms of the Constitution.

Why did Virginia and other States require these conditions? The history of the matter is this: There was an Eastern interest, political in its character, opposed to the extension of the Union westward; opposed to the new communities then growing up west of the Ohio river becoming members of the Confederacy. The proprietary States found that if they gave up the control of their territories to the United States, they might be kept out of market to prevent their settlement, and that when they should be settled, they might be left to take care of themselves, and might eventually attach themselves to the contiguous foreign provinces, and thus fall into the hands of foreign powers. Such are the reasons why the cession to the United States was made subject to the conditions mentioned. If settlement and the erection of new communities were the objects and not the condition of the cession, then there was no use in making the cession. The proprietary States were full as competent to sell or bestow the lands as the United States could be. And as to the erection of new communities and the establishment of territorial governments, the gentleman from Ohio denies, I think, that Congress has any such power. But no one will deny that Virginia and the other land States had the power to do this. In this respect, there was, therefore, something lost and nothing gained, if the view of the gentleman from Ohio be correct as to the objects of the cession.

I know that in early times, resolutions were adopted by the different parties concerned, favorable to the idea of the sale and settlement of the public domain, but those resolutions, as I have already stated, resulted from fears that it might be kept out of market, with the aim of preventing settlement, and to the injury of the Union which had instant and urgent need for the fund.

[Here a message was received from the Senate by the hands of their Secretary, ASBURY DICKERS, Esq., informing the House of the passage of sundry bills.]

The question was then taken on Mr. EVANS's amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. HALL. I move to amend the amendment, by inserting "and the soldiers of the war of 1812."

Mr. MCNAIR. They are already included in the amendment.

Mr. HALL. Then I move to strike out "160," and insert "320." I hold that we have the power to pass this bill, and I wish to say a few words upon that point.

Mr. FLORENCE. I would suggest to my colleague, [Mr. MCNAIR], that the soldiers of the War of 1812 are not included in his amendment.

Mr. MCNAIR. Read the amendment, and it will be seen that they are included.

Mr. HALL. I cannot give way for the reading of the amendment. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] and the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. WOODWARD], seem to misunderstand altogether the title which we have to the larger portion of our public domain.

According to my reading, Georgia never did own California and New Mexico, Virginia never did own Florida and Louisiana, and a great portion of the territory which we now own, was not obtained by cession from any of the old States, but was obtained by cession from France, Mexico, and Spain. If, therefore, gentlemen find any difficulty in applying the provisions of this bill to the land ceded by the old States, let them propose to except it from the operation of this bill.

With regard to that great portion of the public domain which has not been ceded by the old States, how does the matter stand? Will the gentleman from Georgia, or the gentleman from South Carolina pretend that we ever bought those lands for the purpose of speculation? What sort of an argument would it have been to the American people in favor of purchasing Louisiana; that by acquiring that country we should receive millions into the Treasury from the sale of the public lands? Such an argument as that could not have got a single vote in any part of the country. Was it ever made when we proposed to purchase Florida, or when we bought California and New Mexico? This whole principle on which we acquire territory, was up in the question of the annexation of Texas. On what ground did we go for the annexation of Texas? Was it because we were going to speculate in the land which we supposed we should acquire by the annexation of Texas? Why no, but because we should acquire a great State, extend our area, increase our population, and in that way extend our wealth and multiply our commerce. It was on that ground, too, that we annexed Louisiana, Florida, California, and New Mexico. The idea of speculating in the public lands never entered into the head of any American statesman when we made those acquisitions, and it would have been ridiculous, after the experience we had had in regard to the public lands, to have recommended the annexation or acquisition of territory on any such argument as that. The whole purpose and motive the Government had in view in acquiring this territory, was to extend our population, to extend the area of freedom—in the phrase of the day—and in that way, to multiply the resources; wealth, and prosperity of the country.

Mr. HOWARD. I am opposed to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN, (interrupting.) The Chair would beg leave to remind the committee of the rule which requires gentlemen, in speaking to amendments to confine themselves to the question before the committee, and to announce that if gentlemen, in the course of debate hereafter, in the opinion of the Chair, clearly wander from the question, he will feel it to be his duty to call them to order.

Mr. HOWARD. I am opposed to the amendment, for the reason that I do not believe we have a right to give away the public lands. The gentleman from Missouri bases his whole argument upon the ground, that the United States Government has no right to speculate in the public lands.

Mr. HALL. I did not say so. I said that we never bought land for the purpose of speculating in it. That is not the object of this Government, or of any other Government in acquiring territory.

Mr. HOWARD. Then I do not perceive the force of the gentleman's argument. Now, I maintain that the Federal Government, if it has a right to purchase lands at all, it has a right to speculate in the public lands. As has already been said, one of the leading objects of the purchase was revenue. Now, where do we derive power to lay taxes and collect revenue—to distribute it among poor people or among rich people? And if we have no power thus to deal with money, by what right can we collect revenue to purchase land, for the purpose of distributing land among the people generally, or among a particular class? Gentlemen say that it is because we have a plenary power under the Constitution to dispose of the public domain. Now, I deny that the Federal Government has any plenary powers in the ordinary acceptance of the words. The powers are all limited to the object's scope and intention, for which the Federal Government and the Federal Constitution were ordained. There are no unlimited powers.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair begs leave to remind the gentleman from Texas that the amendment against which he is speaking is to strike out "160," and insert "320," and to suggest that the gentleman must confine his argument to that question.

Mr. HOWARD. Well, sir, I say that we have no constitutional power to give away three hundred and twenty acres of the public domain.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas must confine himself, in the opinion of the Chair, to the merits of three hundred and twenty acres in preference to one hundred and sixty acres.

Mr. HOWARD. I am confining my remarks, as I think, to that question; and I make this application, that it must be perfectly obvious that we have no right to dispose of the public domain for any other purposes than for those which will carry out some power expressly granted in the Constitution. Now, sir, you look in vain for any power in the Constitution which confers upon you the right to give away the public property of any kind. You cannot give away the ships of the Navy. You cannot give away the material of the Army.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. (Interrupting.) With the permission of the gentleman from Texas, I desire to ask him a question. The gentleman is raising a constitutional point. Now, I want to ask him where Congress derived the power to give to a portion of the States twenty millions of acres of land, worth twenty-five millions of dollars, and to give not an acre to others? And I want to ask him, further, if he did not vote to make a grant of lands worth twenty-five millions of dollars to some States and withheld it from others?

Mr. HOWARD. I do not see the pertinency of the gentleman's question. One unconstitutional act could not make another unconstitutional act constitutional. But I do not know to what act the gentleman alludes.

A MEMBER. He means the railroad bills.

Mr. HOWARD. That is a proprietary act, to increase the value of the remainder of the public lands, and it is direct in its object. But there is a manifest distinction between this bill and the bills which have heretofore been passed making concessions to railroads and to other works. Those acts reserve a certain amount of the public domain along the lines of the railroads and increase the price of those lands.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MCNAIR. I wish to make a brief explanation of my amendment. [Cries of "Order! order!"] But I want to set myself right. [Renewed cries of "Order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. No further debate is in order.

The question was then put upon Mr. HALL's amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The question recurring upon Mr. MCNAIR's amendment, it was put, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOREHEAD. Would it be in order now to move to strike out the first section and insert a substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. There is a motion to that effect already pending.

Mr. MOREHEAD. I move to strike out all after the enacting clause of the 1st section, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That all the public lands remaining unsold, or unappropriated, on the 1st day of September, 1852, be divided between the several States of the United States, and the citizens thereof, in proportion to the Federal population of each State and Territory.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules that amendment out of order, because it relates to a subject not germane to the subject of the bill, and because there is a substitute for the first section already pending.

Mr. MOREHEAD. Is it in order to offer it as an amendment to the proposed substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair cannot receive it as an amendment to the substitute, because it is not germane to the bill. The question now is on the substitute for the first section, offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JOHNSON.]

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I ask for the reading of the first section of the bill, as it now stands.

The Clerk read the section, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c. That every man or widow who is the head of a family, and a citizen of the United States, shall, from and after the passage of this act, be entitled to enter, free of cost, one quarter section of vacant and unappropriated public lands, or a quantity equal thereto, to be located in a body, in conformity with the legal subdivisions of the public lands, and after the same shall have been surveyed.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will now withdraw my substitute, as the section embraces substantially what I propose.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman can withdraw his amendment.

Mr. MOLONY. I object. I desire to submit an amendment to that substitute, which I intended to offer when I made my speech upon this bill, but failed to do so for want of time. I move to insert after the words "first day of January, 1852," the words "or shall become a citizen after."

I gave my reasons for supporting this amendment at length in my remarks on the homestead bill, and I shall not, therefore, occupy the time of the committee further than to say that the effect of the amendment, if adopted, would be to allow any emigrant who may hereafter declare his intention to become a citizen, when he shall become a citizen after a residence of five years, to avail himself of the benefits of this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I will merely say that I think the first section of the bill is now about as perfect as we can get it; and it is for that reason that I am willing to withdraw my amendment. I hope the committee will vote down all other amendments.

The question was then taken on Mr. MOLONY's amendment; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. MOREHEAD. I move to amend, in the fourth line, by inserting the word "white," before the word "citizen;" so as to make it read, "and a white citizen of the United States."

Mr. CABLE. Is that in order? Has not the section been passed upon?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from North Carolina to propose an amendment to the first section. He thinks that the amendment is not now in order, the House having passed from that section to the consideration of the substitute offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JOHNSON.] The gentleman can offer an amendment to the substitute.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of Connecticut. But it is not in order to perfect the first section before the question is taken upon the substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. Not in the opinion of the Chair, after the committee have proceeded to the consideration of the substitute. The Chair thinks the amendment comes too late.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Does the Chair decide that the committee have gone as far, in offering amendments to the original section, as it can go?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so thinks.

Mr. JONES. If the Chair will look to the rule, he will see that, so long as amendments continue to be offered to the first section, the committee must continue to consider and vote upon them. Then, when there are no more amendments to be offered to that section, it is in order to proceed to the consideration of the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will examine the rule further upon that subject.

Mr. JONES. If the Chair will allow me, I was proceeding to say, if, however, after the committee have proceeded to the consideration of the substitute, any gentleman wishes to propose an amendment to the original proposition, according to the rule, I think he has clearly a right to do so. That has, at least, been the uniform practice of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. To what rule does the gentleman refer?

Mr. JONES. I think it is the 136th rule. I refer to the clause which provides:

"That the House may discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of any bill referred to it, after acting, without debate, upon all amendments pending and that may be offered."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that, as an amendment to the original section, it comes too late. All amendments to the original section were in order, when that section was under consideration. But the Chair announced, that if no further amendments were to be offered to the original section, the substitute of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JOHNSON] would be in order. None were offered; and the committee then proceeded to the consideration of the substitute. If the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. MOREHEAD] had offered his amendment before the substitute had been taken up by the committee, it would have been in order. But the Chair thinks not after; otherwise there would be no end to this proceeding.

The reading of the substitute was called for, and it was read, as follows:

That any person who is the head of a family and a native-born citizen of the United States, or any person who is the head of a family and had become a citizen prior to the first day of January, 1852, as required by the naturalization laws of the United States, shall, from and after the passage of this act, be entitled to enter, free of cost, one quarter section of vacant and unappropriated public lands, or a quantity equal thereto, to be located in a body in conformity with the legal subdivisions of the public lands, and after the same shall have been surveyed.

Mr. MOREHEAD. I, then, will submit my amendment as an amendment to the substitute. I move to amend, by inserting the word "white" after the word "or" in the second line, so that the clause would read, "or any white person who is the head of a family."

Mr. Chairman, it will readily be perceived that this is an amendment proposed for the sake of form. The object I have in view in offering it, is simply to make a statement to the House, in order that my subsequent conduct may be explained. Under the rules now enforced, it will be impossible for me, or any gentleman, to express views at length upon this subject. It would be wholly impossible. I design, however, some time during the present session, when an opportunity may be presented through some of the bills proposing donations of public lands to railroads, to deliver my views at length upon the subject. I take this occasion to say a few words upon this bill simply for the reason, that when hereafter some of these measures proposing donations of the public lands for particular purposes shall come up, my opposition to this giving away the public domain shall not be attributed to any hostility to any particular measure, or to that particular measure, but to the general principle which all these donations involve. I shall assume the position of my honorable friend who is before me, [Mr. BEALE.] I shall assume that position so far as the old States are concerned, and I shall assume that all the territory which we have acquired by treaty or otherwise, shall be treated in the same manner. This is my only object in proposing my amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I do not intend to consume the time of the committee in the discussion of this subject. If our present land system were under consideration in the committee, the gentleman's amendment would be a very proper one. Our land system, as it now stands, permits any person who has $200, to go and become the possessor of a quarter section of land, even if he be a free negro.

Mr. MOREHEAD. I will relieve the gentleman: If it meet with the approbation of the committee, I will withdraw my amendment.

There was no objection, and the amendment was accordingly withdrawn.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I think the first section is now as perfect as we can make it. I will, therefore, with the consent of the committee, withdraw my substitute, and allow the committee to pass to the second section.

Mr. CONGER. Will it be in order now to offer an amendment to the first section?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it will be in order.

Mr. CONGER. I then offer the following amendment:

And also that every person who has heretofore purchased any land from the United States and paid for the same, shall be entitled to receive back the amount of money so paid, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States, not otherwise appropriated.

And also that any holder of any military bounty land warrant, which entitles such holder to enter any public lands, shall, upon surrendering up such warrant to be canceled, be entitled to receive from the Treasury of the United States so much money as the number of acres of land specified in such warrant may amount to, at the rate of $1.25 per acre.

Mr. HALL. I rise to a point of order. I submit that the amendment is not germane to the subject of the bill, and therefore not in order.

Mr. CONGER. I think it is sufficiently germane to the first section of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the amendment is not germane to the subject of the bill; certainly a part of it is not. He therefore rules it out of order.

Mr. CONGER. I ask for the reading of the first section of the bill and the amendment in connection with it. I think the Chair and the House will then see that it is germane to the subject of the bill.

[Cries of "Object!"]

Mr. CONGER. Then I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] is not in order, upon the ground that it is not germane to the bill. From this decision, the gentleman from Michigan appeals. The question, therefore, is now, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

Mr. KING, of New York. I would like to hear the first section of the bill, with the amendment, read.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois. I object.

Mr. KING. I move that they be read.

The question was put, and the motion was agreed to—ayes 90, noes not counted.

The first section as proposed to be amended with Mr. CONGER's amendment was then read by the Clerk.

The question was then taken upon sustaining the decision of the Chair, and carried in the affirmative—ayes 62, noes 49.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. SACKETT. I move to amend the first section by striking out all after the enacting clause down to the word "shall" in the ninth line, being the following words, viz: "That every man or widow who is the head of a family, and a citizen of the United States"—and to insert the following, viz:

That every person being the head of a family, or widow, or single man over the age of twenty-one years, and a citizen of the United States, or having filed his declaration of intention to become a citizen, as required by law.

I cannot see the propriety of making a distinction, in the persons who shall be the instruments of accomplishing the great benefits to be derived from the operation of this bill in the settlement of the public lands.

Mr. HALL. I will state that the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York is in accordance with the provisions of all our existing preemption laws, and with all we have ever had since preemption laws were first adopted by the Government.

Mr. SACKETT. I supposed the gentleman [Mr. HALL] would be in favor of the amendment, and I wish he would take it off my hands, and address the committee upon it. My voice is so weak that it cannot be heard. It is plain, perhaps, that the object of this bill, which I am in favor of, is to secure the public lands to actual settlers—to those who will go upon, occupy, and cultivate them for five years. If that be so, I ask the friends of the bill, where is the propriety, where the consistency, of limiting the benefits of the bill to the heads of families? Now, it is a well-known fact that a large majority of those who settle in the Western country are young men, who go there for the purpose of beginning their career upon the public lands. It is for the benefit of the Western country to continue that system, and it would be greatly detrimental to it to confine the settlement to the heads of families exclusively, as it is confined by this bill as it now stands. I think there can be no substantial reason assigned for continuing the provision as it now is. The limitation looks to a system of gratuity, and to a system of giving away the public lands to a certain class, for the purpose of benefiting a certain class. It is plain that such provision cannot be justified by any sound principle of legislation. The principle upon which this bill is based is the benefit which will result to the country from the settlement of these lands. If this be so, the young man who goes to the Western country, selects his land, and remains upon it for five years, and cultivates it, is as capable for the accomplishment of the designs and intentions of this bill, and for the carrying out the principles upon which it is based, as any other man. I certainly think that the friends of this bill ought to accede to the justice of this amendment, and agree to the propriety of its adoption. I am decidedly in favor of the bill, and shall vote for it in either case, whether this amendment is adopted or not.

Mr. McMULLIN. I desire to know of the gentleman, if this amendment is adopted, if he means to vote for the bill as amended?

Mr. SACKETT. I have already stated that I shall vote for the bill, whether the amendment be adopted or not; but I think the amendment ought to be adopted. Now, I can see no principle whatever to justify this sort of class legislation, which gives to "A" and refuses to "B." I hope, Mr. Chairman, the amendment will be adopted; and for the purpose of testing the sense of the House upon it, I will at the proper time call for tellers upon it, to see who are in favor of it.

Mr. GAYLORD. I move to amend the last amendment by inserting "and women over twenty-one years of age."

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois. They will never settle there.

Mr. GAYLORD. They have as much right there as bachelors.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I hope the House will vote down the amendment. It makes the range of discussion too wide.

Mr. GAYLORD. If the amendment endangers the passage of the bill, I withdraw it, if there be no objection.

No objection was made, and the amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. In reference to the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SACKETT.] I see that one great difficulty in its application would be to decide what would constitute a settlement and occupancy, in cases where there is no family which can fix a residence upon the public lands.

Mr. SACKETT. If the gentleman will allow me, I will ask him whether the bill, in its provisions, does not provide for the evidence to be presented to the proper authorities of the Government as to what constitutes a settlement; and does not the bill itself determine what shall be sufficient evidence of settlement? And would not that same evidence apply as well in one case as in another? The law requires evidence of five years' actual occupancy and cultivation? There can be no mistake about it.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. There again is the precise difficulty—what constitutes occupancy? There is no means of determining what constitutes occupancy, in cases where there is no family to settle. I think the effect of that amendment will be to lead to evasion and false swearing. I think the bill is sufficiently extensive, and I hope the amendment will be voted down.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. SACKETT, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. FLORENCE. I desire to offer as an amendment, to come in at the end of the first section, the words:

And that each of the surviving, or the widow or children of deceased officers, soldiers, sailors, and marines, who performed duty in the war of 1812, in the revolutionary war, or in any of the Indian wars since 1790, shall be entitled to one hundred and sixty acres of land, to be located in the manner provided by the act of September 28, 1850.

Mr. OLDS. I rise to a point of order upon that amendment. It is not germane to the bill.

Mr. FLORENCE. It is germane. It extends the privileges of the bill.

A VOICE. It has been rejected once.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OLDS] makes the point of order, that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLORENCE] is not in order. The Chair is not prepared to decide the amendment out of order, as it proposes to extend the operation of the bill.

Mr. OLDS. I appeal from the decision.

Mr. FLORENCE. I move to lay the appeal upon the table.

The CHAIRMAN. No such motion can be submitted in Committee of the Whole.

The question was then being taken on the appeal; and there were, on a division—ayes 59, when—

Mr. FLORENCE said: Rather than make any difficulty in the committee, I will withdraw my amendment for the present, and offer it at another time.

The amendment was accordingly withdrawn.

The Clerk then read the second section of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the person applying for the benefit of this act shall, upon application to the register of the land office in which he or she is about to make such entry, make affidavit before the said register, that he or she is the head of a family, and is not the owner of any estate in land, at the time of such application, and has not disposed of any estate in land, to obtain the benefits of this act, and upon making the affidavit as above required and filing the affidavit with the register, he or she shall thereupon be permitted to enter the quantity of land already specified: Provided, however, That no certificate shall be given, or patent issued therefor, until the expiration of five years from the date of such entry; and if, at the expiration of such time, the person making such entry, or if he be dead, his widow, or in case of her death, his heirs or devisee, or in case of a widow making such entry, her heirs or devisee in case of her death, shall prove by two credible witnesses, that he, she, or they have continued to reside upon and cultivate said land, and still reside upon the same and have not alienated the same, or any part thereof, then, in such case, he, she, or they shall be entitled to a patent as in other cases provided for by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee on Agriculture propose to amend this section, by striking out the words, "and is not the owner of any estate in land, at the time of such application, and has not disposed of any estate in land to obtain the benefit of this act," and to insert the following in lieu thereof, viz:

And does not intend to settle upon said land to sell the same on speculation, but in good faith to appropriate it to his or her own exclusive use and benefit; and that he or she has not, directly or indirectly, made any agreement or contract, in any way or manner, with any person or persons whatsoever, by which the title which he or she might acquire from the Government of the United States, should inure, in whole or in part to the benefit of any person except himself or herself; and that he or she is not worth to exceed the sum of $500.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment reported by the Committee on Agriculture, which has been stated by the Chair, and read by the Clerk.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I move to strike out from the amendment of the Committee on Agriculture, the words, "and that he or she is not worth to exceed the sum of $500." The amendment, if adopted, will make this correspond with the first section.

[Cries of "That is right!" "That is right!"]

Mr. HOUSTON. That was stricken out in the first section, and should be, of course, in this.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I should like to have some explanation in regard to this matter, from the gentleman from Tennessee.

A VOICE. The amendment is not debatable.

Mr. STANTON. Is not the question debatable Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not, according to the rule; five minutes are allowed for and five against an amendment which may be offered in committee; but this is one of the amendments that had already been before the committee, and must be understood to have been debated previous to the closing of the debate under the hour rule.

Mr. STANTON. Then I move to strike out the word "herself." The gentleman from Tennessee in his original bill did not have any test of property at all. He was willing that a person might be entitled to the benefits of the bill notwithstanding he was worth $500 or $1,000, and notwithstanding he might own other lands. I understand that the Committee on Agriculture disagreed with him in that particular, and have reported these amendments. The Committee of the Whole sustained the gentleman, and adopted his principle. Now, I do not understand how this corresponds with the condition of the other section.

Mr. JOHNSON. By striking out the $500 limitation it corresponds with what was stricken out in the first section.

Mr. STANTON. There was also stricken out the limitation as to the holding of lands. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. AVERETT. I renew it for the purpose of calling the attention of the committee to one of the most odious features of this odious bill—

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi. I call the gentleman to order, and insist that he shall confine himself to the question whether "herself" shall be stricken out or not, and that he shall not allude to any feature of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remark that from the confusion in the committee he was unable to hear the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia. He proposes that the gentleman shall proceed, with the indulgence of the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I rise to a point of order, and it is this: The gentleman from Ohio offered precisely the same amendment that the gentleman from Virginia now proposes. Upon that amendment the gentleman from Virginia made a speech, and by the consent of the House the amendment was then withdrawn. It is not in order, I think, now to offer the same amendment, and to discuss it.

Mr. AVERETT. I will then withdraw the amendment, and move to strike out all of that part of the bill, commencing at the words "make affidavit," to the end of the section. My purpose in doing this—

The CHAIRMAN. That is not an amendment to the amendment, but it is an amendment to the original section, and it is not now in order. The question now is upon the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. AVERETT. I then move to strike out from the word "and," in the fifth line, to the end of the amendment offered by the committee.

Mr. HOUSTON. That cannot be in order, because it is a mere proposition to strike that out which the committee propose to insert.

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment is not in order. The gentleman proposes to strike out the entire amendment in connection with portions of the bill.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of the committee, and it was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now read the third section of the bill.

Mr. WHITE, of Alabama. I offer the following amendment to the second section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk had already commenced reading the third section, and the Chair is of opinion, unless by unanimous consent, the amendment of the gentleman cannot be received.

Mr. CABLE, of Ohio, objected.

Mr. WHITE. I addressed the Chairman before the Clerk commenced reading the third section, but was not recognized by him.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment proposed by the Committee on Agriculture, which the Chair overlooked, and the gentleman will still have the privilege of offering an amendment to that section.

The committee propose further to strike out the word "affidavit," and to insert the word "same."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE, of Alabama. I submit the following amendment to the second section of the bill:

Provided further, That in the event such heirs or devisees are under the age of fourteen years, they shall not be required to reside upon or to cultivate such land.

Mr. Chairman, the object for which I have offered that amendment is simply to provide for cases of minor heirs, or persons under a certain age, whom you cannot expect to reside upon or to cultivate this land. Now, that second section provides—

"That no certificate shall be given, or patent issued therefor, until the expiration of five years from the date of such entry; and if, at the expiration of such term, the person making such entry, or if he be dead, his widow, or in case of her death, his heirs or devisee, or in case of a widow making such entry, her heirs or devisee in case of her death, shall prove by two credible witnesses that he, she, or they have continued to reside upon and cultivate said land, and still reside upon the same, and have not alienated the same, or any part thereof, then, in such case, he, she, or they shall be entitled to a patent as in other cases provided for by law."

I simply propose that we shall provide for persons of such an age as that we cannot presume they are capable of cultivating the land, and who in all probability will not be able to reside upon it so as to give to all the heirs or devisees of the patentee of the persons who have made the entry the benefit of the act. It leaves the section to require that where persons are capable of cultivating and residing upon the land, to do so; but that where they are not, that they shall not be excluded from the benefits of this bill.

The question was then taken upon the amendment, and it was disagreed to.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I propose to amend by inserting after the word "reside," in the twenty-ninth line, the words "in person." It is a rule of law, Mr. Chairman, that what a man does by another he does by himself; and in order to prevent any construction being given to this section whereby a person by proxy may obtain the benefits of this bill, I propose to insert that the individual who shall have the benefit of this section shall settle and cultivate the land in person. It provides that he shall not send out any other person to occupy it for him, and in that way to obtain title to the land. Those settling upon and improving the public land should be entitled to the benefits of this measure, instead of those desirous of making money, employ others to occupy the land whose labor alone benefits the capitalists, his employer. It is to prevent, in other words, speculation, which may be entered into to obtain the benefits of this bill, without subjecting the speculator to the privations and toil incident to occupation and cultivation of the land.

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WALBRIDGE.] I apprehend that all residence must be in person. No one resides upon land by proxy. An individual may take and hold possession of it by proxy, but certainly he cannot reside upon it by proxy. I think the amendment is unnecessary, and, therefore, I am opposed to it.

The question was then taken upon Mr. WALBRIDGE's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The third section was then read as follows, viz:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the registers of the land office shall note all such applications on the tract books and plats of his office, keep a register of all such entries, and make return to the General Land Office, together with the proof upon which they have been founded.

There being no amendment offered to this section, the committee proceeded to the consideration of the fourth section, which was then read as follows:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That all lands acquired under the provisions of this act, shall in no event become liable to the satisfaction of any debt or debts contracted prior to the issuing the patent therefor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee on Agriculture propose to amend this section by inserting the words "or payment" after the word "satisfaction," and by striking out at the end of the section the words "or debts contracted prior to the issue of the patent therefor."

The question was then taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LETCHER. Is it in order now to move to strike out the fourth section?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order.

Mr. LETCHER. I then submit that motion. I predicate it upon this ground, that that section as it stands is a strict interference with the powers uniformly exercised by the States under the old Confederation, and under the present Constitution. I believe it has been always conceded that the States had a right to pass such local laws as relate to the legal rights and duties of creditor and debtor; but if this provision is to be inserted in this bill, it strikes me that the power heretofore admitted and granted to the States, is at an end in all time to come. If by the insertion of this clause we can undertake to say that the State laws which provide for the collection of debts and for the liability of debtors for their contracts are null and void, then we can undertake to say what shall be the statute of descents within the limits of the several States in which these lands may lie. Now, I apprehend it will hardly be contended that the Federal Government has any constitutional right to interfere in any way whatsoever with those admitted rights of the State Legislatures. They have never undertaken to pass any law which shall diminish or restrict the rights of the creditor, or relieve in any way the debtor from the penalty of his obligations.

A MEMBER. The bankrupt law was passed by Congress.

Mr. LETCHER. It is true. The bankrupt law was passed a few years ago, but public sentiment repealed the law very shortly after. The Constitution itself gives express power to pass a law of bankruptcy, if it shall be uniform. Suppose that, under the provisions of this bill, a man goes into the State of Illinois, and settles there upon the public lands. He contracts debts for the improvement of his lands; and yet the Congress of the United States undertakes to say that the rights which exist between the debtor and creditor in the State of Illinois, shall be null and void; that the obligations which he has incurred after he becomes a resident of that State, shall be set aside: that his property shall not be liable for the payment of his debts, in any way whatsoever, and that he shall be relieved from the obligation which rests upon every other class of debtors within the State of Illinois, or any other State in which the lands may lie. I ask if gentlemen are prepared to assert a power of this sort in the Congress of the United States? Are they willing that a law shall be passed which shall abrogate the State laws of the country—which shall come in and declare that the laws of Illinois, of Indiana, or Wisconsin, are null and void, and which shall undertake, even, to go further than that; for I maintain that they can, with the same propriety, go further, and provide that this land shall descend in a particular way, and shall descend in no other way whatsoever. It seems to me that this is a question of great importance, and one which ought to be seriously considered by this committee before they undertake to insert a clause in this bill which will produce such mischievous results.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I think that the gentleman, with all his acuteness, when he comes to read the section again, will find that he has no basis for his argument. When we come to examine the history of the grant of lands by the Federal Government, we find, for instance, in granting warrants to soldiers engaged in the Mexican war, that the conveyances prior to the issue of the warrant were null and void. We also find that in the act we passed on the 28th of September, 1850, we made any conveyances void until the issue of the patent. No one questions the constitutional power. At present, the fee is in the Government, and the Government makes a proposition. What is it? It is, that if a person settles upon a quarter section of land, and cultivates it for five years, at the expiration of that time we will transfer it to him, and the land shall not be subject to any deed contracted prior to his settling upon the land, or the issue of the patent. Does this come in conflict, in the slightest degree, with State authority? It is merely to control the fee in the Government, and not to have it pass to the individual.

The question was then taken upon Mr. LETCHER's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The fifth section was then read, as follows:

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That if, at any time after filing the affidavit as required in the second section of this act, and before the expiration of the five years aforesaid, it shall be proven by two or more respectable witnesses testifying upon oath, to the satisfaction of the register of the land office, that the person having filed such affidavit shall have actually changed his or her residence, or abandoned the said entry for more than six months at any one time, then, and in that event, the land so entered shall revert back to the Government, and be disposed of as other public lands are now by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee on Agriculture propose to amend this section by striking out the word "testifying."

The question was then taken upon this amendment, and it was agreed to.

The sixth section was then read, as follows:

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That if any individual, now a resident of any one of the States or Territories, and not a citizen of the United States, be at the time of making such application for the benefit of this act, shall have filed a declaration of intention as required by the naturalization laws of the United States, and shall become a citizen of the same before the issuance of the patent, as made and provided for in this act, shall be placed upon an equal footing with the natural born citizens of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee on Agriculture propose to amend this section by striking out the word "natural," before "born," and inserting the word "native."

The question was then taken upon the amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. GROW. I move to strike out the word "now," in the second line of the sixth section. As it now reads, all persons who shall immigrate into the country after the passage of this act, could not avail themselves of its benefits. This section provides that every citizen not naturalized, before he can make his entry of a quarter section under this act, must file a declaration of intention, as required by the naturalization laws of the United States, and he must become a citizen before the issuing of the patent. Why, then, should we make a distinction between foreigners already in the country, and those who may come hereafter? It is proper that you should require them to be naturalized before they take the benefit of this law. I stand not here to make any appeal, specially, in behalf of any class of citizens. I only ask that, in the legislation of the country, all be treated alike. Why should any difference be made in your laws between men, forced by oppression and wrong from the land of their birth, to seek a home in the western wilderness, whether they come in one year or another? After they become citizens, as required by your laws, let them be treated as such, with all the rights and privileges of any citizen. The doctrine of American legislation should be, "equal and exact justice to all men, of whatever state or persuasion, religious or political."

Mr. MOORE, of Pennsylvania. I am opposed to the amendment of my colleague, which would give the benefits of this bill to all foreigners as soon as they land here, for the reason that, I think, we have already sufficient inducements for emigration to this country, as they are now flocking here from various parts of Europe, by thousands and hundreds of thousands; and, if you shall hold out this further inducement, we shall be overflowed with a population from Europe which will neither be for our good nor the good of those who come. We have heard much said, during the debate on this bill, of the liability, if we passed it—of the inducements it would hold out to legislators, to promise an extension of its benefits to all foreigners who might come here, in order to get their votes; and I want to hold out no such inducement for these foreign voters to come here as the amendment of my colleague would hold out; and I am, therefore, opposed to it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I propose to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania by inserting, in lieu of the word "now," which the gentleman proposes to strike out, the words "who was on the 1st day of January, 1852." It will then read:

"That if any individual who was on the 1st day of January, 1852, a resident of any one of the States or Territories, and not a citizen of the United States, but at the time of making such application for the benefit of this act shall have filed a declaration of intention," &c.

That is the way the section should read, and I therefore offer that amendment.

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was agreed to.

The question recurring on the amendment as amended it was put and decided in the negative.

So the amendment as amended was not agreed to.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois. I move to amend the section by striking out in the ninth line the words, "equal footing with the native born," and insert in lieu thereof the words, "equality with other," so as to make it read "upon an equality with other citizens of the United States."

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. By the permission of the gentleman from Illinois, I will say that I think we have fallen into a slight error, and that we had better go back to the last amendment and act understandingly upon it. If the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. [Mr. GROW,] as amended, is disagreed to, we destroy the sense of the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must remind the gentleman from Tennessee that the gentleman from Illinois is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I yield for the present.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the House will agree to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, as amended, it will make this section correspond with the first section of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment has already been passed upon and rejected.

Mr. HOUSTON. I think it was misunderstood, owing to the manner in which the amendments were submitted to the committee by the Chair. It was the impression of a good many members that the amendment was adopted, when; in fact, it was only the amendment to the amendment which was adopted, and hence gentlemen did not vote when the question was put on the amendment as amended.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inform the gentleman from Alabama that he put the question first upon the amendment to the amendment, and then upon the amendment as amended.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am aware that the Chair put the questions correctly, but the error prevailed, and therefore I hope the question will be put again.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee, and to the committee, that as the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to, the word "now" still stands in the section.

Mr. JOHNSON. Very well; then leave it as it is.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois. I will now submit the amendment which I offered just now. I make this motion for the purpose of securing uniformity not only in this section, but in the whole bill. We have two classes of citizens recognized by this bill, one the native born citizens, and the other the naturalized citizens. My amendment will embrace both of these classes. Besides I object to having the word "native" in this bill. I consider it to be a distinction which ought not to be made here. The language of my amendment is equally expressive with that used in the bill, and embraces both classes of citizens, and I hope it will be adopted by the committee.

The question was then taken on Mr. CAMPBELL's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

There being no further amendments to the sixth section, the Clerk read the seventh section, which is as follows:

And be it further enacted, That no individual shall be permitted to make more than one entry under the provisions of this act; and that the Commissioner of the General Land Office is hereby required to prepare and issue such rules and regulations, consistent with this act, as shall be necessary and proper to carry its provisions into effect; and that the registers and receivers of the several land offices shall be entitled to receive the same compensation for any lands patented under the provisions of this act, that they are now entitled to receive when the same quantity of land is entered with money to be paid by the party to whom the patent shall be issued.

The following amendment was reported by the Committee on Agriculture, to come in at the end of the section, viz:

"Provided, however, That all persons entering land under the provisions of this act, shall, as near as may be practicable, in making such entries, be confined to each alternate quarter section, and to land subject to private entry: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to impair or interfere in any manner whatever with existing preemption rights."

The question was put on the amendment reported by the Committee on Agriculture, and it was agreed to.

Mr. BELL. I offer the following as an additional section to the bill:

SEC. — If any officer or soldier who would, if living, have been entitled to the benefit of the act of Congress, passed September 28, 1850, shall have died leaving no widow surviving him, the child or children of such officer or soldier shall be entitled to the benefit of said act; and if there are no children living, then the father or mother of such officer or soldier shall be entitled, or in default of father or mother, the right shall descend to the brothers and sisters of such officer or soldier, in as full a manner as though said soldier or officer had himself received the bounty, any act to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. OLDS. I raise the point of order that that amendment is not germane to the subject of this bill. It proposes to extend the bounty land bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is not in order. It proposes to extend the benefits of another and separate act.

Mr. BELL. Perhaps I may be out of order, but I wish to suggest to the Chair that it embraces the same provision that the Chair ruled to be in order this morning.

The CHAIRMAN. The phraseology of the other amendment was to extend the benefits of this act to another class of persons. The Chair could not rule that out of order. The gentleman's proposition is to extend to a separate class of persons the benefits of another law, and the Chair rules that to be out of order.

Mr. BELL. Very well, sir. I will offer my amendment at the proper time, to some other bill.

Mr. FLORENCE. I now offer the following, as an additional section to the bill:

And that each of the surviving, or the widow or children of deceased officers, soldiers, sailors, and marines, who performed duty in the war of 1812, in the revolutionary war, or in any of the Indian wars, since 1790, shall be entitled to one hundred and sixty acres of land, to be located in the manner provided by the act of September 28, 1850.

Mr. OLDS. I rise to a point of order. The amendment is not germane.

Mr. FLORENCE. Why, yes, it is germane. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to be, in effect, to extend the provisions of the bill to another class of citizens, and he is not prepared upon this ground, to rule it out of order.

Mr. OLDS. I take an appeal from that decision. However, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania does not want to hang a speech upon it, I will allow a vote to be taken upon it.

Mr. FLORENCE. I have something to say upon the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. OLDS. Yes, sir; I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLORENCE] is in order. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OLDS] appeals from that decision of the Chair upon the ground that the amendment is not germane to the bill. The question now is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

The question was taken, and carried in the affirmative.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. FLORENCE. I submit this amendment not with a desire to embarrass the action of the committee. I shall vote for the homestead bill, whether the amendment be adopted or not. I therefore submit this amendment in good faith, because I believe it does only an act of justice to deserving, patriotic, and meritorious citizens, and from a sense of duty to them. In the county which I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor, there are some four or five or six thousand worthy and patriotic men who, during the war of 1812, voluntarily gave their services to their country. They cannot understand, as they say in their petitions which they have sent here, and which I have caused to be referred to the appropriate committees, why there should be a distinction between those who served in the war of 1812, or in any of the Indian wars, and those who served in the Mexican war. Numbers of those persons who were engaged in lucrative business, gave up that business. They left their homes at a great pecuniary sacrifice, to defend the honor of their country and "our starry banner," and were absent six, seven or eight months; and for this patriotic and praiseworthy service they received only eighty acres of land. Some of them, it is true, were not absent so long a time. It is true, some of them were not gone more than three or four months. But these, however, only received forty acres of land. It is known, however, there were persons who only went, during the war with Mexico, from Philadelphia to Fort Mifflin; besides, numbers who did not reach the seat of the Mexican war at all; who received from the Government a bounty of one hundred and sixty acres of land, and three months' extra pay. Now, sir, if there is to be a distribution of the public lands; if the land is to be given to actual settlers—and I acknowledge I am heartily in favor of that measure—the soldiers of the war of 1812, and those who were engaged in the Indian wars, now come forward and ask Congress that justice may be done them. They are, I assure the committee, a class of citizens equally as meritorious, and quite as patriotic, sir, as those brave men who justly received the benefits of the provisions of the act of September 28, 1850, giving them one hundred and sixty acres of land. They believe they are as much entitled to the bounty of the Government as those who were engaged in the Mexican war; and they aver it strongly in their petitions to Congress. They do not desire to detract from the patriotism, valor, love of country, or the merits of those who were engaged in that war; but they think that they are equally entitled to the bounty of the Government, and to the same extent of power. Indeed, sir, they ask it as a right.

As I said before, I shall vote for this bill, giving land to the landless and homes to the homeless; whether this amendment be adopted or not; but a sense of duty impelled me to offer the amendment I have presented at this time, because petitions have been pouring into this House, not only from the first Congressional district in my State, not only from the city of Philadelphia, but from the whole State of Pennsylvania, and from some of the other States of the Union. And I believe the people from any portion of the Union do not desire to interfere with this method of awarding justice to the class of citizens who I desire may have only justice done them. I have not heard a single word of remonstrance, or do I know that any objection has been presented here against such a manifest act of propriety. I have not even heard that a single remonstrance has been presented here against the passage of the bill, giving one hundred and sixty acres of land to actual settlers, and hence I shall vote for it.

I have no conscientious or constitutional scruples to deter me. I look through the vista of time; and the good to come, from the occupancy of the waste lands, now lying idle, looms up before me in majestic grandeur, and bids me press forward hopefully and surely in behalf of thousands who may, by the passage of the homestead bill, be made to occupy a position in our happy country which "Nature and Nature's God" intended they should. Homes for the homeless, lands for the landless, is soul-inspiring music to me. The beneficence of the act alone draws me towards it, and my heart tells me I am right in advocating its humane provisions. Pass this bill, give to the soldiers, sailors, and marines, of the war of 1812, and of the Indian wars, or their heirs, without reference to sex or age, their meed of justice. Many of them, doubtless, will at once occupy their land. They will estimate the value of it the more highly, perhaps, because it was acquired by their, or their parents' toil, in the service of their country. As they put their spade into the virgin soil, they will feel an assurance of possession which will incite them to habits of industry. The land they own, and which was acquired by toil, though in the wilderness, will soon "blossom as the rose." There is LAND enough for ALL. My friend from Ohio [Mr. OLDS] the other day, in the House, quoted from the Methodist hymn-book, with the pages of which I am somewhat familiar, and ever since I have given a thought to the subject of the public lands, either as bounty to our country's patriotic defenders, whether by sea or land, in any of the wars of the Republic, or in giving them to actual settlers in limited quantities, the following paraphrase of a verse of a well known hymn, has involuntarily almost risen to my lips. I fancied (the bill having become a law) that hundreds who had heretofore been suffering in poverty and in distress, who had no hope of happiness in this world, beyond the scanty meal acquired by hard labor and the sweat of their sun-burnt brow, who felt and painfully experienced it daily, "as they labored from early dawn till late at night," they were hopelessly

"inured to toil and bitter bread," raising their voices as they wended their way, with the wives of their bosoms, and the children of their loins, towards literally their "promised land," in praise to their Maker and Preserver, for his goodness to them, and singing right merrily:

"Now, I can read my little clear
To LAND, and HOME, and REST,
Without a thought to trouble me,
Or pang within my breast."

I need not wade into a mass of figures to prove the fact that there are millions of acres of unsold land. It has been demonstrated clearly enough, if my memory serves me correctly, by gentlemen who have preceded me, especially in the speech made early in the debate upon the homestead bill, by my talented colleague, [Mr. DAWSON.] The truth that there are "millions of acres want hands" to cultivate them, is admitted; that it is the duty of man to convey them to his suffering brother, is almost unquestioned. How beautifully and eloquently has the poet Duganne, who has written in this wise, illustrated it:

THE ACRES AND THE HANDS.

"The earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof,"
Said God's most holy word;
The water hath fish, and the land hath fesh,
And the air hath many a bird;
And the soil is teeming o'er all the earth,
And the earth hath numberless lands;
Yet millions of hands want acres,
While millions of acres want hands.

Sunlight, and music, and glad some flowers,
Are over the earth spread wide;
And the good God gave these gifts to men—
To men who on earth abide.
Yet thousands are toiling in poisonous gloom,
And shackled with iron bands,
And millions of hands want acres,
And millions of acres want hands.

'Tis writ that "ye shall not muzzle the ox
That treadeth out the corn;"
Yet, behold, ye shackle the poor man's hands,
That have all earth's burdens borne;
The land is the gift of a bounteous God,
And to labor his word commands;
Yet millions of hands want acres,
While millions of acres want hands.

Who hath ordained that the few should hoard
Their millions of useless gold,
And rob the earth of its fruits and flowers,
While profitless soil they hold?
Who hath ordained that a parchment scroll,
Should fence round miles of lands?
While millions of hands want acres,
And millions of acres want hands.

'Tis a glaring lie on the face of day—
This robbery of men's rights—
'Tis a lie that the word of the Lord disowns,
'Tis a curse that burns and blights;
And 'twill burn and blight, till the people rise
And swear, while they break their bands,
That the hands shall henceforth have acres,
And the acres henceforth have hands.

How truly these beautiful lines express the whole truth! How forcibly must it come home to the heart of every one who reads them, that, beyond the peradventure of a doubt, it is our duty here to pass the homestead bill, now under discussion, into a law. Duganne has also written, upon this fruitful and interesting subject, another sweet poem, which I will here introduce:

A billion of acres of unsold lands,
Are lying in grievous dearth;
And millions of men in the image of God,
Are starving all over the earth;
O tell me, ye sons of America,
How much men's lives are worth?

Ten hundred millions of acres good,
That never knew spade nor plow;
And millions of souls in our goodly land,
Are pining in want, I trow;
And orphans are crying for bread this day,
And widows in misery bow.

To whom do these acres of land belong?
And why do they thirstless lie?
And why is the widow's lament unheard,
And stifled the orphan's cry?
And why are the poor house and prison full,
And the gallows' tree built high?

Those millions of acres belong to man!
And his claim is—that he needs it.
And his title is signed by the Hand of God—
Our God—who the raven feeds!
And the starving soul of each famished man,
At the throne of justice pleads!

Ye may not heed it, ye haughty men,
Whose hearts as rocks are cold;
But the time will come when the fiat of God
In thunder shall be told!
For the voice of the great I AM hath said,
That "the lands shall not be sold!"

I said, sir, I experienced no scruples in voting for the homestead bill. Its constitutionality and justice, I think, has been admitted by the great apostle of American Democracy, Thomas Jefferson, who has written—"I set out on this ground, which I suppose to be self-evident, that the earth belongs, in usufruct, to the living."

The immortal sage of the Hermitage, Andrew Jackson, said, in his message in 1832: "To afford every American citizen of enterprise the opportunity of securing an independent freehold, it seems to me best to abandon the idea of raising a future revenue out of the public lands."

Without quoting further—for I could do so covering several pages—it may be proper to mention that the power of Congress to grant these lands to actual settlers, has been affirmed by President Polk, by Senators Cass, Douglas, Webster, Houston, Walker, and a host of others. In this House, sir, I have listened with delight to the eloquent and truthful speeches made upon this subject. I cannot do better than make selections from these, because no argument I can advance will add to the reasons why this bill should be speedily enacted into a law.

Mr. McMULLIN. I think it is time to stop this debate. I could bring up a case in my own district, much more important than the one given by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FLORENCE,] but I will not trouble the committee with it.

A MEMBER. Oh, bring it up.

Mr. McMULLIN. There was a regiment in my district mustered into service in the war of 1812, and served twenty-eight days, yet they are excluded from the benefits of the act of 1850. I shall vote against the gentleman's amendment.

The question was then taken upon Mr. FLORENCE's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. HENN. I would ask the Chair whether the proviso offered by the Committees on Agriculture and Manufactures was adopted?

The CHAIRMAN. It was adopted.

Mr. HENN. I now ask whether it is in order to amend the original section before the proviso?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order.

Mr. HENN. I move to strike out all after the word "effect," in the seventh line, to the word "issue" in the twelfth line, and to insert the following:

And that the registers and receivers of the United States land offices shall be entitled to receive the same fees for their services under this act, that they are now entitled to receive for cash entries: Provided, That their whole compensation shall in no case exceed three thousand dollars to each; And provided further, That the fees aforesaid shall be paid by the settler at the time of making the proof required under the act.

The object of the amendment is this: It proposes to pay the officers who do the work, instead of the officers who deliver the patent. It proposes to pay the officer who takes the proof, and limits their pay, while the original bill proposes, as I understand it, to pay those who deliver the patent. Now, I wish to pay those who actually do the work, and not those who deliver the patent, because the patent is sometimes not issued in four or five years after the one who took the proof has gone out of office.

Mr. AVERETT. I am opposed to that amendment. I will, however, take this occasion to remark that we are destroying the value of the public lands. [Laughter.] We are about to pass a measure that will add enormously to the expenses of administering the public lands. While we are crippling the Treasury, we are, at the same time, adding new burdens to it.

Now, I would appeal to every gentleman who has had anything to do with carrying out the provisions of the bounty land law of 1850, to look to the trouble—to look to the enormous increase of labor and expense which that bill has imposed upon the Government, and see what additional expense will be incurred by the passage of this bill. There is no telling how much they will be increased.

When you look at the various provisions of this bill, the proofs that are to be exhibited as the conditions on which the benefits of the bill are to rest, gentlemen must see that agents will be required to take those proofs, in addition to the surveyors, clerks of bureaus, registers, and receivers, and recorders now employed. And, sir, if members of Congress are to attend to the rights and interests of their constituents under this law, as they have done under the bounty land law of 1850, they will have no time to attend to any other business.

Mr. McMULLEN. Will my colleague allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. AVERETT. No, sir, I cannot. I have but five minutes. I repeat what I said in my speech the other day, that by this measure, you are adding enormously to the machinery and to the expenses of the Government. And you are not only doing that, but you are, at the same time, diminishing the resources and means of the tax payers who bear the expenses of the Government. Yes, sir, you are increasing our burdens, and diminishing our ability to bear them at the same time.

By the passage of this act, you will find the value of lands will be diminished in the whole country, not only in the old States, but in the new States. To the man who intends to live, die, and have his bones buried on his land, their nominal value may not be a very material matter; but when lands have to be sold to pay taxes or debts, or when they have to be sold in order that the proceeds may go as assets in the hands of executors or administrators, or for division among distributees, it becomes a more serious matter. Sir, it seems to me that the passage of this bill will diminish the value of lands, in many instances ruinously. That is a practical matter, which every man, who will look at it attentively, must see and ought to appreciate. Here, then, while you increase the expenses of the Government, you diminish the means of paying those expenses. You add to the burdens of the Treasury, and increase burdens upon the people, while you diminish their ability to bear them. With due respect to the friends of this bill, I say there is not a feature in it which does not deserve the denunciation of every honest patriot.

The question was then taken upon Mr. FLORENCE's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. HEBARD. I move that the committee do now rise.

[Cries of "No!" "No!" "No!"]

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi. I am opposed to that motion. We ought to get through with this bill.

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. That question is not debatable.

The question was then taken, and upon a division there were—ayes 60, noes 48.

Mr. McMULLIN demanded tellers, which were ordered; and Messrs. CAMPBELL, of Illinois, and FOWLER were appointed.

The question was again taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 76, noes 31.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman (Mr. HEBARD) reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly House bill No. 7, being a bill to encourage agriculture, commerce, &c., and had come to no conclusion thereon.

PLANK ROAD COMPANY.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that we may take up and pass a bill from the Senate (No. 36,) which my colleague, [Mr. ASHE,] not now in his seat, had in charge. It is a bill to authorize a plank road company to extend their road through one corner of the land granted for arsenal purposes in Fayetteville: It is important that it should be passed.

There being no objection, the bill was taken up and read a first and second time by its title, as follows: "A resolution granting the right of way to the Fayetteville and Central Plank Road Company."

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would inquire if the road does not cut the grounds in two?

Mr. STANLY. It rather benefits than injures the public grounds there.

Mr. DOCKERY. It cuts off some fourteen or fifteen acres, but I understand it will work no injury to the lot belonging to the United States, but is an advantage to it.

The bill was then ordered to be read a third time, and having been read a third time, it was passed.

Mr. DOCKERY. I rise to a privileged motion. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table. The latter motion was agreed to.

PROPOSED RECESS.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that we now take up the resolution in regard to the cleansing of this House to prepare it for the summer session. It is now under the operation of the previous question, and the vote can be taken without consuming much time.

[Cries of "Agreed!" "Agreed!"]

The SPEAKER. If the Chair hears no objection, the resolution referred to will be taken up and reported to the House.

Mr. CABLE, of Ohio. I move that the House do now adjourn.

[Cries of "No!" "No!" "No!" all over the Hall.]

The question was taken on the motion to adjourn, and it was lost.

No objection being made, the resolution above referred to was reported to the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be authorized and directed to have the Hall refitted and cleansed for the summer session, and that the House adjourn on Tuesday, the first day of June, until Friday, the fourth of June, in order to allow the usual time for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. An amendment, offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GAYLORD,] is pending; which is to strike out the words "Tuesday, the first day of June, until Friday, the fourth day of June," and insert, "thirteenth of May until the seventeenth of May;" and upon this the previous question has been demanded.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. I ask that the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. JOHNSON] will withdraw his call for the previous question for a moment; I wish to make an inquiry of him.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no control over it.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. JOHNSON] if these repairs have not usually been made under the direction of the Committee on Accounts? I understand from gentlemen, who have served upon that committee, that such repairs have usually been made under the direction of that committee.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will answer the gentleman for his satisfaction, as well as that of the House. Here are the last three precedents, by which it is shown how this thing has been done:

May 18, 1848. Resolved, That when the House meets on Monday next, it adjourn to meet on the following Thursday, to afford an opportunity for fitting the Hall for summer occupation.

May 29, 1850. Resolved, That when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet at eight o'clock, A.M., to-morrow, for the purpose of adjourning from that hour over to Monday next, so as to enable the officers of the House to have the Hall cleaned and refitted for summer session.

Ordered, That the Clerk of the House be authorized and directed to have the Hall cleaned and refitted for summer session.

The question being on seconding the demand for the previous question,

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, called for tellers, which were ordered; and Messrs. JOHNSON and ORR appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 78, noes 39; the Speaker voting in the affirmative to make a quorum.

So the previous question received a second, and the main question was ordered to be put.

The question next recurring on the adoption of the amendment,

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, called for the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

Mr. MASON. I ask for tellers on the adoption of the amendment.

Tellers were not ordered.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the amendment, and it was agreed to, on a division—ayes 69, noes 62.

The SPEAKER. The question is now upon the adoption of the resolution as amended.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted, and upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of order. It is this: That the House was divided, and the Chair was putting the question, when the gentleman from Tennessee rose; and it is too late to move the reconsideration of the vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] has a right to move to reconsider the vote. The Chair sustains the objection of the gentleman from Tennessee upon the left [Mr. STANTON] in this, that it is not in order to address the Chair while the Chair is in the act of dividing the House. There is an express rule to that effect. It is not very often observed, however, as the gentleman is very well aware.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. JONES. I demand the yeas and nays upon that. We lose two weeks if we adopt this amendment.

Mr. MASON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and there were, upon a division—ayes 55, noes 66.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. SWEETSER. I move to lay the resolution upon the table.

Mr. STANLY. I demand the yeas and nays upon that proposition.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ORR. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I ask the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR] to withdraw his motion for a moment to allow me to report a bill.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. That cannot be done; I have a privileged motion pending.

The question was then taken on the motion to adjourn, and there were, on a division—ayes 81, noes 45.

So the House adjourned to meet to-morrow at twelve o'clock.

PETITIONS, &c.

The following petitions, memorials, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. FLORENCE: The memorial of John W. Boleau, E. W. Hutter, William Hundertmark, and 90 other citizens of Philadelphia, petitioning Congress to pass a law granting 160 acres of land to soldiers of the war of 1812, the Indian wars, and Florida war, &c.

By Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee: The memorial of the citizens of Fairfax and Alexandria counties, Virginia, praying for a reconstruction of the Long Bridge.

By Mr. CHANDLER: The memorial of Thomas Sully, John Neagle, and other artists, of Philadelphia, asking that P. F. Rothwell, of that city, be employed to paint an historical picture for Congress.

By Mr. DURKEE: The memorial of the Mayor and Council of Racine, Wisconsin, in relation to the improvement of the harbor at that place.

By Mr. WELCH: The petition of citizens of Gallia county, Ohio, asking five years' half-pay for Mary Hutchings.

By Mr. RIDDLE: The petition of Thomas Clements, John W. Davis, and 103 other citizens of Kent county, State of Delaware, praying for the enactment into a law of the bill now pending before Congress, for the encouragement of agriculture, manufactures, and other branches of industry, by granting to every man who will settle on and cultivate the same, 160 acres of public land, as a homestead.

By Mr. MACE: The petition of Thomas Lewis, of Carroll county, Indiana, asking to be indemnified for money paid the register of the land office at Crawfordsville, on the purchase of land, which was misapprehended.

By Mr. JOHNSON, of Ohio: The petition of W. F. De La Mater and 97 others, praying for a mail route from Coshocton, via Roscoe, Simmons's Run, Mohawk Valley, to New Castle, in Coshocton county, Ohio.

Also, the petition of James Douglass and 42 others, on the same subject.

By Mr. McNAIR: The resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania, in opposition to the Parker patent.

Also, three petitions of Israel Thomas and 93 others, citizens of Montgomery county, Pennsylvania, and also surviving officers, soldiers, seamen, and marines, and widows and children of those deceased, who served in the war of 1812, praying Congress to modify the bounty land act of September 28, 1850, so as to give to each person to be benefited thereby 160 acres of land.

By Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana: A joint resolution of the Legislature of said State, relative to bounty lands.

By Mr. PARKER, of Indiana: The petition of M. L. Bandy, Samuel Hazzard, and 238 others, citizens of Henry and Madison counties, Indiana, praying for a mail route from New Castle to Pendleton.

By Mr. HASCALL: The petition of William Parker, an Indian chief, for an increase of pension, with pension certificate and accompanying documents.

By Mr. GORMAN: A joint resolution of the Legislature of Indiana, in relation to bounty lands.

Also, the petition of Nelson Robinson and others, for a mail route from Brownstown, Indiana, to Bloomington, in said State.

Also, the petition of Wilson Jones and others, for the improvement of the Falls of the Ohio river.

By Mr. HAWS: The memorial of Roswell B. Mason and William Ballard, asking payment for certain property belonging to them; which they allege has been taken and used by the Government, without compensation to them.

By Mr. KING, of New York: The petition of heirs of John De Groat, of the New York Artillery Continental line, for eighty dollars, bounty and interest, and bounty land.

By Mr. SCHERMERHORN: The memorial of 140 citizens of the city of Rochester, New York, praying for free and unrestricted commerce between the United States and Canada.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, May 11, 1852.

Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

Mr. WADE. Mr. President, I have a petition, numerous signed, by citizens of Logan county, in the State of Ohio, remonstrating against the passage of a bill of the House of Representatives, now pending before this body, to extend the time for the location of land warrants in that military district; which also provides for extending the time for making returns of land warrants in that district. I have also a letter, explanatory of their views of that bill, which I present, and move that the memorial and letter be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COOPER presented the memorial of Thos. Fitnam, late Warden of the Penitentiary of the District of Columbia, praying that an amount paid by him for messenger hire may be refunded; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Also, the petition of the administrator of William Thompson, praying to be allowed "depreciation pay," for services during the war of the Revolution; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a memorial, addressed to the Congress of the United States, by Thomas Sully, Rembrandt Peale, John Nagle, John Sartain, and about twenty-five other artists of Philadelphia, praying Congress to employ Mr. Peter F. Rothwell, a distinguished American artist, to execute certain historical pictures for the illustration and adornment of the Capitol or President's House. I need not say a word in reference to the character of the artist to whom reference is made: He is known as one of the most eminent historical painters of the country, who has executed several highly creditable pictures, one of which is now in the rotunda of the Capitol, representing Patrick Henry, on the occasion of one of his great speeches at Williamsburg. Sir, I will not detain the Senate by any further remarks, but I will move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on the Library; and I desire to give notice that I shall at some future day, call up the resolution which I offered in reference to the employment of Mr. Healy and Mr. Leutze, to paint historical pictures, and shall add to it the name of Mr. Rothwell.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. SUMNER presented the petition of citizens of Massachusetts, praying that a better observance of the Sabbath may be ensured, by Congress passing a law prohibiting the transportation of the mails on Sunday; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. BROOKE presented the petitions of Wm. B. Yerby, Charles Neville Simms, James H. Lusby, Caleb W. Litchfield, and Madison Gassaway, assistants to the commission to run and mark the boundary line between the United States and Mexico, and who were discharged in 1851 by an order of the Secretary of the Interior, praying the settlement of their accounts, and an allowance for their outlays; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MALLORY presented an additional document relative to the claim of Kennedy and Darling; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CHASE presented the memorial of the assistant marshals for taking the Seventh Census in Fayette county, Ohio, praying additional compensation; which was ordered to be laid on the table.

Also, two petitions of citizens of Jefferson county, Ohio, praying that the bill now pending before Congress, granting to every man who is the head of a family and a citizen of the United States, one hundred and sixty acres of land, may become a law; which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, a memorial of citizens of Logan county, Ohio, praying that the transportation of the mails on Sunday may be prohibited by law; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, a petition of merchants and citizens of Cincinnati, praying the erection of a custom-house in that city; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, a petition of citizens of Indiana, praying for the construction of another canal around the Falls of the Ohio, on the Indiana side of the river; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. BRODHEAD presented three petitions of citizens of Montgomery county, Pennsylvania, praying a modification of the bounty land law; which were ordered to be laid on the table.

Mr. UNDERWOOD presented two petitions of citizens residing in the Mississippi Valley, praying the construction of a new canal around the Falls of the Ohio; which were referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. FELCH presented the petition of Rockwell Manning, praying compensation for services, and expenses in transporting the mails not required by his contract; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of citizens of Milford, New Hampshire, praying the adoption of measures for the amicable adjustment of international controversies; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. RUSK. I have been requested to present the petition of Benjamin Crawford, in behalf of the Pittsburg association of steam-boat engineers, in relation to the explosion of steam-boilers and other accidents to steam vessels on the western waters. Mr. Crawford is a practical engineer, and represents the views of a number of them. A bill has been reported to the Senate, having for its object the adoption of some rules for the preservation of life on board of steamboats, which they pray Congress to pass into a law. The number of accidents that have occurred on board steamboats call loudly upon Congress to afford, if possible, some remedy. As the memorial states some matters connected with the subject with which I presume the members of the Senate are not familiar, I move that it be printed for the use of the Senate.

The motion was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. DODGE, of Wisconsin, presented a petition of Hiram Brown, and others, remonstrating against the renewal of Cyrus H. McCormick's patent for a reaping machine; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

PETITION WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, it was Ordered, That the petition of Anthony Villard and James Ralichon de Saint Vital, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives was received by Mr. FORNEY, its Clerk, announcing that it had passed a joint resolution from the Senate, granting the right of way to the Fayetteville and Central Plank Road Company.

WAR STEAMER FOR HARBOR DEFENSE.

Mr. MALLORY. I move that all prior orders be postponed, for the purpose of taking up the joint resolution authorizing the completion of a war steamer for harbor defense. Notice was given of intention to call it up to-day, by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs; and, in his absence, I have been requested to make the motion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I hope the gentleman will allow me to present a petition. I will also say to him that I was under a promise to call up to-day a bill which was engrossed and ready for its passage. I refer to the bill in relation to agencies for claims. I promised the gentleman from North Carolina that I would call it up to-day. I hope that the Senator from Florida will consent that that bill may have preference.

Mr. MALLORY. I withdraw my motion for the purpose of allowing petitions to be presented; but I wish, at the same time, to say to the honorable Senator from Kentucky, that the honorable Senator from New Jersey [Mr. Srockton] was entitled to the floor last week on this resolution, but gave way, as I understand, for other Senators. He is now prepared to address the Senate on that subject.

Various petitions having been presented, Mr. MALLORY renewed his motion.

Mr. SHIELDS. I hope the honorable Senator from Florida will postpone it for a few moments, in order to allow us to get through with the morning business.

Mr. MALLORY. The hour of one is approaching, and at that time the special order of the day will come up. The joint resolution cannot be considered to-day, if it is not now taken up. As I before stated, the Senator from New Jersey is ready to proceed, and I hope the Senate will give him an opportunity.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate accordingly resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the joint resolution authorizing the completion of a war steamer for harbor defense.

Mr. STOCKTON. Mr. President, when the chairman of the Naval Committee announced to the Senate his intention to call up the resolution now under consideration, he stated that the Senator from New Jersey—myself—felt great interest in the subject. It is quite true; I do feel great, very great interest, in the success of this resolution, and I have no doubt that the result will show that I am not the only Senator who feels deeply interested in the prosperity and safety of New York city. I am interested, principally, because I am of opinion that the defenses of that city require the immediate attention of Congress, and partly because one of my constituents—a gentleman of reputation and usefulness—has been, in my opinion, unfairly, ungenerously, unjustly treated by the Government. I do not mean by the present administration of the Navy, because I understand that this whole matter was, by his remarkable predecessor, placed beyond his control.

There was a report made by the Naval Committee, at the time this resolution was first presented to the Senate. I ask that it may now be read. It will probably relieve me from the disagreeable duty of saying anything further as to the conduct of the late Administration:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred so much of the President's message and accompanying documents as relates to naval affairs, having had under consideration that part of the report of the Secretary of the Navy which refers to the construction of a war-steamer by Robert L. Stevens, report:

That on January 13, 1842, the Board of Commissioners of the Navy recommended Mr. Stevens's plan for a steamer, to be ball and bomb proof, to the consideration of the Secretary of the Navy. Shortly afterwards Mr. Stevens submitted to Congress a printed copy of his plan. The Chamber of Commerce of New York, on the 15th of February, 1842, recommended to Congress the plan of Mr. Stevens.

A joint board of officers of the Army and Navy, to wit: Colonels Totten, Thayer, Talcott, and Captain Huger, Commodores Stewart and Perry, Captain Stringham, and Lieutenant Newman, appointed for that purpose, convened in New York the 8th of July, 1841, to witness, superintend, and report upon Mr. Stevens's experiments with a bomb and ball proof target, suited to the sides of a vessel. The experiments were made in their presence, and a report of the board submitted to the Department in favor of Mr. Stevens's proposed plan of construction.

On the 14th of April, 1842, Congress passed an act authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to contract with Mr. Stevens for a war-steamer, shot and ball proof, to be constructed principally of iron, upon the plan of Mr. Stevens, not to cost more than the average of the steamers Missouri and Mississippi, and appropriated $250,000 for the purpose.

On the 10th of February, 1843, Mr. Stevens entered into contract with Mr. Uphur, Secretary of the Navy, to build a war-steamer, "to be shot and ball proof against the artillery now in use on board vessels of war."

In order to launch a vessel of the size and description of the one contracted for, Mr. Stevens found it necessary to excavate, and erect at his own, and an enormous expense, a dry-dock of capacity sufficient to build her in and float her out. This, of course, involved the necessity of delay in her construction; though while engaged in making the dry-dock, he was also assiduously engaged in procuring the materials, fashioning the patterns, and organizing the preliminary details for an undertaking of such magnitude and importance.

In December, 1843, Mr. Henshaw, who succeeded Mr. Uphur as Secretary of the Navy, declined making the necessary payments for materials. In November following, a second contract, very full, minute, and particular, was made with Mr. Stevens, which was followed by a supplemental contract with John Y. Mason, Secretary, in December, 1844, and which provided for the payments on account of the contract. Mr. Stevens then prosecuted with vigor the performance of his duties; and while so engaged, on the 9th of December, 1845, was again arrested in the execution of his contract, by an order from Mr. Bancroft, stopping all further proceedings under the contract, and refusing further payments until the plan for the steamer was furnished. Yet, at this very time, the Department was in possession of the plan of Mr. Stevens, furnished when the original contract was first made, and a further statement of his plan furnished in November, 1844. Thus a second time he was stopped in his work. His health being seriously impaired, he was ordered to Europe by his physician.

In January, 1847, Mr. Stevens applied to Mr. Mason, then Secretary, for an extension of time in which to complete the steamer, and satisfactorily accounted for the causes of whatever delay had been suffered. After more than eighteen months, an additional contract was made, reciting the former, and extending the time of completion to four years from the date of the last. By these several contracts, the most minute details of the work were given, and the complete security for the execution of the project, and every proper safeguard, was provided against loss by the United States.

Hardly a year, however, was permitted to elapse, when, in August, 1849, Mr. Secretary Preston refused to make any further payments to Mr. Stevens on account, and the work was again stopped. Mr. Stevens was then in Europe, engaged in obtaining better materials for some portions of the steamer than could be obtained in this country. Contracts were made by him in Europe for such materials. After which he immediately returned home, and urged the Secretary to permit him to proceed according to contract. Mr. Preston, however, declined taking any other step than to refer the matter to Congress.

Whatever delay took place in the performance of this contract, was indispensable to its faithful and successful execution. The necessity for these delays was not, it is believed, properly appreciated by the Navy Department. The experiments necessary to test the quality of the materials, and demonstrate the details of the plan, involved the consumption of much time. The experiments necessary to establish and improve the character of the propeller which was finally adopted, also required much time. Even from this delay the Government derived the advantage of availing itself of this propeller, in the construction of the Princeton; which was thus proved to be superior to any other then in use, or indeed since adopted. Workshops, together with a steamboat, were required to be built for those experiments. Also a large dry-dock was constructed, with a steam-engine, punching and drilling machines, tools, &c., and large pumps, which have kept the dock free from water ever since its completion, at very great expense. One third of the dry-dock within which the Government iron steamer was to have been built, was excavated from solid rock. All this consumed and required unremitting personal exertion and supervision, and large expenditures of money, for which no remuneration has been made. But all delay was satisfactorily explained before the several renewals of the contract, at each period of such renewal.

When the contractor was first arrested, by Mr. Secretary Bancroft, he was in advance, and liable for materials—principally for heavy plates of iron from Pennsylvania, about $40,000, which was subsequently paid to him. He is now in advance about $30,000, also for heavy plates and tubes for the boiler, &c., from England. Yet the Government now proposes to sell his property to reimburse itself for previous payments on his contract, for non performance of the same, performance of which has been prevented by the action of the Government itself.

On the 21st January, 1851, Commodore Skinner addressed Mr. Stevens, and informed him that the Navy Department, considering the contract void, designed to sell, shortly, the materials collected by him for the purpose of executing it according to his several agreements.

To sum up the whole subject, it appears that Congress, by the act of 14th of April, 1842, directed a Secretary of the Navy to make a contract with Robert L. Stevens for a war-steamer, and appropriated a specific amount of money towards the construction proposed. The contract was executed. Mr. Stevens, in good faith, proceeded to perform all his obligations. The contract was afterwards made more specific, its minutest details enumerated, and the time for its completion extended by a succeeding Secretary. The amplest security for its faithful execution was required and given. Officers of the United States were appointed to superintend the receipt of materials provided, and payments for such materials were made by the Government from time to time. A subsequent Secretary of the Navy, without any previous notice to the contractor, suddenly suspended the execution of the contract, and refused the payments stipulated therein to be made; leaving the contractor bound to pay large sums for the materials for which he had contracted in the prosecution of his work. Another Secretary renewed the contract, and extended the time for its execution. The contractor again vigorously and actively applied himself to the execution of his contract. While thus industriously employed, another Secretary again arrested his work, and finally suspended all payments, and referred the subject to Congress. The present Secretary considers himself bound by the acts of his predecessor, and treats the contract as at an end, and Congress having omitted to act on the subject, has given notice to Mr. Stevens, under the power to sell, contained in the mortgages executed by the contractor, that the materials collected by him will be sold for the benefit of the Government.

It is, therefore, apparent that, without some legislative action by Congress, the contractor, who is willing and desirous of fulfilling his engagements in good faith, entered into by the direction and under the authority of Congress, will, by Executive interposition, be subjected (against right, as your committee believe) to very heavy and unjust losses, while the Government will lose the advantages to be derived from the genius, skill, and science of one of the most accomplished naval architects in the country, in the construction of that very sort of war-steamer which the service requires.

Your committee, therefore, on full consideration of the whole subject, recommend the adoption of the following joint resolution:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to have completed, without any unnecessary delay, the war steamer contracted for with Robert L. Stevens, in pursuance of an act of Congress passed April 14, 1842.

Mr. President, I should have felt disposed to leave this report, and the unanimous recommendation of the Committee on Naval Affairs, without a word of comment, to the Senate, if I had not been asked to make some explanation, and if the importance of the subject of which it treats, at the present juncture of time, did not seem to require from me some few remarks. Considering the relation which the city of New York bears to this Government, and to the whole country, the committee are of opinion that every reasonable preparation for her defense in time of war, with a maritime Power, ought to be adopted.

I will not dilate on the importance, in a military or naval point of view, of that harbor. Its great importance must be obvious to all minds, who have given the subject of national defense any consideration. But I must say, that while thus important, it is the most exposed, perhaps, of any other important city of the first class on the seaboard. Sir, our defenses require immediate attention. The signs of the times are premonitory of war and revolution. Almost every arrival from Europe informs us of warlike preparation by the great Powers of that continent. Upon the throne of France—I say throne, for in fact Louis Napoleon is monarch, and supreme arbiter of the destinies of France, as much as Napoleon the Great was in his zenith—upon the throne of France now sits a man, whom the necessities of his position seem to compel to a rivalry of his renowned kinsman and predecessor. If we examine the history of Europe, we will find that since the time of Charlemagne, whenever France was under the control of a bold, restless, ambitious, or unscrupulous monarch, she was invariably engaged in long and bloody wars with her neighbors.

In addition to the national propensity to interfere with the affairs of her neighbors, which modern history shows is the characteristic of the French, as we were eloquently told the other day in the able and instructive speech of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] they have, as they believe, wrongs to avenge, and dishonor to wipe away. France was never more powerful than she is now. Near thirty years have enabled her to recruit the wars of the Emperor; and for twenty years past, she has assiduously exerted all her resources to regain that military efficiency, which has always given her a commanding ascendancy in the affairs of the world. She has regained it. She is at present the cause of disquietude and alarm to all the contiguous powers. She stands in the panoply and attitude of defiance; and no one can say how soon, or where, she will not pour her mighty armies.

But all will agree that no great European war can take place without endangering our peaceful relations with one or other of the belligerents. We are admonished, therefore, not to neglect those preparatory defenses which, in war, would be indispensable for the protection of our sea-board.

We had some severe lessons on this subject during the late war with Great Britain, and it would be the height of fatuity if another war should find us no better prepared for it than we now are.

And yet, sir, I am not exaggerating when I say that we are at this present time quite as defenseless; our cities and harbors are quite as much exposed to hostile incursions, as they were in 1812. They have grown, in wealth and population, quadruple what they were then; but when we consider the increased facilities for attacks which foreign naval Powers possess, we shall find that, notwithstanding your forts, your most important posts are as vulnerable now as they were in 1812.

Whilst the engines and implements of war have been, of late years, vastly augmented for offensive operations, those for harbor defense have not been correspondingly increased by us. A hostile squadron is no longer dependent on the fickle winds for an opportunity to approach your shores, or enter your harbors. They can hover, at their own chosen distance, on your coast, distracting and alarming the whole sea-board, and pounce, with celerity and precision, under cover of night, upon the devoted place which they doom to destruction.

Steam-ships of great power and speed have been constructed, infinitely more formidable than anything which we had to encounter in 1812. Your forts have not been increased or strengthened in proportion to the increase of power with which other nations have fortified themselves.

There has always been great doubts entertained, by the most scientific and experienced men, as to the ability of the best constructed forts to prevent sailing vessels, with a leading breeze, from passing them; and there seems to be little or no doubt that steam-ships may be built, which would pass, unharmed, materially, any fort.

Steam-ships may, undoubtedly, be built, which, with aid from the tide, may attain a speed exceeding twenty miles per hour. Such a vessel, in six minutes, might approach and pass any of your forts, at night, without being disabled. One such steam-vessel, moored in New York bay, might kindle that great city into flames, and, screaming the proud note of triumph, leave it a heap of smoking ruins. Nothing could prevent such a catastrophe. Be assured, Senators, and let our fellow-citizens every where be assured, that nothing could prevent such a catastrophe, in the event of a war with a great naval Power, but a steam floating battery, such as that contemplated by the plan of Mr. Stevens—indestructible, shot and shell-proof, and bearing an armament consisting of such guns, a single shot from which would be sufficient to disable the most powerful man-of-war now launched. One such vessel would be sufficient to defend New York harbor from any force which could possibly enter it. It would combine the impregnable qualities possessed by stone and mortar fortifications with the advantages belonging to ships of war for locomotion. The mere knowledge, by any enemy, that a harbor enjoyed the protection of such a formidable protector, would be sufficient to deter them from hazarding an experiment of its omnipotence.

Now, sir, it seems to me, when one of the most accomplished engineers and naval architects of America is willing to construct a war-ship for harbor defense, that we ought, without hesitation, to avail ourselves of his skill and enterprise for such a purpose.

Mr. Stevens is a gentleman of the highest attainments in those pursuits, to which, with hereditary passion, he has devoted the greater part of his life. He is a gentleman of large fortune, and of reputation. He is not an ordinary speculator, seeking a job of Government, but a high-minded, patriotic gentleman, who, from elevated and public considerations, and not from motives of pecuniary profit, tenders his skill, science, and experience (unsurpassed, in his department, by those of any one) to the service of the Government. He is willing to connect his reputation with the Navy of the country. He has acquired, by long years of experience and expensive experiments, a dexterity and felicity in design and execution in nautical architecture, which he is willing to place at the disposal of the Government. He does not want to make money out of you; but he desires to confer on the country the benefit of his superior knowledge, whilst, at the same time, he identifies his reputation with the naval history of the country.

He is the builder and proprietor of the yacht Maria, which beat the America, which, under his brother, Commodore Stevens, achieved that victory over all the naval chivalry of Great Britain—a victory worthy to be enrolled with those other glorious triumphs of American naval valor during the war of 1812—which have done as much to elevate the national character, and inspire confidence and self-reliance in American prowess, as all your campaigns on shore, from Canada, to the city of the Montezumas.

The offer of such a man to render his skill available to the service of the country, ought to be met with promptitude, alacrity, and liberality by the Government.

It is not proposed by Mr. Stevens to supersede the use of permanent local fortifications. No one thinks of substituting any floating battery for them. The floating steam battery which Mr. Stevens has projected, is designed, not as a substitute, but as an auxiliary to fortifications. They are fixed and stationary, and invaluable at certain points, where they command the channel of ingress for an enemy. In passing such fortresses, the enemy, except under favorable circumstances, may be destroyed or crippled: yet there is no certainty in any such result. In any such attempt by a powerful fleet of war steamers, though some might be destroyed, others would be very likely, under the smoke raised by the broadsides from the fort and its opponent, to force an entrance into the interior harbor; then, without such a vessel as that contemplated by the plan of Mr. Stevens, nothing could prevent the most disastrous consequences.

Mr. Stevens's war steamer, after an enemy had run the gauntlet of the Narrows, and become more or less crippled, would move upon him, and interpose an effectual barrier to his nearer approach.

I have the utmost confidence, that Mr. Stevens can accomplish all he proposes, if he is met by this Government in the proper spirit of fairness and liberality. He is no visionary, but a practical engineer and ship-builder, who has a high reputation at stake, and which he is willing to risk for the benefit of the country. He is incapable of undertaking to perform what he knows to be impracticable. I will now read from a work just published by the learned and accomplished President of Columbia College, Mr. Charles King, in regard to Mr. Stevens:

"The extent, variety, and value of Mr. R. L. Stevens's labors and inventions in mechanics, should have more fitting commemoration than can be given in any passing notice by one unskilled, as is the writer of this, in the mechanic arts. Yet he cannot suffer this allusion to Mr. Stevens to go forth, without attempting at least to enumerate some of the many services and ingenious inventions and appliances of that gentleman in steam, in gunnery, and in mechanics. From the time when a mere boy, in 1804-5, he was zealously working in the machine shop at Hoboken, up to the passing hour, he has given his time, his faculties, and his money, to what may be justly described as experimental philosophy, and the results have been of great public benefit. Of some of them, the following chronological record may bear witness:

"1842. Having contracted to build for the United States Government a large war steamer shot and shell proof, R. L. Stevens built a steamboat at Bordentown for the sole purpose of experimenting on the forms and curves of propeller blades, as compared with side-wheels, and continued his experiments for many months, the result of which we may yet hope to see in an iron war steamer that will be invaluable, and so should be named. While occupied with this design he invented about 1844, and took a patent for, a mode of turning a steam ship of war on a pivot, as it were, by means of a cross propeller near the stern, so that if one battery were disabled, she might in an instant almost present the other.

"1848. This year succeeded in advantageously using anthracite in first passenger locomotives.

"1849. Witnessed the successful application of air under the bottom of steamer John Neilson, whereby friction is diminished, and she has actually gone at the rate of twenty miles an hour; this was the invention of R. L. Stevens and F. B. Stevens. The John Neilson also has another ingenious and effectual contrivance of R. L. Stevens, first used in 1849, for preventing ill consequences from the fouling of the boiler. In conclusion of this dry and imperfect chronological recital of some of R. L. Stevens's contributions to the mechanic arts, to public convenience and national power, as well as renown, it must be added that Mr. Stevens is himself the modeler of all the vessels built by or for him, and that many of our fastest yachts are of his moulding; and especially the Maria, which beat without difficulty the victorious America, which in her turn carried the broom at her mast-head through the British Channel, distancing all competitors, as she continues to do, I believe, under her new owner, in the Mediterranean.

"Of such a man, not the mechanics only of our city, among whom he has worked, and is well known, but the nation may well be proud."

I said that he had an "hereditary passion" for those pursuits to which he has devoted most of his life, and here, sir, my State pride may be pardoned, if I advert to the name of his honored parent, to whose services in practical engineering, mechanics, and other kindred departments, the country owes a debt which it is too late to liquidate now.

Sir, John Stevens, of Hoboken, New Jersey, was one of the most extraordinary men of his age, so prolific of great men. He was the compeer of Fulton, and contributed his full proportion towards making steam that powerful locomotive agent which it has become. Like Fulton and Oliver Evans, he was in advance of the age in which he lived. Near fifty years ago, he astonished and confounded a committee of the New Jersey Legislature, by the prediction that the time would come when men would travel as fast as a pigeon could fly. They would hear him no longer; they turned from him with pity and incredulity; they told him, as "Festus" told "St. Paul," "much learning has made you mad." As he was in advance of his age in relation to the use of steam, so he was in relation to railroads. These he used experimentally in his work yards long before public attention was directed to their importance. He in vain solicited from the New Jersey Legislature permission to connect the waters of the Delaware and the Hudson, many years before the Legislature would permit any such enterprise to be attempted. He did as much, if not more, than any other man to bring the steam-engine for locomotion to its present perfection. When his history is written, his name will rank with the names of Franklin, Fulton, Fitch, and Rittenhouse, among the greatest benefactors of his country, and the human race. His genius and his fondness for practical engineering, he has transmitted to his sons, who are among the most eminent men, in their vocation, of which this or any other country can boast. It is for Congress now to say, whether this Government shall avail itself of the services of such men, in constructing just such vessels for national defense as the necessities of the naval service require.

Had this Government taken by the hand Fulton and John Stevens fifty years ago, there is no telling how far we might now have been, in advance of our rivals in many important elements of national power.

The proposition now submitted to you is intimately connected with the national defense, and the growth and efficiency of your Navy; and I avail myself of the opportunity to make some general remarks on that subject.

Sir, the recent victories of your armies seem to have obscured somewhat the splendor of your naval achievements. I entertain no apprehension, however, that the country will ever undervalue the importance of the Navy, as a sure reliance for the protection of the national honor and the vindication of national injuries. You are destined—(excuse the word)—but if you continue a united people you will be compelled—to become the greatest naval power which the world ever saw. Yet, apparently appalled at the expense to be incurred in any attempt to rival the lavish expenditures of England and France on their navies, we seem to have been embarrassed as to what was the true course to be pursued. Steam has, as you have often been told, revolutionized war upon the ocean. The leviathan ships with which Nelson annihilated the navy of Napoleon at the Nile and Trafalgar, are no longer invincible.

I have long thought that the improvement of our steam marine has not received from the country and from Congress that attention which it deserves. There can be little doubt, that we are at this moment more inferior, as a naval power, for purposes of immediate defense, compared with the offensive means possessed by other powerful nations, than we were forty years ago; while England, France, and Russia have, of late years, vied with each other in the creation of a formidable steam Navy, we have been standing by comparatively passive. In the Admiralty Navy-list of 1850 of Great Britain, is found one hundred and fifty war steamers, and she is constantly building and launching others. In addition to these, she has between sixty and seventy mercantile steamers capable of being converted into war steamers, and whose war equipments are all prepared. In further addition, she has upwards of eight hundred steamers capable of furnishing formidable assistance for coast defense.

France, since 1815, has never lost sight of the importance of maintaining a navy; she is next after England, now the greatest naval power of the world. She had at the commencement of the present year one line-of-battle ship of ninety guns, with screw propeller; fourteen steam-frigates, mounting from eight to sixteen guns of heavy ordnance, and many others of smaller size. We shall have in the Navy of this great Republic—in the Navy of a country whose people, and patriots, and statesmen, (some of them,) are ready to dictate a new code of laws for the nations of the earth, and to throw a fire-brand into Europe, regardless of all consequences, war, or no war—I say, sir, we shall have in our Navy, when completed, five steam-frigates and one steam-sloop, mounting from six to ten guns. Sir, we had better be prepared for a fight before we attempt to bully. This disparity between our naval steam force and that of other Powers is growing greater every year. Yet the tonnage of the United States engaged in foreign or domestic commerce, if we include that of our lakes and large rivers, is about equal to that of Great Britain, and far exceeds that of France or Russia.

Now, these three facts being ascertained—first, our defenseless condition; second, the disparity of our naval power compared with that of the other great powers; third, the equality or superiority of our mercantile tonnage; it becomes a question of great magnitude, what policy is it proper for us to adopt, so as to guard against immense and incalculable losses, in case a sudden war should break out with any of the great Powers.

My mind has been anxiously directed to this subject for many years, and I avail myself of this occasion to throw out a few other suggestions in relation to it.

This gigantic species of warfare it is utterly useless and impracticable, at any cost, to wage with the old-fashioned ships-of-the-line and frigates. Indeed, such vessels would only be built and sailed for the benefit of the enemy. In the present improved condition of naval tactics and steam superiority of Great Britain, there can be no doubt that we must take new observations; a new latitude and departure, if we expect to protect our own shores. We must build a sufficient number of war steamers which shall exceed any which she may have built: first, in celerity; second, in their invulnerability; and third, in their superior destructive qualities.

We must build vessels which, in speed and power, will enable one of ours to cope with half a dozen of hers; vessels, any one of which would be sufficient to enter any of her harbors, and sail through or around any of her fleets.

Now, Mr. President, all this is neither impracticable nor difficult; and in Mr. Stevens you will find not the only American engineer and naval mechanic who can accomplish this great object. We have the coal and iron, and all the raw materials which will enable us, with the aid of all the experience obtained by England and France in steam naval architecture, to commence, now, efficient steps for the creation of a steam navy fully equal to anything now afloat.

But, sir, for this purpose you must adopt an entirely new system of constructing your national vessels. By this I do not mean to reflect on the constructors in the Navy; by no means. All of them whom I have known would favorably compare with other naval architects; especially, sir, would I place no one ahead of the able and accomplished naval constructor in Washington, Mr. Lenthall. You must appeal to the emulation of all the naval mechanics of the United States, so as to draw out the utmost capacity of that sagacious, skillful, and enterprising class.

You must invite them all to enter the field of competition. I do not see why, by the offer of a bonus for each separate class of war steamers proportioned to the magnitude of each vessel, or by some other plan similar in principle, you should not make available all the skill possessed by any of our American mechanics for the purposes of the Government. They are superior to those of any other nation. I have some knowledge of, and entire confidence in the genius, the enterprise, and indomitable superiority of the American mechanic and artisan. My avocations and favorite pursuits have brought me into personal, familiar, and confidential contact with them. I honor and respect them; and I speak with a confidence founded on knowledge, when I say that they are superior to those of any nation or age; and I say, furthermore, that the interests of our country in all those great pursuits in which we are most closely pressed with the rivalry of other nations, enjoying the benefit of cheap labor and more abundant capital, may be safely intrusted to their hands. But then you must give them the advantages which our own resources supply in the cheap raw materials of coal and iron. This you can readily do. You have only to adopt the home valuation, or to assess your present ad valorem duty on the actual sales in this country. By doing this you will violate no principle of the Constitution, no precept of the resolutions of 1798. You will only be obeying the dictates of an enlarged patriotism. Do but this, and you will rekindle your forge fires, and reopen your workshops, and our constituents in New Jersey and Pennsylvania, and all over the country, will once more hear the merry ring of the anvil. Do but this, and no foreign war steamer, nor English, nor French, nor Russian will scream the hoarse notes of defiance on your coast or in your harbors. Do but this, and you will put a fulcrum in the hands of the American mechanics by means of which they will move the world.

Sir, that they are superior has been proved over and over again; let the following extracts from a newspaper received this morning be added to the proofs. It has been proved by our clippers, whose unparalleled voyages round the world have recently astonished Europe. It has been proved by the speed and superiority of the Collins line of steamers; and it has been proved by the glorious victory of the yacht America:

"QUICK PASSAGE OF THE WITCH OF THE WAVE.—One of the London papers says: A large American clipper-built ship, named the Witch of the Wave, Captain Millett, commander, has recently arrived in the East India Docks, London, from Canton, having made one of the most extraordinary and rapid voyages on record. She has also brought one of the most valuable cargoes of tea that, perhaps, ever entered the port of London, having on board no fewer than nineteen thousand chests of the choicest quality. She is nearly fourteen hundred tons burden, the size of our largest Indianmen, and was built at Salem, Massachusetts, in the course of last year. She proceeded to California, thence to Hong Kong, and sailed from Whampoa, near Canton, on the 5th of January; made the passage to Java in seven days and twelve hours, then had the wind W. S. W. to N. W. for several days, with light trade-wind, and made the Cape in twenty-nine days. Then encountered strong easterly winds from the Western Islands, and took a pilot off the Dungeness on the 4th of April, making a passage from China to the Downs in ninety days, a trip surpassing the celebrated runs of the Oriental and Surprise, American clippers. Had she not encountered the strong easterly winds up the Channel, she would have accomplished the voyage several days earlier. As it was, she was only four days beating up from the chops of the Channel to reaching the river, while some of our large vessels were nearly a fortnight doing the distance. The Witch of the Wave is the object of much interest as she lies in the dock. Her bows are similar to a large-sized cutter yacht. By the above it will be seen that she sailed round the world in ten months and a half, including loading and discharging at the above ports. The greatest distance she ran in twenty-four hours, on the voyage to London, was three hundred and thirty-eight miles."

Another paragraph is in these words:

"Quite a sensation has been created in the English commercial world by the arrival of the American clipper-ship Witch of the Wave, at London, after a run of ninety days from Canton to the Downs—the shortest passage on record. Up to this period the British have retained a nominal advantage in the navigation, of this route, one of their traders having accomplished the distance in a few days shorter than any American or other craft; but by this recent achievement of one of our clipper fleet, their last dream of fancied superiority has been dispelled."

And another is as follows:

"THE YACHT AMERICA IN PARLIAMENT.—Colonel Peel, in a recent discussion of the Navy estimates, in the British House of Commons, took occasion to express his surprise that not one word had been said in reference to the circumstance of a foreign yacht having come to England, and, in the presence of the Queen herself, beaten some of the crack English sailing vessels! That, Colonel Peel said, appeared to him a deeply humiliating event. She was an American yacht, and was described as 'the race-horse of the ocean.' Colonel Peel confessed that he was wholly ignorant of nautical matters, although he was conversant with the pastime of horse-racing, and he flatters himself that he could appreciate such an expression as the 'blue ribbon of the turf,' as used by Mr. D'Israeli. Whatever might be the sailing qualities of the American yacht, Colonel Peel declared that if such a defeat had been sustained by the English sailing vessels at the Isle of Wight, there was not a true sportsman in England but would go to any expense to recover back the lost laurels. Colonel Peel stated that it was part of his creed that 'Britannia rules the waves,' but what became of the goddess on the day to which he alluded he could not say; but if she 'ruled the waves' at all on that occasion, she must surely have done so with a downcast look. Colonel Peel's remarks were received with cries of 'hear, hear.'"

I have alluded to those great sources of national wealth, iron and coal, and as they are so intimately connected with the defense of the country, a few more words in relation to them may not be amiss. It has been those products of her soil which has chiefly made Great Britain what she is, or was. These enabled her to fight the battles of despotism in Europe. These were the conquerors of a Napoleon. They are indispensable for defense, if not for national existence. The nation which possesses them in the greatest abundance, and can produce them the cheapest, must excel all others. They are infinitely more important now, as elements of national greatness and power, than ever before. The race of competition in this age, between civilized nations, depends upon their respective facilities for the use of steam. Steam on the ocean is to fight the battle of supremacy there; and steam on land, in the factory, and on the railroad, is to decide the question of superiority in all the diversified pursuits of human life.

Sir, we should look to them; we have them in abundance. There, in the mountains of my own native State, and of her neighbor and sister, old Democratic Pennsylvania, are the weapons with which alone your victory can be achieved. There are the materials from which your thunderbolts must be fabricated. There is the armory from which to clothe your warriors in an invincible panoply. Strike the rocks of these pregnant mountains, and streams of victorious legions will come forth at your bidding. There slumber the unforged fetters of the seas. You have but to fabricate them from the materials there abounding, and you may fling your chains upon Old Ocean's mane at will, and then you will need no bulwarks, no towers along the steep.

But I may be told, advocating the policy of encouraging the promotion of the production of iron, I am running counter to the principles of my party. Sir, I yield to no one in my sense of abiding obligation, while I represent a Democratic State, to faithfully adhere to the Democratic standard of faith. But surely no one can justly accuse me of not being true to the Democratic party, while I act in accordance with the often-declared principles of Andrew Jackson, and of old Democratic Pennsylvania. There is nothing in the Democratic creed which forbids encouraging the promotion of that which is essential to national defense. Democracy, in my estimation, does not consist in giving or withholding a per cent. above or below the average revenue duty. God help the Democracy measured by such a standard! With me, it is the first duty which I acknowledge to provide for the national defense. It was this elevated view of his duty which impelled the great Chatham to say that he would not permit America to manufacture a hob-nail. Sir, I hope the period is not distant when the cheapness of American iron and coal will not permit Great Britain to manufacture a hob-nail for us, or for any market where we can compete with them on equal terms. Democracy, as I understand, has more immediate reference to the construction of the powers of the Government rather than to the fluctuating policy of discriminating-respecting the imposition of duties. That must be controlled by questions of expediency—by the changing modifications of the commercial and restrictive policy of other countries. But it is in the construction of the powers of the Government where Democracy has proved itself the bulwark of the Constitution and the Union. When the reign of terror was upon them—when the fathers of the Democratic party saw, under the rule of the elder Adams, the rights of the States endangered, and everything tending to the consolidation of all power in this central government, they promulgated what I have always considered, since I have directed my mind to political subjects, as the true standard of Democratic faith. I allude to the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions of '98 and '99. Sir, I know that it is a custom with some politicians to indulge in sneers in relation to those resolutions, and to taunt those who respect them with being abstractionists, impracticables, and dreamy theorists.

Sir, I care little what terms—whether Federalist, State-Rights, or Abstractionist, are applied to me; but I will say what I believe, at the hazard of every consequence, personal or political, and without regard to popularity or unpopularity—the one has no charms to swerve me from what I consider right, and least of all has the other any terror.

I will not say of popularity what Horne Tooke said, that if it was to come in my way "I would kick it out of my way;" but I will say, that I trust I shall always have courage enough, of whatever sort may be needful, to despise any popularity, purchased by any dereliction of principle or any sacrifice of personal honor or independence.

But, sir, the resolutions of '98 and '99! the resolutions! I have to say of them that, in my opinion, they are the most valuable legacy, next after the Constitution, which the early patriots of the Republic have bequeathed to the country. They have, in my opinion, done more to preserve the Constitution from infraction, and to keep this Government within its limits, than any other production of political wisdom from the day of their origin to this time. They have been the touchstone by which wild and visionary theories have been tested, and found to be valueless or dangerous. They have been light-houses along the stormy shoals and breakers of politics—warning us of the only safe and smooth channel of navigation for the Ship of State.

I know well that their enemies have pretended to find in them the germ of nullification. But, sir, I perceive no such dangerous heresy in any of them. I see in them a plain, common-sense, practical scheme for the administration of this Government,—a scheme by means of which the Union and the Constitution may be preserved inviolate, the rights of the States respected, and the Government enabled to exercise all those national functions designed to be performed by it; while it is preserved and restrained within those barriers with which it is invested by the Constitution.

Sir, as a citizen of a small State, which has as much to dread from a dissolution of the Union as any other State of this Confederacy, I acknowledge my gratitude to the great men who promulgated those doctrines, and to their disciples, who, since that time, have remained steadfast to the Democratic principles they contain. Those are the principles by which I would have my Democracy estimated; by them I will consider myself bound; upon them and the Constitution a long time ago I planted my standard. On the one side is inscribed, "Slavery is no sin of ours;" on the other side is written, "The Wilmot proviso is unconstitutional."

Thus much, sir, I have felt bound to say in vindication of myself, as well as of the Democracy of the patriotic State which sent me here, in relation to the encouragement of the product of iron.

"I hope I don't intrude," as Paul Pry said. I hope that I have not interfered with the prerogative of others—that I have not trespassed on the premises either of Young America, or Old—

A SENATOR. Foggy.

Mr. STOCKTON hesitated; and, looking around to see who addressed him, continued—

I thank you, sir; but my memory did not fail me. No, sir; my tongue refused to utter the ungracious phrase—the instinctive power of my heart forbade it. Thank God for the inspiration.

No, no, "Conscriptus pater"—I have, as an American citizen, neither the heart to conceive nor the tongue to speak any sentiment but that of the greatest personal respect and the highest admiration and appreciation of your long and faithful public services. May God prolong your life and health and mind, and may the spirit of your country's gratitude rest upon you.

Mr. President, some time since, in another place, I was as unexpectedly called upon as I have this moment been to say a few words in commendation of a distinguished public man. That was put down "an explosion," and this may be recorded as "explosion second." Well, sir, I can have but little left, and I propose now to finish the business of blowing myself up by making this declaration before the Senate and the country. Sir, I acknowledge my responsibility to the national Democracy with reference to national questions, respecting the rights of the States and the powers of this Government; but to New Jersey alone I hold myself responsible with reference to questions of a local or transitory character.

Mr. President, I am done; and if your able reporter will do me the justice which he has heretofore done to myself and all others, why then, sir, political quackery may make the most of it.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope the joint resolution will be laid over. I call for the consideration of the special order of the day, and move that the further consideration of this resolution be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. STOCKTON. I do not think it will take long to dispose of the resolution. I wish to have a vote on it. I hope the Senate will not postpone it.

Mr. MANGUM. If there be any intimation on the part of any gentleman that he wishes to continue the discussion, I certainly shall not object to the postponement, for the deficiency bill ought to be disposed of. This is a question in which I feel much interest. I investigated it some ten years ago, when the original appropriation was made, and I conceive it to be one of the happiest conceptions of one of the ablest men that I have ever known in this country, in respect to harbor defenses—a man as highly gifted, and of as high genius, as he is simple and pure in his conduct. I shall vote with the honorable Senator from New Jersey with a great deal of pleasure on this question. I examined it, many years ago, and, with all the aids and assistances that I could derive from the most experienced gentlemen connected with the naval service, I became perfectly satisfied that it was one of the happiest conceptions.

Mr. HAMLIN. I only desire to say that this is a matter of much importance. I think the motion which has been made by the Senator from Virginia is the appropriate one for this occasion. This is a matter into which I should prefer to look more carefully before I give my vote. I hope it may be passed over.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

THE DEFICIENCY BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1852." The amendment of the Committee on Finance, as it has been amended, is to insert the following:

For additional compensation for increasing the transportation of the United States mail between New York and Liverpool, in the Collins line of steamers, to twenty-six trips per annum, at such times as shall be directed by the Postmaster General, and in conformity to his last annual report to Congress, and his letter of the 15th of November last, to the Secretary of the Navy, commencing said increased service on the 1st of January, 1852, at the rate of $33,000 per trip, in lieu of the present allowance, the sum of $236,500. Provided, That it shall be in the power of Congress, at any time after the first day of January, 1854, to terminate the arrangement for any additional allowance herein provided for.

The question pending is on the motion of Mr. MALLORY, to amend the amendment by adding:

Provided, That the contract for the transportation of the said mail be and the same is hereby transferred from the Navy to the Post Office Department.

Mr. BROOKE. Mr. President, I do not wish to interfere with any Senator who desires to discuss this subject; nor do I intend, by any means, to make a speech upon it, because I am aware that I am not able to add any new facts, or to shed any new light upon a subject that has been so ably discussed as this has been. But, sir, I wish to avail myself of the privilege that I have of explaining to my constituents, if to no one else, the reasons why I shall be compelled, reluctantly, to vote against the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

This is a very important measure. It contemplates an annual imposition upon the Treasury of at least $500,000, making all allowance for the receipts that will be put into the Treasury from the postages received. Not only does it propose to entail upon the Treasury of the United States in annual expense of half a million of dollars, but a look upon it as the initiatory step, the entering wedge, to a system of mail steamers, to be supported by the munificence and bounty of the Government, the end of which no man can see. The main objection I have to this amendment, or at least the main reason why I cannot now give it my support, is, the extreme state of uncertainty that exists in reference to the facts and figures on which the demand for the appropriation is based. Why, sir, statements have been made here one day, which required explanation, and sometimes an entire retraction on the next. There are no certain data upon which any Senator, as I think, can vote understandingly. I was struck with this the other day, in the little discussion that arose upon an amendment which I had the honor of offering by way of a substitute for the amendment of the committee. Prior to that, it had been represented that the amount of postages to be received by the Collins line would amply repay and reimburse to the Treasury any outlay that might be imposed by the amendment. Indeed, this line of steamers was, with a great deal of certainty, represented as a mine of wealth, richer far than "—the wealth of Ormus and of Ind;

Or where the gorgeous East, with richest hand,
Showers on her kings Barbaric pearl and gold."

To test the truth of this; to test the sincerity of the gentlemen composing the company who own this line, in the simplicity of my heart, I offered an amendment, giving to them the entire postages received from the mails; instead of the compensation proposed by the amendment of the committee. Well, sir, in a single minute, aye, in a single second of time, what had been a magnificent certainty dwindled down to an insignificant probability! We were then told that it was by no means certain that the postages accruing from the line would reimburse the proprietors. Desiring to accommodate myself, as far as possible, to the wishes of my friends, I modified the amendment. I then proposed to give the postages in addition to the $385,000 now granted by law. In another second this insignificant probability mounted up again to a magnificent certainty, and we were told, Oh! this is too large; it is more than the line asks for.

Another objection was made to my amendment, and that was, that it would deprive Congress of all control of the postages. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] objected, that, in the course of time, Congress might wish to reduce the postages between New York and Liverpool. Feeling desirous of accommodating my amendment to all demands, I modified it so as to reserve to Congress the right to modify the postages. Immediately the objection was made from the other side of the Chamber, that Congress, under the postal treaty, had no power to reduce the postages. So, sir, in all my efforts to accommodate the amendment to the different objections which prevailed in the Chamber, I utterly failed. I could not satisfy the friends of the amendment of the committee by any modification which I was willing to make to my amendment. If I sat down, I was too short; if I stood up, I was too long.

As an instance of another uncertainty which prevailed about the matter, I find in a publication that was laid on my desk, and, I presume, upon the desks of all the other Senators upon this floor, a statement in detail, giving credit to the Collins line of steamers for the sum of $58,675 59, as the sum earned by them for the Government, after giving the Government credit for the appropriation that has been made for them.

I admit that in the details of this statement, it is shown that a large amount of this postage is due to the Cunard line; or, in other words, that a large amount of this postage was earned by the Cunard line; but, as very few people ever read the figures in detail, while most look only to the general results, in order to save themselves the trouble, I say that this statement is deceptive, since it gives credit to the Collins line, not only for the whole amount received by the Collins, but by the Cunard line. The aggregate amount received from postages by these lines from the 27th of April, 1850, up to the 31st of March, 1852, which appears to have been derived from the establishment of this line of steamers, is $898,675 59; and the net gain is put down at $58,675 59. I repeat that although in the detailed statement, in the figures that follow, due credit is given to the Cunard line, yet in the general result as given in this pamphlet, the whole credit is given to the Collins line of steamers. I adduce these figures to show the erroneous impressions which the facts and figures brought forward by the friends of this amendment are calculated to make upon the public mind; because, as I said, when this comes before the public, not one in a thousand will look at the figures and examine them in detail, but they will look only at the general result, and that, as stated in this pamphlet, is a deceptive one.

Another objection which I have to this amendment is, that I am not satisfied from the statements which its supporters have made here, that this additional appropriation is necessary. We are told, in round numbers, that the expense of a trip of one of these steamers from New York to Liverpool is $65,215. Now, before we should be called upon to vote away this large amount of money, it seems to me that it is the duty of this company, or of its friends upon this floor, not only to furnish us with the gross amount of expense, but also with a detailed statement of all the expenses. It is furnished to us here merely in a lump, and I expect to show, in a few moments, that this statement, short as it is, is full of errors; and from one error we can learn the rest.

In the first place, it is stated that the average cost of each voyage, for the wages of crew and their provisions, is $3,845 04. The cost of fuel is $8,612 28; repairs to machinery $4,571 90; average of extras $4,643; ordinary expenses, including carpenters and joiners, port charges, sail makers, light and dock dues, passengers' provisions, and waiters, and other necessities, $12,762 73; insurance $8,904 64; interest $8,438; deterioration, at seven per cent. per annum, $8,438; making a total of $65,215 59. Thus, sir, the whole amount of cost per voyage is put down at $65,215.

Now, I am told that one of these vessels can average one trip a month. Then, sir, the annual expense of one of this Collins line of steamers, according to this estimate, will amount to the enormous sum of $783,000. Sir, I do not think that this will do to tell to the marines, much less to a sailor. I do not believe a marine would credit it. That amount, I believe, is a little over the cost of building one of these vessels. And are we to be told that the annual expense of running these vessels is more than their original cost? I cannot believe it, nor will I believe it until I see a more explicit statement than that which has been furnished here by the secretary of this company.

But, sir, if I understand the matter fully, this is not all. It does not stop here; but this estimate is furnished as a basis for future action. Look at that estimate. It contains an item for ordinary repairs of machinery of $4,571 per trip! It contains also an item of nearly the same amount ($4,643) for extraordinary repairs. Now, if we carry this item for extraordinary repairs through a long series of instances, it ceases to be an item for extraordinary repairs, and becomes, of course, an item for ordinary repairs—an item appertaining to the system throughout. We have no right, nor can we in justice or in reason be called upon to make an estimate and appropriate money through a long series of years for extraordinary repairs; because, if we do this, they are no longer extraordinary but they become ordinary, and attached to this very system itself.

Then, sir, there is another item for insurance of $3,994 64. I am not acquainted with the rate of insurance charged between New York and Liverpool, but that amount would make it a little over seven per cent. on the cost of the vessels. But, according to these figures and this rate of insurance, the total estimate is incorrect; and, as I before remarked, these estimates are furnished for our future action, and we ought, therefore, to estimate the amount we are called upon to allow now with a reference to the amount which we shall have to pay hereafter. Now, on the original cost of all the vessels—namely, $2,944,142—seven per cent. would amount to $206,089. Then, to find out the amount of insurance to be paid for each trip, we must divide that sum by twenty-six, which is the number of trips proposed to be made by this line of steamers, in consequence of the granting of this appropriation. That will amount only to $7,926—a thousand dollars less than the estimate which we find in the account of details. The same rule, with the same result, will apply in regard to interest, and upon that calculation we will find that they have estimated the total interest $1,000 too high. So also in regard to the deterioration of the vessels themselves. It is put down at seven per cent., which will amount to $7,926 instead of $8,464, as furnished by the estimate. Here then, sir, is the sum of $2,012 which they have estimated too much in the items of insurance and interest and deterioration of the vessels. This multiplied by twenty-six will give an annual amount of $52,312 more than the actual estimate. That may be regarded by some gentlemen as a small mistake, but I regard it as a considerable sum.

The Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] while speaking on this subject yesterday, touched a chord that I think should vibrate through the heart of every Western man who is called upon to vote in regard to this appropriation. I do not wish to be at all sectional in reference to this matter; but I think that, as a Western man, I have a right to ask that justice should be done to that long-neglected section of our country, before we are called upon to vote such large and enormous amounts of money for the sustenance and protection of interests with which we have comparatively but little to do. I have no means of ascertaining the comparative amount and value of the commerce of the West which floats upon the bosom of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers; but I venture to say, from the small means of information which I have, that this Western commerce is infinitely superior, both in amount and value, to the commerce carried on between New York and Liverpool. I find, from an estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury, in a report sent to this body on the 21st of December last, that the whole steam marine tonnage of Great Britain at that time was 142,080 tons. Now, the steam tonnage of the interior of the United States, at the same time, amounted to 204,645 tons. It is well known that at least one third of this tonnage belongs to the West; and from this statement we may form some estimate of the comparative amount and value of the Western commerce, compared with that of Great Britain, as carried on between Liverpool and New York.

Now, allow me to ask what is the amount given by this Government for the last ten years to protect the commerce which is carried on at the West? The last bill passed upon this subject making appropriations for the purpose of protecting the commerce of the West, was passed in 1844, and by that bill the magnificent donation of $100,000 was made to improve the Ohio river between the cities of Pittsburg and Louisville, and $180,000 to improve the Ohio below the falls at Louisville, the Mississippi, Missouri, and Arkansas rivers—only $280,000 in eight years, or about one third of the amount which is asked to be appropriated to this Collins line in one year. This is not just; and I declare again that I have a right, as a Western citizen, living in that great valley which is washed and drained by these rivers, to protest against any further appropriations from the Treasury for the purpose of sustaining this line until full justice is done to our section of the country. Sir, there is not a newspaper that we receive from the West, nor a breeze that blows from the West and fans our cheeks, but bears upon its wings some account of sad disasters of death and destruction, which have taken place upon our Western waters. And yet to prevent all this the paltry appropriation of $280,000 is all that has been made in the space of eight years. From the same report to which I have referred, I have gained some interesting facts, which I think should have due consideration and weight in this body, and especially with Senators who hail from the same section of country that I do. By this it appears that the number of vessels lost on the rivers of the Ohio basin, and the Mississippi Valley, up to the year 1848, was six hundred and eighteen. There were lost by collisions, forty-five; by fire, one hundred and four; and by snags, and other obstructions for which the Government is responsible, four hundred and sixty-nine. The value of the boats thus lost, was $4,719,991, exclusive of explosions, collapsing of flues, &c.; and including them, the value of boats alone which were lost, was $5,643,791. The losses on cargoes was $12,698,529, making the total losses on the Western waters, up to 1848, $18,342,320. The loss of boats has been forty-four and a half per cent. of all that have been built; or, in other words, out of every hundred boats built to run upon those waters, forty-four and a half have either exploded, or been sunk beneath the dark and turbid waters of the Mississippi.

To come down a little later, we find that the value of the boats lost on the Mississippi and its tributaries in 1849, was $1,585,400. All that loss occurred in one year. In 1851, a year of unusual exemption from steamboat disasters, there was lost on the Western lakes and rivers the amount of $1,568,106. And I again repeat, that to protect the citizens of the great growing West from those losses to which they have been subject in their property and their lives, there has been expended the sum of only $280,000 within a period of eight years, which is, I again repeat, but about one third of the amount which is asked to be appropriated for the Collins line of steamers for one year.

By that same report, I find that the number of passengers carried annually by all the ocean steamers belonging to the United States is 190,993, and that the number of passengers carried in the ordinary inland lake and river steamers of the waters of the Ohio, Mississippi, and their tributaries, is 3,782,572. Now, is it not monstrous that this large sum of money should be sought to be appropriated to one single line of ocean steamers, when the whole number of persons who need protection in ocean steamers, on all lines, is only 190,000; and while there are 3,782,572 needing equal protection, who are put off with the poor pittance of $280,000 for that purpose, and that amount given during a period of eight years?

I remarked when I took the floor, that I had no intention of making a speech, but that I simply wished to state the reasons why I could not, as a Western man, fully identified with all the interests of that immense region of country, give my vote for this amendment. It is an old saying, as just as it is true, that "Charity should begin at home;" and when you have carried this maxim into practical effect, when you have done full justice at home, full justice to the interior, then you may, with some semblance of propriety, call upon us to assist you in doing full justice to the Atlantic coast, by giving protection to that commerce, which is partly domestic and partly foreign.

For these reasons I cannot vote for the amendment. I cannot vote against it, because I have consented to pair off with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. MILLER,] and he is not now present. But were I at liberty to vote, I would vote against it most heartily. I am anxious to have this line continued; and I trust I have as much of a national feeling in regard to this matter as any Senator on this floor; but I cannot yield up my sense of what is just and of what is due to my own section of country to any feeling of national vanity or national glory of this sort.

Mr. GEYER. Before the vote is taken, I desire to express, in a few words, the reasons why, under existing circumstances, I feel constrained to vote against this amendment.

I shall do so, not because I participate, on this occasion, in the sentiments expressed by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] in reference to the question of appropriations for the Western rivers. I apprehend that when the votes of Senators and Representatives shall be examined, it will be found that, although a portion of those on the eastern side of the Alleghenies have uniformly voted against these appropriations, a large number have also voted for them; and if blame is to be attributed to any particular section of the country, a portion of it should apply to our own section. The difficulty lies in the erection of platforms to override the Constitution; the allegiance to the platform of a party is stronger than the feeling of allegiance to the Constitution, or the obligations of duty; and that is the reason why we have not had an administration of the powers of this Government for the benefit of those for whom it was instituted. But I have objections to this amendment—objections which I had hoped would have been removed during this discussion; for I am disposed, and have been, from the beginning, to vote an appropriation—all that should be necessary, and no more than should be necessary—for the purpose of maintaining this line of steamers. I am not among those who think that the Post Office should necessarily sustain itself; but, at the same time, I am unwilling to vote so large an appropriation as this in the dark. When I consider how the question has been brought forward, and how it has been discussed, I cannot but express my apprehension that there is something which will not bear examination yet undiscovered.

At the commencement of this session the Postmaster General informed us, in his annual report, that he had obtained additional service by an understanding with the owners of the Collins line, which would give an increase of six trips in the year, making twenty-six instead of twenty; and he recommended, as I understand, that these trips should be paid for pro rata, and that certain compensation should be allowed—not "certain," but that some compensation should be allowed—for the trips which it would be necessary to perform during the winter. That is the recommendation of the Postmaster General, as I read it. In the early part of the session a number of petitions were presented from different cities in the Union, praying for increased aid to the Collins line. They were referred to a committee; and I expected, being desirous to vote what was necessary, that we should have a report from that committee, which would inform us, and give us the reasons, why a contract entered into for ten years at a given, stipulated price should now be changed, and the annual compensation increased. I supposed that they would have inquired—not of the owners or clerks of the Collins line, but from experienced persons, or that they would have obtained such information as would satisfy them as to the reasonable expense of navigating these ships, and thus ascertain what would be a proper amount of compensation to be voted by the two Houses of Congress. Four months elapsed, and no report was made; the Committee on Naval Affairs, as I understand it now, having upon it a gentleman who is also a member of the Committee on Finance, agreed among themselves that they would raise the compensation to $33,000 per trip, and then communicated that fact to the Secretary of the Navy. The Secretary of the Navy told them in reply, that if they approved the arrangement of the Postmaster General, there would be a deficit even if the additional six trips were made at the old rate of $19,380 each; and that if they concluded to raise the compensation to $33,000 per trip, then the deficiency would be so much. That is the estimate; on that a member of the Naval Committee takes his seat as a member of the Committee on Finance, and moves this appropriation. According to my reading, it states what is contrary to the records, and that is one reason why I must vote against it.

I will read the amendment:

"For additional compensation for increasing the transportation of the United States mail between New York and Liverpool, in the Collins line of steamers, to twenty six trips per annum, at such times as shall be directed by the Postmaster General, and in conformity to his last annual report to Congress, and his letter of the 15th of November last, to the Secretary of the Navy, commencing said increased service on the 1st of January, 1852, at the rate of $53,000 per trip, in lieu of the present allowance, the sum of $236,500."

Now, the laymen will understand that to mean that this appropriation was inserted at the recommendation of the Postmaster General. But, looking at the recommendation of that officer, it will be seen that he recommends no such thing.

Mr. BADGER. I hope that my friend will permit me to say one word. He puts a wrong interpretation altogether on the amendment. It does not express nor imply, nor was it intended to express or imply that the Postmaster General recommended this allowance at all. It refers to the increase of the number of trips to twenty-six, according to the terms of the agreement with the Postmaster General. That is all. It would be well for the Senator to understand an amendment before he denounces it.

Mr. GEYER. Mr. President, I read this amendment according to the words which I find here, and not to any supposed intent or meaning which might exist in the mind of the Senator who drew it up. The words are:

"For additional compensation for increasing the transportation of the United States mail between New York and Liverpool, in the Collins line of steamers, to twenty-six trips per annum, at such times as shall be directed by the Postmaster General, and in conformity to his last annual report to Congress, and his letter of the 15th of November last, to the Secretary of the Navy, commencing said increased service on the 1st of January, 1852, at the rate of $53,000 per trip, in lieu of the present allowance, the sum of $236,500."

Now, sir, let me ask how can uninformed persons out of doors understand that amendment, otherwise than that in consequence of an arrangement made with the Postmaster General, and, in conformity therewith, this appropriation is to be made? Now, the recommendation of the Postmaster General, on which I am willing to vote, is this:

"Under these circumstances, Mr. Collins was requested to continue his trips every other week, and was assured that the payment by Congress of a pro rata compensation would be recommended. It is claimed by the contractors, and it is believed, justly, that a pro rata compensation for these extra trips in the winter season, will not fully indemnify them; and if the extra trips are performed, it is earnestly recommended that a pro rata compensation, with such addition, if any, as may be necessary to give the contractors a fair and liberal compensation for the extra service, be authorized by Congress."

Now, that report declares this fact: that at the time this negotiation was going on between the Post Office Department and the proprietors of the Collins line of steam-ships, the idea was not suggested that they would ask for extra compensation for the trips which were performed in the summer season; but that because the winter trips which were ordered by this new arrangement would not pay, they therefore desired extra compensation for these trips. Still, Mr. President, I should have been perfectly willing to modify the contract, so as to maintain this line, if those who ask for it would furnish the Senate with data, upon which to calculate, with some degree of certainty, the amount which would be necessary, so as to make the line support itself, when its expenses shall have been brought within reasonable limits. Sir, we have been furnished with an aggregate statement—not in the shape of a report, but occasionally, as a Senator has addressed the Chair. We have had a memorandum read, furnished by the chief clerk, which informs us that the expenses, heretofore, have been so much, including, as I understand from some Senators, the loss arising from the detention, and injury, and cost of repair of the Atlantic. Then it is proposed to graduate the compensation for carrying the mail for eight years, by the aggregate expenses certified by their clerk as being incurred for the trips during the past two years. Now, although I am desirous that this line should be supported, I cannot undertake to vote $858,000 per annum upon any such statement, especially considering that the means existed, and the time has been sufficient, to have brought forward in some form the evidence upon which we could determine, once for all, that the compensation which we ought to give is reasonable, and not any more than is necessary.

The amendment which was made to this amendment, on the motion of the honorable Senator from Texas, [Mr. Rusk,] while on its very face it confesses that we are in doubt, still makes the original proposition worse than it was, and furnishes an additional reason why I shall be compelled to vote against it. As the proposition came from the committee, it expired on the thirteenth day of next month, and would have been presented in a new appropriation bill, because there would have been no contract. But this amendment recognizes it, as a contract to exist during the whole of eight years, unless an end is put to it by the action of Congress. It carries the operation of the appropriation beyond the time limited by the appropriation itself; it puts an interpretation upon it without the proviso, which would be carried out the whole period of the eight years remaining of that contract; and then, sir, it proposes to throw upon Congress, when that period should arrive for its action, the burden of establishing affirmatively that the compensation is too much, instead of taking the burden now upon themselves of showing that it is reasonable and necessary.

These, Mr. President, in a few words, are the reasons why I feel compelled to vote against this amendment. I regret that the committee to which the subject was referred, and whose attention had been called to it, did not enter upon a full investigation of the matter, and furnish us with a report which would justify those who do occasionally, unlike the Senator from Delaware, think it worth while to "count the cost;" and who look to an appropriation of this amount to run so many years, and amounting to little short of $7,000,000 for the mere transportation of the mails from New York to Liverpool, as being somewhat extravagant. There are some of us who desire to be shown what it is for, or at least to be shown that the sum is reasonable. And we should not be deterred from making the inquiry by appeals which may be made to us in regard to our public spirit or our national pride. Sir, I feel as much of that as any man here; but, although it may be a matter of exultation to us even in the far West, that an American ship outruns a British ship, we do not understand it to furnish any reason why we should put our hands into the Treasury for the purpose of sustaining that pride beyond what is absolutely necessary.

If the discussion of this question had been confined to what seems to be pertinent to it, we should long since have ceased to discuss it. If gentlemen, instead of informing us of the immense power of steam, and of the prospect they had before them of ultimately enabling us to conquer the world, had contented themselves with inquiring what is the probable and reasonable expense of navigating these ships; and, in the next place, whether it is the duty of the Government of the United States to vote an appropriation of millions for this purpose; the question would have been disposed of long since. I think the appropriation has been improperly imposed on the deficiency bill; and the effect, already, has been to produce a very considerable amount of suffering among those who are public creditors, and who await the passage of the bill, in order to obtain payment for past services to the Government.

I did not, however, rise for the purpose of entering into the discussion of the general question, but merely for the purpose of stating my reasons for objecting to this amendment. If my objections are removed by any honorable Senator, I shall then vote for such an appropriation as shall be found reasonable and proper.

Mr. BADGER. I feel called upon, after the remarks which have fallen from my friend from Missouri, to make a few observations in vindication of the course pursued by the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The Senator from Missouri, in the first place, seems to suppose that the mode by which the proposed amendment is framed conveys the impression that the amount of additional compensation had been fixed and recommended by the Postmaster General. I do not know what impression that may have upon persons who are entirely ignorant of the facts of the case; but it certainly never entered my imagination that it would have any such meaning to members of the Senate, because I supposed that they either were or would become acquainted with the facts before they entered into a discussion of the subject. But as to how it would be considered outside of this Chamber, I confess I did not trouble myself to inquire; and neither at the time the proposition was before the Committee on Naval Affairs, did I care, nor do I care now. But no gentleman here could have been misled, because the answer sent to the Committee on Naval Affairs by the Secretary of the Navy, furnishing the estimate we desired from that Department, of the amount which would be necessary to insert as the amount of additional appropriation in this deficiency bill, states upon its face that it is written in answer to a letter from the committee, in which the committee had themselves resolved to fix upon this additional compensation as the proper sum. That appears distinctly upon the face of the Secretary's letter. We did not think it to be necessary to inquire of the Secretary of the Navy, or of the Postmaster General, what amount of additional compensation should be made. We did not think it a matter of any importance what might be the opinion of those officers, except as that opinion might guide us in coming to a correct conclusion. We had all the materials for coming to that conclusion ourselves, and all that we had any occasion to refer to an Executive Department for, was to ascertain arithmetically, with a view to the state of existing appropriations, what additional appropriation must be put to this bill to carry out the contract, with the increase which we thought it would be reasonable to allow.

My friend from Missouri complains of two things. In the first place, that the committee has not made a report, and in that report set forth the reasons upon which they propose to allow an increase of compensation, and the grounds upon which they had ascertained the amount of the appropriation proposed to be allowed. Now, suppose they had made a report; how would my friend have been better satisfied than he is now? That written report would but have expressed our opinion and judgment; and the value of that opinion and judgment would have depended either upon the confidence he reposed in us, or upon the value and effect of the evidence exhibited in support of that opinion. He has the benefit of our opinion verbally; and he has the benefit of our opinion of that amendment, in the express declarations we have made upon that point. Am I to understand that my friend would have had any more respect for that opinion, if it had been written on paper, than if expressed verbally? Again, suppose we had made a written report; upon what would we have founded our estimates? Why, upon a written paper—what we thought the best evidence on which we could act. Now, my friend from Missouri repudiates that at once. He says that in order to ascertain the actual expenditure of this Collins line, we should have called upon persons who are skilled in these matters, and should not have resorted either to the members of the company, or the agents or the officers of the company, to ascertain this matter. Then it is very plain, sir, that no report we could have made would have overcome the difficulties which bear upon the mind of my friend from Missouri, because we of the committee, and he, entertain irreconcilable opinions as to the true source from which such reliable evidence is to be derived. We supposed that, because a general estimate is only a secondary means of ascertaining the cost; and we held the best, most direct, and most reliable source of information, was the evidence of those who superintend the expenditure, keep the accounts, and who know, in point of fact, what it costs to maintain the existing establishment. Now, that evidence we have. We have the evidence of a man who is no more interested in this line than the Senator from Missouri, or myself—a man who is merely employed to keep the accounts, which show the outlay and the receipts of the company. We have his sworn evidence, and if that is not satisfactory, I should like to know how my friend from Missouri would be satisfied with opinions of persons, which are merely conjectural with regard to the amount, and who had neither the means of ascertaining what was received, nor what was expended by the company. Then, sir, our case was a very simple one. We ascertained that there was an average loss on each trip of nearly $17,000. We ascertained, as we thought, that the company might be able to maintain the line, looking to an appreciation of things hereafter by adding to the compensation, not the $17,000 which had been lost, but a sum a little less than $14,000; and that sum we proposed to allow.

It seems to me that the difficulty in this matter does not lie in the want of evidence. The evidence is here, and if gentlemen are willing to be convinced, it is satisfactory. But the difficulty lies in gentlemen's starting back because the sum of money is large.

Then my friend makes another objection: he was one of those, he said, who, in voting the appropriation, desired to know how much they were going to vote. No objection can be made to the action of the committee on that point; the sum is certainly put down with sufficient clearness of comprehension. It is $33,000 per trip for twenty-six trips per annum. We did not multiply—

Mr. GEYER. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. BADGER. Certainly.

Mr. GEYER. I did not object because I did not know the amount of the proposed appropriation; but I did state that it was because they asked an increase of compensation on the ground that the line could not support itself at the present rate of compensation. I ask that, when I am called on to vote for an appropriation, the amount of which I know, it be ascertained that it is justifiable by the facts, and that it is reasonable and proper.

Mr. BADGER. I misunderstood my friend, and I take it back again. The gentleman wishes to know the reasonableness of the appropriation. Then, as I have said, if he is not satisfied with the evidence of an average loss of near $17,000—if he still believes there is no loss on each trip, of course he will vote no addition. But if he believes that it is certainly not possible to maintain that an increased allowance of $13,750 per trip can be too much, when the loss which has been incurred heretofore has been an average loss of $17,000 a trip, and hence he should vote for the addition. That is a statement of the case. However, I do not purpose to go into any reinvestigation of it. I only wanted to show, that, in what had been done by the Committee on Naval Affairs, we acted, as we thought, in the best mode to bring this subject fairly before the Senate. Nothing has been kept back.

One word, now, as to the subject being brought before the Committee on Finance. It occurred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, that there being a bill pending for the purpose of supplying deficiencies, if the Senate and House concurred in raising this compensation, the necessary result would be, that there would be a deficiency in this half year's service; and as this company were now daily pressed with large calls for money beyond their receipts, and were asking, and earnestly entreating that Congress would furnish them relief speedily, if they intended to furnish it at all, in order that, if Congress determined that they would not furnish the relief, they might throw themselves on our generosity and justice, to relieve them from the further prosecution of this ruinous contract, we thought it was due to them, due to the justice and magnanimity of the Government, and due to our own fair and frank dealing, that this question should be proposed at once upon this bill, and that the gentlemen who are associated in the enterprise might know the fate to which they were to come. Therefore, the gentleman who is a member of both the Committee on Naval Affairs and the Committee on Finance, brought the subject forward in the latter committee, and they agreed to report the amendment. That is the state of the case.

Mr. RUSK. I hope the honorable Senator from Florida will withdraw his amendment to the amendment. The Navy is supported by appropriations out of the Treasury directly. This line, under the contract, is supported in the same manner, by appropriations out of the Treasury directly. By law, the appropriations which we make for the support of the Post Office Department, come out of the revenues of the Department. Now, does the Senator desire to throw this contract, which was made, and which is paid out of the Treasury, just as are the naval appropriations, and which throws no responsibility whatever upon the Navy fund, because that comes out of the general Treasury, upon the Post Office? I hope he does not; and I hope, after some little reflection, he will withdraw his amendment. I do not approve of this law; because I think the Government of the United States is bound to maintain the postal arrangements of the country, and should make appropriations for that object out of the Treasury. But it does not do it. The United States require the Department to support itself. Well, the Senator's State, and my own, are in the same condition; they do not pay in as much revenue as they draw out for mail transportation; and when we go to the Department and ask an extension of the accommodation to which we are entitled, I think, upon every principle of justice and equity, we are circumscribed by the amount of revenue. The accommodations in the way of mail facilities are not equal to what we should have but for the existence of this law, requiring that the revenues of the Department shall meet all the appropriations made for it. Does the Senator desire to make the mischief worse for his constituents? And there is nothing else about it. Is he willing to separate the Navy from a seeming, and only a seeming connection with this line, by throwing it upon those who pay postage upon letters throughout the country? Why should it be disconnected from the Navy? Is the Navy to stand aloof, and to be allowed to go just the depth it chooses into the Treasury of the United States? Are these contracts to be thrown upon the letter postage, and preclude us from keeping it at the low rate it now is, or even of reducing it, if the convenience of the country should require a still further reduction? I hope the honorable Senator will withdraw his amendment, for, if he does not, I shall be bound to call for the yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, I would withdraw my amendment with a great deal of pleasure, if I could hear one single solitary reason for doing so. If I supposed, for a moment, that I would advance any great public interest by withdrawing it, I would do so. If I supposed it would be in the way of reducing the rates of postage, I would withdraw it. But it is upon the presumption that the present plan is productive of great public mischief, that I feel at liberty to insist upon my amendment. Without desiring to say a word in this discussion as to the propriety of granting this immense amount to the Collins line of steamers, I shall simply testify my feelings on the subject by a silent vote. Throughout the whole discussion, the friends of the measure have maintained, if I understand anything about it, this point: that this is a measure which, if it does not now absolutely yield a revenue to the Post Office Department, will, in a short time, be self-sustaining to the Department. If I understand anything, it has been maintained, throughout this discussion, that the Post Office Department must be credited with the postages received from the Collins line of steamers. Not one single word has been said about their connection with the Navy, except that, ultimately, in the event of war, these steamers might, perhaps, be of public service. Now, I should like to know what reason can be assigned for not transferring the contract where it properly belongs? It is a mail contract. The moneys accruing from postages, whether paid directly or indirectly into the Treasury, or paid into the Post Office Department, are properly credited to that Department. And whenever the reports of the Postmaster General are made up, he may very properly enlighten the country by claiming credit for the postages received from the Collins line of steamers. But the advocates of the measure understand it so well that, throughout this entire discussion, they claim that the Post Office must be credited with the entire receipts of the Collins line of steamers, and some have even gone so far as to include in the estimate the amount received by the Cunard line of steamers.

The reason why I desire to have this contract placed under the charge of the Post Office, instead of under the Navy Department, is obvious. It is insisted on this floor, and in the other Hall of Congress, that the appropriations for the Navy are increasing annually; that no benefits commensurate with this increase arise to the country; and propositions are daily made to cut down our national ships, or to withdraw them from foreign stations. The country, at this moment, exhibits a singular spectacle. Some of the very finest ships of the Navy—some of the most costly ships—some of those which would, in the event of hostilities, afford the greatest benefit to the country, are rotting for the want of a few dollars being appropriated for their repairs. Now, it is to call things by their proper names, that I insist upon my amendment. It is, that appropriations may not be made, year after year, and called naval appropriations, from which the Navy does not derive a single particle of benefit, and, in my opinion, will never derive any benefit, that I insist upon it. Annually there are some ten or fifteen provisions in the naval appropriation bill, which would be appropriated for, if no Navy existed. Investigations into scientific subjects, the preparation of the Nautical Almanac, the testing of various experiments in regard to motive power, are all appropriated for under the title of "naval appropriations," and from them the Navy proper does not derive one single particle of benefit.

Now, it may possibly touch the amendment of the committee in some other point of view. There may be a point of view from which there may be taken an objection to the transfer of the Collins line of steamers to the charge of the Post Office Department. But I have yet heard no objection sufficient to induce me to withdraw the amendment, and therefore I must insist upon it.

Mr. HAMLIN. I hope the amendment of the honorable Senator from Florida will not be adopted by the Senate. The law requires that all the mail facilities which are furnished to the whole country shall be limited by the amount of revenue which the Post Office Department pays into the Treasury of the Government. If, therefore, we place upon that Department any increased expenditure, there must of necessity be a diminution of that service. That point was correctly made and well stated by the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. I think the Senator from Florida has entirely failed to answer it.

Now, if it be placed upon the Navy, and an additional amount is required for its support, there are no limitations regulating the expenditures in the Navy, which would affect the facilities which are furnished to the community in the Post Office arrangements. If there were no other reason than that, it would be sufficient to my mind.

But, in my judgment, besides that, there is a more intimate connection between these vessels and the Navy. There are considerations in relation to the great expenditure involved in their construction and sailing which connect them more directly with the Navy Department, than with the Post Office Department. I think this is a consideration which should impress itself upon the mind of every Senator. If we are to add a million of dollars to the expenditure of the Post Office Department, under the decreased rates of postage, and thereby add an additional embarrassment to that service, and to the country, we may fail in preserving the rates of postage which we now have; while, with that increase, which it is believed by all who have examined the subject, will necessarily follow in time from the reduction of the rates of postage, the Department will be able to take care of itself. If other subjects are to be added to it, even the rates which we now have will fail, and we may hope, and hope in vain, for any further reduction. I hope that the amendment to the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. CASS. I do not think that this amendment is of any importance in itself, and yet, for one, I have a wish that it should not be adopted. It is very evident that it will not make a cent's difference to the United States; it will not be of the slightest consequence in any pecuniary point of view; for the money has to be paid. What is the reason given for the amendment? Simply that heretofore the appropriation for this service has been made in laws providing for naval appropriation, and that therefore the public may be deceived as regards the matter. Now, I do not think that is a sufficient reason. I think every man of intelligence through the country, looking at the expenditures of the Government, and the appropriations, will fully understand what belongs to the Navy proper. I think every man will fully comprehend it. I cannot believe that, in that point of view, the amendment is of any consequence whatever. But the feeling which I have against it is simply this: I do not wish to take the character of war vessels from these steamers. If we retain them, in the event of a war they must be used for war purposes. Hence, I would prefer that they should remain under the control of the Navy Department, be under its superintendence, and be considered as a branch of that arm of the service of the country, to be used whenever the public wants require it.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to make a speech on this question. I am too unwell to do so. But I shall vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida, because, in my opinion, it tells the truth; because it represents this matter in its true light to the country, and exposes a condition of things, and a consideration connected with this business which, in my opinion, has not heretofore been fairly and properly represented to the country. I think the first I heard of this proposition was when it originated with the Senator from North Carolina—one of the best friends and warmest advocates of the measure. I considered it, then, as a virtual abandonment of the ground on which this appropriation was asked for, and on which the contract was originally made. We were told, that these steamers were to be fit for war purposes. That was the only ground on which many Senators and Representatives justified their vote for the contract and appropriation in the first instance. It was either that or a monopoly. It was either that, or it was protection, and a gratuity to a particular interest.

The only ground upon which gentlemen holding certain opinions could justify their votes for such a measure, was, that it was no protection, but a simple exercise of the power to create and establish and maintain a Navy. The friends of the measure, I think, were fairly represented the other day, by the Senator from North Carolina, when he made this suggestion. They then came forward and abandoned their own bantling; and we have now before us the naked proposition of giving protection to a particular interest and a particular pursuit; or, on the other hand, of making it a simple mail line, which appeals to Congress and the country, and which ought only to be conducted under the provisions of the general law. Let the Atlantic mail line be placed upon the same footing with all our interior lines, whether by land or water. It is because the amendment of the Senator from Florida presents the question in this aspect, that I shall vote for it. It tells the truth.

Mr. RUSK called for the yeas and nays on the amendment to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken, resulted—yeas 18, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Borland, Brodhead, Butler, Cooper, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Hunter, Jones of Tennessee, King, Mallory, Mason, Sebastian, Underwood, Wade, and Weller—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Badger, Bell, Berrien, Bright, Cass, Clarke, Dawson, Geyer, Hale, Hamlin, Houston, James, Mangum, Norris, Rusk, Seward, Smith, Sumner, and Upham—19.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BORLAND. I propose to offer some remarks upon the amendment as it now stands; but as the day is pretty much consumed, and as I am very much indisposed, I do not think I shall be able to get through to-day, even if I should undertake to speak. I move to postpone the further consideration of the subject until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

RAILROADS IN FLORIDA.

The engrossed bill granting the right of way and making a grant of land to the States of Florida and Alabama, in aid of the construction of a railroad from the waters of Pensacola bay, in Florida, to Montgomery, in the State of Alabama, and for other purposes, was read a third time; and, after the title had been amended to read as follows, it was passed:

An act granting the right of way and making a grant of land to the States of Florida and Alabama, in aid of the construction of a railroad from the waters of Pensacola bay, in Florida, to Montgomery, in the State of Alabama; also, a railroad from Pensacola bay to Mobile bay; and of a railroad to the Chattahoochee and Flint rivers, Georgia.

RAILROAD FROM LOUISVILLE TO ST. LOUIS.

The engrossed bill granting lands and the right of way to the States of Indiana and Illinois, in aid of the construction of a railroad from a point on the Ohio river, opposite to Louisville, Kentucky, to a point opposite to St. Louis, in Missouri, was read a third time, and passed.

ISLAND OF MATINICAS.

On the motion of Mr. HAMLIN, the bill to annex the Island of Matinicas, in the county of Lincoln, in the State of Maine, to the collection district of Waldoboro', in said county, was read a second time, and the Senate proceeded to consider it as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HAMLIN. This bill is simply to change the boundary of a collection district, owing to a change of the limits of a county.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On the motion of Mr. WELLER, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 11, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I ask the consent of the House to make a report from that portion of the Committee on Printing belonging to the House.

RECESS.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the consideration of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be authorized and directed to have the Hall refitted and cleansed for the summer session, and that the House adjourn on Tuesday, the first day of June, until Friday, the fourth of June, in order to allow the usual time for that purpose.

The state of the question is this: the resolution has been amended by the substitution of the words the "thirteenth of May until the seventeenth of May," for the words "Tuesday, the first day of June until Friday the fourth day of June."

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] has moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted, and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. JOHNSON] has moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table. Pending the question on which, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWEETSER] moved to lay the whole subject on the table; upon which motion the yeas and nays have been ordered. The question will be first on the motion to lay upon the table.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I call for the regular order of business, and trust that that business may be completed at once.

Mr. STANTON. I trust I may be permitted to make this report, with a view that its consideration be postponed until some future day. I design leaving the city for a few days, and I am particularly anxious to hand in the report before I leave.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will say to my friend that it will not take more than ten minutes to dispose of the resolution with regard to a recess. When this printing comes up, none can tell where discussion will stop. The gentleman can as well submit his resolution after the House have acted upon this matter as at the present time.

Mr. POLK. I think it will take more than ten minutes to consider the resolution in reference to a recess of the House, for the purpose of cleansing the Hall.

Mr. STANTON. This is a report in the case of Mr. Ritchie. It has nothing to do with the controversy now going on upon the subject of printing, but simply provides for a settlement of his accounts. All I desire is, that it shall be introduced, and the action upon it postponed until some future day.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman proposes to make a report from the Printing Committee, he will remember that he has the privilege of doing so, except when another privileged question is pending. A privileged motion is now pending; and as the reception of the report is objected to by several, it is not now in order for the gentleman to present it. Does the gentleman from Arkansas withdraw his objection?

Mr. JOHNSON. I would ask the gentleman what time it is going to take for him to have his report postponed?

Mr. MEACHAM. I object to anything out of the regular order of business.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is it in order to move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. It is not during the pendency of the previous question, which was ordered to be put, and while the House are in the execution of the direct orders of the House.

Mr. HOUSTON. Does the Chair decide that the resolution under consideration on yesterday takes precedence?

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the resolution is the unfinished business on a privileged motion, and that no motion to go into Committee of the Whole is in order during the pendency of that question.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] moved, during the session of yesterday, to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted making the adjournment for the recess from the 13th to the 17th of May. I am, and have been, indifferent myself as to the particular time we shall determine upon for the taking of the recess. I moved to lay upon the table his motion to reconsider; but a direct vote is just as well, and I have no objection to the House having it. I will, therefore, withdraw my motion to lay upon the table his motion to reconsider. The House will then be at liberty to reconsider or not, as it deems proper. I believe that the previous question has been already ordered upon the subject.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is the motion made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SWEETSER,] to lay the resolution upon the table.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I will only say one word. The only objection I have to this resolution is, that if we adjourn over now, another week will be lost after the 1st of June, when the Democratic Convention is in session, and another week after the third week in June, when the Whig Convention will be in session.

Mr. STANLY. That also is my objection.

Mr. JONES. We may save the time that we now propose to adjourn over by agreeing to the time proposed in the original resolution.

Mr. STANLY. That is my only objection. I oppose the amendment simply for that reason.

The question then being taken upon the motion to lay the resolution upon the table, it was disagreed to—yeas 53, nays 106; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Barrere, Bell, Bibb, Bingham, Bowne, Bragg, Albert G. Brown, George H. Brown, Joseph Cable, Chandler, Clark, Clingman, Cottman, John G. Davis, Evans, Grow, Hamilton, Harper, Isham G. Harris, Haws, Hendricks, Horstoll, Houston, John W. Howe, Ives, Andrew Johnson, George W. Jones, Meacham, Miller, John Moore, Morehead, Peaslee, Phelps, Polk, Porter, Powell, Robbins, Savage, Origen S. Seymour, Smith, Stanley, Benjamin Stanton, Stone, Strother, Sweetser, Taylor, Tuck, Wallace, Watkins, Welch, Alexander White, Williams, and Yates—53.

NAYS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Allison, J. Appleton, Averett, Babcock, Bartlett, Beale, Bissell, Breckinridge, Briggs, Buell, Busby, E. C. Cabell, Thompson Campbell, Carter, Chapman, Chastain, Cleveland, Cobb, Cullom, Curtis, Geo. T. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Dittmick, Disney, Dockery, Doty, Duncan, Durkee, Faulkner, Fitch, Florence, Floyd, Fowler, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gamble, Gaylord, Giddings, Gorman, Green, Hall, Sampson W. Harris, Hart, Hebard, Henn, Hibbard, Holladay, Howard, Thomas Y. How, Ingersoll, Jackson, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, J. Glancy Jones, George G. King, Preston King, Kurtz, Landry, Letcher, Lockhart, Mace, Martin, Mason, McCorkle, McDonald, McLanahan, McNair, McQueen, Milson, Miner, Molony, Murphy, Orr, Outlaw, Samuel W. Parker, Penn, Pennington, Perkins, Richardson, Riddle, Robinson, Ross, Russell, Sackett, Schermerhorn, Scholecraft, Scudder, Scurry, David L. Seymour, Skelton, Snow, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Abraham P. Stevens, Alexander H. Stephens, St. Martin, Stratton, George W. Thompson, Thurston, Townsend, Ward, Washburn, Addison White, Wilcox, and Woodward—106.

So the motion was disagreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs upon the motion to reconsider the amendment adopted yesterday to the original resolution.

Mr. JONES. Was not the yeas and nays ordered on this motion yesterday?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not,

Mr. JONES. Then I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. HART. Is it in order to move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. HART. I then submit that motion.

The question was then put on the motion to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; and upon a division, there were—ayes 60, noes 75.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. STANTON, of Tennessee, and CABELL, of Florida, were appointed.

Mr. McMULLIN. Will the Chair please to state the question?

The SPEAKER. On yesterday the words "from Tuesday, the 1st day of June, to Friday, the 4th day of June," were stricken from the original resolution, and the words "from the 13th to the 17th of May" inserted, by a vote of the House. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] then moved to reconsider that vote, and it is now moved by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HART] that that motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The question being again put, the tellers reported that there were, ayes 79.

Mr. JONES. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. CABELL. I rise to a question of order. My point is, that it is not in order to entertain a demand for the yeas and nays while the House is dividing.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. It is well taken, and the tellers will resume their places.

The tellers having resumed their places, reported, noes 66.

Mr. JONES. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken upon the motion to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table, and it was agreed to—ayes 92, nays 88; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Aiken, Willis Allen, Allison, John Appleton, Babcock, Thomas H. Bayly, Beale, Bibbiana, Bissell, Breckinridge, Briggs, Busby, E. Carrington Cabell, Thompson Campbell, Thompson Campbell, Carter, Caskie, Chastain, Cleveland, Colcock, Conger, Dawson, Dean, Dimmick, Disney, Doty, Durkee, Eastman, Faulkner, Florence, Fowler, Henry M. Fuller, Gamble, Gaylord, Gilmore, Green, Grey, Hall, Sampson W. Harris, Hart, Hascall, Hibbard, Holladay, Howard, Thomas M. Howe, Ingersoll, Jackson, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, J. Glancy Jones, Kurtz, Landry, Letcher, Mace, Mason, McCorkle, McDonald, McLanahan, McMullin, McNair, McQueen, Molony, Henry D. Moore, John Moore, Murphy, Olds, Orr, Outlaw, Samuel W. Parker, Penn, Richardson, Riddle, Savage, Schermerhorn, David L. Seymour, Skelton, Smith, Snow, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Abraham P. Stevens, Alexander H. Stephens, Stone, St. Martin, Stratton, Strother, George W. Thompson, Toombs, Ward, Addison White, Williams, and Woodward—92.

NAYS—Messrs. Charles Allen, Averett, Barrere, Bartlett, Bell, Bissell, Bocock, Bowne, Albert G. Brown, Geo. H. Brown, Buell, Burrows, Joseph Cable, Chandler, Chapman, Churchwell, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Cottman, Cullum, George T. Davis, John G. Davis, Dimmick, Dockery, Duncan, Edmundson, Evans, Fitch, Floyd, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Giddings, Gorman, Grow, Hamilton, Harper, Isham G. Harris, Haws, Hebard, Hendricks, Henn, Horsford, Houston, Jno. W. Howe, Thos. Y. How, Ives, Jenkins, Andrew Johnson, George W. Jones, George G. King, Preston King, Lockhart, Mann, Martin, Meacham, Miller, Milson, Miner, Morehead, Newton, Peaslee, Pennington, Perkins, Robinson, Ross, Sackett, Schoolcraft, Scurry, Origen S. Seymour, Stanly, Benjamin Stanton, Sweetser, Taylor, George W. Thompson, Thurston, Townshend, Tuck, Wallace, Washburn, Watkins, Welch, Alexander White, Wilcox, and Yates—88.

So the motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

The question then recurred upon the adoption of the resolution as amended.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, there being, upon a division—ayes 28, noes 127.

Mr. JONES. I call for tellers upon the yeas and nays.

[Cries of "It is too late!" "It is too late!"]

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I rise to a question of order, that the gentleman's demand for tellers is made too late. If the Chair sustains my point of order, I insist that the rules of the House be enforced.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will perceive that his demand for tellers comes too late. The Chair had announced the result of the vote; but the Chair would be glad that the gentleman would be indulged by the House, to allow him to make his demand. It is important, however, that the Chair should enforce the rule when required to do so by gentlemen.

Mr. HAMILTON. I will state to the Chair that, previous to his announcement of the result of the vote that has just been taken, I rose up in my place and called for tellers upon the demand for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. That being so, the Chair will then entertain the demand.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. PENN and CHANDLER were appointed. The tellers, on making a count, reported—ayes 35; deemed to be a sufficient number.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken, and there were—ayes 89, nays 83; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Allison, John Appleton, Babcock, Thomas H. Bayly, Beale, Bibbiana, Bissell, Breckinridge, Briggs, Busby, E. Carrington Cabell, Thompson Campbell, Carter, Caskie, Chastain, Churchwell, Cleveland, Colcock, Conger, Dawson, Dean, Dimmick, Disney, Doty, Durkee, Faulkner, Fitch, Florence, Fowler, Henry M. Fuller, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gamble, Gaylord, Giddings, Gilmore, Green, Grey, Hall, Sampson W. Harris, Hart, Hascall, Holladay, Howard, Thomas M. Howe, Thomas Y. How, Ingersoll, Jackson, Jenkins, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, J. Glancy Jones, Kurtz, Landry, Letcher, Mace, Mason, McDonald, McLanahan, McMullin, McNair, McQueen, Molony, Murphy, Olds, Orr, Outlaw, Samuel W. Parker, Penn, Polk, Richardson, Riddle, Savage, Schermerhorn, David L. Seymour, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Abraham P. Stevens, Alexander H. Stephens, Stone, St. Martin, Stratton, Strother, Toombs, Townshend, Ward, Addison White, Williams, and Woodward—89.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, Willis Allen, Averett, Barrere, Bell, Bocock, Bragg, Albert G. Brown, George H. Brown, Buell, Burrows, J. Cable, Chandler, Chapman, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Cottman, Cullum, Curtis, J. G. Davis, Dockery, Duncan, Edmundson, Evans, Floyd, Gorman, Grow, Hamilton, Harper, Isham G. Harris, Haws, Hebard, Hendricks, Hibbard, Horsford, Houston, J. W. Howe, Ives, Andrew Johnson, George W. Jones, George G. King, Preston King, Lockhart, Mann, Martin, Meacham, Miller, Milson, Miner, Henry D. Moore, John Moore, Morehead, Newton, Peaslee, Pennington, Perkins, Porter, Powell, Robbins, Robinson, Ross, Sackett, Schoolcraft, Scudder, Scurry, Origen S. Seymour, Smith, Stanly, Benjamin Stanton, Sweetser, Taylor, George W. Thompson, Thurston, Tuck, Walbridge, Wallace, Washburn, Watkins, Welch, Alexander White, Wilcox, and Yates—83.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The question was then taken on the latter motion, and it was agreed to.

HOMESTEAD BILL.

Mr. McMULLIN. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the special order.

The question was then put and carried in the affirmative. Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. HIBBARD in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN stated, as the business before the committee, the consideration of House bill No. 7, being a bill to encourage agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The last section of the bill is still open to amendment.

The last section of the bill was read, as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That no individual shall be permitted to make more than one entry under the provisions of this act; and that the Commissioner of the General Land Office is hereby required to prepare and issue such rules and regulations, consistent with this act, as shall be necessary and proper to carry its provisions into effect; and that the registers and receivers of the several land offices shall be entitled to receive the same compensation for any lands patented under the provisions of this act, that they are now entitled to receive when the same quantity of land is entered with money to be paid by the party to whom the patent shall be issued: Provided, however, That all persons entering land under the provisions of this act, shall, as near as may be practicable, in making such entries, be confined to each alternate quarter section, and to land subject to private entry: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to impair or interfere in any manner whatever with existing preemption rights."

Mr. HENN. I wish to offer the following amendment to this section, to come in after the word "issued," and before the word "provided," in the same line, viz:

One fourth to be paid at the time of making application and filing the affidavit, as required by the second section of this act, and the remainder at the time of filing the final proof: Provided, That the whole compensation of said officers under this and all other acts of Congress shall not exceed the sum of $3,000.

On yesterday I offered an amendment, the object of which was to pay the officers who shall have done the work. That amendment did not exactly cover the case. I now propose an amendment which I think covers the whole case. By looking at the second section, it will be seen, that only persons making an application, have a right to one hundred and sixty acres, under this law, and they have to file an affidavit; and an entry has to be made in the books. Perhaps one quarter of the work is then done, and the balance of the work is done at the time the final proof is made. Consequently, it will be fair, and nothing but fair, to pay to these officers who do the work, at the time they do it. The original section as it now stands, would not, in my opinion, authorize pay to the officers who shall have done the work, but those who shall deliver the patent, four or five years after the officers who did the work shall have gone out of office. This I think is clearly wrong, and if it is the intention to pay the officers at all, it should be to those who do the work. I hope, therefore, that the amendment I have offered, will be adopted.

The question was then taken upon the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. SWEETSER. I move that the committee rise and report the bill.

Mr. BROWN. Before that is done, I desire to offer a substitute of which I have given notice.

Mr. HENN. I wish to add at the end of the section the following words, "or other valid claims." There are individual and State claims which might conflict with these claims.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is not possible. If there is a vested right, this bill cannot take it away.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. EVANS. Is it in order to move to strike out the whole section?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order.

Mr. EVANS. Then I make that motion; and I do it, not for the purpose of offering any general views with regard to this bill, or for the purpose of making a speech, but for the purpose of calling the attention of the committee, and particularly the honorable gentleman who reported it, to a simple fact. I have taken up the appropriation bills reported by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means—

Mr. SWEETSER. I call the gentleman to order. He is not speaking to his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is unable to see whether the gentleman is in order, until he progresses in his remarks.

Mr. EVANS. The Chair held, on a former day, upon a motion to strike out, that remarks of greater latitude might be made. I hope, however, that this interruption will not come out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposes that the remarks of the gentleman will be confined to advocating the amendment to strike out that section.

Mr. EVANS. The Chair held, on a former occasion, that remarks were in order which gave rise to a greater latitude of debate upon the motion to strike out. I will confine my remarks, however, to the motion to strike out this section. The honorable chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means—I hope the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWEETSER] will allow me to state it—

Mr. SWEETSER. I do not wish to be captious, but I insist upon the rule being enforced.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is unable to say whether the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. EVANS] is out of order or not, until he proceeds to debate his amendment. The Chair has not intended to rule upon any amendment, that it was in order to travel beyond it in debate. The gentleman must be confined in his remarks to showing that it is proper to strike out this section.

Mr. EVANS. In order to show whether I am or am not in order, it is necessary for me to say something, but I cannot get the chance. [Laughter.] The honorable chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means has reported, in the general appropriation bill, $971,000 for the purpose of continuing the survey of the public lands.

Mr. SWEETSER. I insist upon my point of order. I make the point of order, that the gentleman is speaking to another subject, and has committed himself to that policy.

Mr. EVANS. I hope the Chair will not take this out of my time. [Laughter.]

Mr. SWEETSER. I make the point of order seriously, and not out of any disrespect to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is disposed to hear the gentleman proceed in his remarks, and thinks that they are confined to the amendment.

Mr. SWEETSER. With all due respect to the Chair, I insist upon my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. SWEETSER. I take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is this: The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWEETSER] makes the point of order that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. EVANS] is out of order for irrelevancy in his remarks. The Chair overrules the point of order made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SWEETSER,] and from this decision the gentleman appeals. The question is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

The question was then taken upon the appeal, and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. EVANS. I would have been done before now, had I not been interrupted. I say, that the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means has reported $971,000—for I have added it up myself—for continuing surveys of the public lands, for expenses of the land offices, and the General Land Office in Washington. I submit to my honorable friend, [Mr. JOHNSON,] who sits in front of me, whether he ought not to provide in a bill that the cost of surveys of these lands shall be first paid by the party who takes them under this grant, and whether he ought not to submit an additional clause looking to that end? Does he intend that we shall appropriate $971,000 every year out of the General Treasury to buy farms? It will have that effect. Shall we make purchases based upon the custom-house revenue for the purpose of granting gratuities to any person? I wonder that the gentleman has not perceived that you ought to have every expense that is connected with these public lands deducted before you donate them. Suppose the expense of surveying the lands is ten cents per acre, you have eleven times one hundred and sixty to pay for the expense of land surveys alone on every quarter section.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. It is twenty-five cents per acre.

Mr. EVANS. I am told it is twenty-five cents; that ought to be paid by the party before he takes the land. I do not make these remarks out of any feeling; for I have not time, in five minutes, to express my general sentiments in regard to this matter; but I make this suggestion for the purpose of correcting that in this bill which must strike every gentleman who will look at the matter with fairness, as a thing decidedly improper. The whole amount of it is this: I will state it, and then take my seat, so as not to task too much the patience of the committee—that we are to take out of the Treasury $1,000,000 a year, with which we are to buy lands for the landless. You might as well give them the money; you might as well take the same money and buy lands in the old States at the same cost to the Government, if grantees choose to make their election, and to take their lands there instead of going to the new States at great expense; a journey, indeed, impossible to most who need the benefits of this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I do not desire to discuss this question, but merely wish to show that the objection made by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. EVANS] to this section, as it seems to me, is not well founded. The appropriation proposed to be made by the Committee on Ways and Means, to keep the land department going on, is made without any reference at all to this bill. They have not increased or diminished the amount in view of the passage of this bill; and it has nothing to do with this matter. I will remark, that it has been demonstrated upon a former occasion, if this system is carried out, it will increase the revenue to an extent greater than we shall receive from the whole land system as it is now.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JOHNSON] allow me to say, that the appropriations now contemplated and alluded to by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. EVANS,] are for the survey of lands that are not included within the provisions of this bill. They are to survey lands yet to be brought into market. This bill confines itself to lands subject to private entry, and therefore the argument of the gentleman does not apply.

Mr. EVANS. As soon as they are brought into market, they are certainly subject.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman is mistaken; they are brought into market and first offered at public sale. All that do not sell for as much as $1 25 per acre, are then subject to private entry.

Mr. EVANS. Unquestionably. I ask the gentleman if there are not 300,000,000 of acres now in the market subject to private entry, and whether these are surveyed?

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not remember the precise amount of acres subject to private entry, but suppose the gentleman greatly exceeds the true amount. If, however, the gentleman desires to strike the balance between this Government and the public lands, he will find that the Government has realized much more for the lands than their entire cost, including all expenses. I admit that this point does not involve the proper principle upon which the friends of this bill should place it—and I have only replied to my friend from Maryland, [Mr. EVANS.]

The question was then taken on Mr. EVANS's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. BELL. I offer the following, to come in as an additional section to the bill:

That the children, or when there are no children, then the father and mother of any deceased officer or soldier, who would, if living, have been entitled to the benefit of the act of Congress, passed September 28, 1850, shall be entitled to have a patent issued for such quantity of land as such officer or soldier would have been entitled to if living at the passage of said act, and when no land warrants had issued on account of such service, without requiring any occupation upon the same, on proof of the quantity such applicant is entitled to, and, also, on filing an affidavit of such applicant's intention to become an actual settler upon the same, such proof and affidavit to be made in such form as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr. OLDS. I make this point of order, that that same amendment was ruled out of order by the Chair yesterday, and is not germane to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair, the amendment is not in order, not being germane to the subject of the bill.

Mr. BELL. I call the attention of the Chair to the latter part of the amendment, which changes the time of occupation.

Mr. OLDS. The phraseology of the latter part of the amendment cannot alter the amendment itself, which is to change the descent of the lands granted under the bounty land bill. That cannot be germane to this bill.

Mr. BELL. I wish to suggest, in reply to my colleague, that the bill dispenses with occupation. The amendment is therefore surely pertinent to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill proposes certain grants of lands; to be entered upon certain terms. The amendment of the gentleman from Ohio proposes to extend the provisions of the bounty land act to a new class of persons. The Chair thinks that cannot be in order.

Mr. BELL. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The question being put, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?" was decided in the affirmative.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained as the judgment of the committee.

Mr. PENNIMAN. I offer the following as an additional section to the bill:

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act, any person making a purchase of public lands, shall first make an affidavit before the register or receiver of the land office where entry is proposed to be made, that the said applicant enters, or proposes to enter the same, for his own use and benefit, for settlement and cultivation, by and for himself or herself.

Mr. HALL. Is that amendment in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment proposes to make certain provisions respecting cases where persons purchase public land, and not where they enter land under the provisions of this bill. The Chair thinks this is a new subject, and not germane to the objects of this bill, and that it is not therefore in order.

Mr. EVANS. I move to amend the last section of the bill by adding thereto the following:

Provided, That all the costs of survey and entry shall be paid by the settlers.

I merely offer that amendment for the purpose of making a remark or two in answer to what was said by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON.]

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi. I rise to a point of order, and it is this: that that section having been passed, and two or three additional sections offered, it is now too late to go back and amend the section.

Mr. EVANS. In order to obviate that objection, I offer the amendment as an additional section to the bill. The honorable chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means remarked that the sum of money in his appropriation bills for surveys, amounting to nearly a million of dollars, was for the survey of lands yet to be brought into market, and offered at public sale. That is true, and it is also true that the lands have first to be offered at public sale, before they are subject to private entry. But it must strike everybody that none of these lands will be sold; for, the party desiring land has only to bide his time, and wait until the land has been offered at public sale, in order that he may enter it under this bill.

Now, I do not intend to embarrass the bill by any amendments, and for that reason I have not offered any. I merely desire to show to the friends of the bill the necessity of providing that all the expenses connected with the lands shall be borne by the lands themselves, and should not be made chargeable to the general Treasury.

I will now return to an argument, to which I barely alluded when I was last upon the floor. There are a great many persons in all parts of the country, who would prefer to enter a tract of land in one of the old States, than in a new State. Let us take it for granted that they would prefer twenty acres in an old State, to one hundred acres in a new State. Why, then, should you not, under the provisions of this bill, grant them as much money as the one hundred and sixty acres are worth, in order that they may therewith purchase twenty acres at home? You will provide them with homesteads in that way. There is an abundance of land in the old States, and parties there would really be benefited by not being compelled to go abroad. All the purposes so forcibly urged by the gentleman from Tennessee, and others, would thus be attained; these persons would have homes, they would be sheltered from the inclemency of the weather, and would no longer be liable to become paupers, at the charge of the public. Unless you put a provision in this bill, that the expense of the survey of the lands shall be borne by the settlers, why should you not make a grant of money out of the Treasury, to parties in the old States who would prefer to purchase a small tract of land in those States, rather than to have a large tract in the new States?

I am quite confident that this aspect of the case cannot have struck the friends of the bill, or they would not desire to run into the Treasury to the amount of a million of dollars a year, to keep up expensive land surveys, when there are already three hundred millions of acres of land surveyed, and subject to private entry. Why should you not put a provision in this bill, that the parties who take the lands shall pay the Government the actual expense, and no more? It is but just and fair. I shall not offer the amendment, because, as I intend to vote against the bill, it might be supposed that I offered it to embarrass the bill. But I trust some friend of the bill will offer it.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not desire to occupy the time of the committee, but I must say a word in reply to the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. EVANS.] The gentleman says my argument is not a good one, for the reason that the lands when offered at public sale will not be purchased. Now, if he is not mistaken in that fact, he thereby presents the serious charge against the Administration of bringing lands into market before a public demand exists for them. Why are lands brought into market? To satisfy the demands for settlement and cultivation. The President of the United States must withhold those lands from sale until the public necessities and the imperative demands of settlement require that they shall be brought into market. If the lands already in market are sufficient for the wants of the population of the country, no more should be thrown upon the market. It does not follow that because the surveys are kept up, or even extended, that therefore the lands must necessarily be thrown upon the market—the surveys always do and should largely precede the sales; and a President of the United States fails to do his duty who fails to consult the demand before proclaiming lands for public sale.

The gentleman says he does not intend to press this amendment, but he thinks the friends of the bill ought to offer it. This is the last time I intend to occupy the committee on this bill; and I wish to say to the friends of the bill that if they desire to pass it, they should remain in their seats to-day and press it forward; they should do the voting, and let those who are opposed to it do the speaking. It is proper that we should finish the bill to-day. Every consideration connected with the business of the country demands it. Let gentlemen who are opposed to it offer their amendments, but let the friends of the measure stay in their places and vote them down, and in that way obtain an early vote upon the bill. It is no act of friendship to the bill on the part of any gentleman to be pressing amendments. The bill may be imperfect in some of its details—I have no doubt but it is. All of our legislation is more or less imperfect. It is not to be expected that we shall get this or any other bill perfect. We must rely upon experience to point out its imperfections, and subsequent legislation to correct them. Some of the Representatives from the old States have pursued a course which has forced this state of things upon the country. The Representatives of the new States have not desired this mode of obtaining the public lands; they have not heretofore desired the passing of this bill; they preferred a fair and proper graduation bill. I yet prefer such a bill; but you refused us that—you deny us justice. The lands in the new States should long ago have been graduated according to their true value. We sought that, and time after time pressed it upon your consideration. We regarded it then, and regard it now, as an act of justice to all parties concerned. It was justly due to your general Treasury that it should be done. It was due to the States within whose limits these refuse lands are situated, that they should be allowed to go upon the market for their value, and not withheld because of the unreasonableness of the price demanded for them; and it was equally due to our people who wanted homes in which to live and rear and educate their families that this act of justice should have been done long since. You refused us our reasonable and just demands; you turned us a deaf ear, and you are responsible for the error if wrong exists.

The question was then taken upon Mr. EVANS's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi. I now move to strike out all of the original bill, after the enacting clause, and to insert the substitute which I will send to the Chair.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. Is not this a subject of debate?

The CHAIRMAN. It is when the substitute has been reported to the House.

Mr. COBB. I have an amendment which I desire to propose to that bill at a proper time. I am not certain whether the proper time to offer it is now, or after the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Brown] shall have been disposed of.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of order. I desire to know if the substitute of the gentleman from Mississippi has been read?

The CHAIRMAN. It has not.

Mr. HARRIS. Then I submit that nothing is in order until that substitute has been read, and is regularly before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct, unless the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Cobb] proposes to offer an amendment to the original bill. If so, that will take precedence.

Mr. COBB. I rise for information. I desire to know whether my amendment is in order now, or whether it is proper that I should wait until the substitute of the gentleman from Mississippi has been disposed of?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair cannot tell whether the amendment is in order as an amendment to the original bill or not until the amendment is offered.

Mr. COBB. I then offer the following amendment to the original bill, which I send to the Chair, and ask that it may be read.

It was read by the Clerk, as follows:

At the end of the bill insert the following:

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That all of the public lands of the United States which shall have been in market for ten years or upwards, prior to the time of application to enter the same under the provisions of this act, and still remaining unsold, shall be subject to sale, at the price of one dollar per acre; and all the lands of the United States that shall have been in market for fifteen years or upwards, as aforesaid, and still remaining unsold, shall be subject to sale at seventy-five cents per acre; and all of the lands of the United States that shall have been in market for twenty years or upwards, as aforesaid, and still remaining unsold, shall be subject to sale at fifty cents per acre; and all of the lands of the United States that shall have been in market for twenty-five years or upwards, as aforesaid, and still remaining unsold, shall be subject to sale at twenty-five cents per acre; and all lands of the United States that shall have been in market for thirty years or more, shall be subject to sale at twelve and a half cents per acre: Provided, This section shall not be so construed as to extend to lands reserved to the United States, in acts granting land to States for railroad or other internal improvements, or to mineral lands held at $1 25 per acre.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That upon every reduction in price, under the provisions of this act, the occupant and settler upon the lands shall have the right of preemption at such graduated price, upon the same terms, conditions, restrictions, and limitations upon which the public lands of the United States are now subject to the right of preemption, until the next graduation or reduction shall take place; and if not so purchased, shall again be subject to right of preemption for twelve months as before, and so on from time to time, as reductions take place: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to interfere with any right which has or may accrue by virtue of any act granting preemption to actual settlers upon the public lands.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That any person applying to enter any of the aforesaid lands under the provisions of the eighth and ninth sections of this act, shall be required to make affidavit before the register or receiver of the proper land office, that he or she enters the same for his or her own use, and for the purpose of actual settlement and cultivation, or for the use of an adjoining farm or plantation, owned or occupied by him or herself, and together with said entry, he or she has not acquired from the United States, under the provisions of this act, more than three hundred and twenty acres according to the established surveys; and if any person or persons taking such oath or affidavit shall swear falsely in the premises, he or she shall be subject to all the pains and penalties of perjury.

Mr. OLDS. I rise to a point of order. I submit that the original bill provides for the donation of the public lands to actual settlers. The amendment provides for graduating the price of the public lands, which is not germane to the object of the original bill, and therefore not in order.

Mr. COBB. I should like to hear the decision of the Chair upon that. It strikes me as rather strange that this opposition should come from such a quarter.

The CHAIRMAN. It is the impression of the Chair, that this amendment is upon a subject differing substantially from the original bill, and he therefore rules it out of order.

Mr. COBB. I will yield to the decision of the Chair.

A VOICE. Take an appeal.

Mr. COBB. No, I will not take an appeal; but I will say that, after the amount of lands given to the State of Ohio, I did not expect this point would be raised upon me by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. OLDS.]

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

Mr. OLDS. When the rules of the House were invaded, I deemed it a matter of duty to raise a point of order.

Mr. COBB. I desire then to state, and I presume there will be no objection, that I am a friend of the homestead bill, and my object in offering this amendment was not to embarrass it. I shall vote for the bill.

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is out of order.

Mr. COBB. Well, I can make my speech upon some other occasion.

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi. I now offer my substitute for the original bill.

It was read by the Clerk, as follows:

That the laws now in force, granting preemption to actual settlers on the public lands, shall continue until otherwise ordered by Congress, and that the same be extended to all the Territories of the United States.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act, the rights of preceptors shall be perpetuated; that is to say, persons acquiring the right of preemption shall retain the same without disturbance, and without payment of any kind to the United States, but on these conditions: First The preceptor shall not sell, alienate, or dispose of his or her right for a consideration; and if he or she voluntarily abandons one preemption and claims another, no right shall be acquired by such claim, until the claimant shall first have testified, under oath, before the register of the land office when the claim is preferred, that he or she has voluntarily abandoned his or her original preemption, and that no consideration, reward, or payment of any kind has been received, or is expected, directly or indirectly, as an inducement for such abandonment; and any person who shall testify falsely in such case, shall be deemed guilty of perjury. Second, Any person claiming and holding the right of preemption to lands under this act, may be required, by the State within which the same lies, to pay taxes thereon; and in case such lands are sold for taxes, the purchaser shall acquire such rights as the preceptor had and none other. Third, Absence of the preceptor and his family, for six consecutive months, shall be deemed an abandonment, and the land shall, in such case, revert to the United States, and be subject to the same disposition as other public lands.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That lands preempted, and the improvements thereon, shall not be subject to execution sale, or other sale for debt; and all contracts made in reference thereto, intended in any wise to alienate the right, or to embarrass or disturb the preceptor in his or her occupancy, shall be absolutely null and void.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the preceptor may, at any time, at his or her discretion, enter the lands preempted, by paying therefor to the proper officer of the United States one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That in case of the preceptor's death, if a married man, his right shall survive to his widow and infant children, but the rights of the older children shall cease as they respectively come of age, or when they reach the age of twenty-one years; in all cases the right of preemption shall remain in the youngest child. And in case of the death of both father and mother, leaving an infant child or children, the executor, administrator or guardian may, upon submitting satisfactory proof of that fact to the register and receiver of the proper land office, demand a certificate of title to the land so preempted for the benefit of said infant child or children, and may thereafter sell said lands, or otherwise dispose of them, for the benefit of the infant child or children aforesaid.

Mr. HALL. I rise to a point of order. I understand this substitute changes the existing preemption laws, and is not germane to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri makes the point of order, that the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Brown] is not germane to the bill, and therefore is not in order. The Chair is of the opinion that the point is well taken, and that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. BROWN. I appeal from that decision. I suppose I have the right to state the grounds for my appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman with pleasure, if there be no objection.

Mr. HALL. I object; the appeal is not debatable.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made, and the gentleman cannot debate the appeal.

Mr. BROWN. I suppose any gentleman has the right to state the grounds upon which his appeal is made. The simple privilege of saying "I appeal from the decision of the Chair," is no privilege at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman with pleasure if there be no objection.

Mr. HALL. But I do object.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman cannot proceed.

Mr. BROWN. Does the Chair decide that I have not the right to state the ground upon which I appeal from his decision?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been closed, by order of the House, upon this bill. The Chair understands that that order applies to all debate upon points of order, and therefore it is not in order for the gentleman to discuss the appeal.

Mr. HALL. I repeat that I object to any discussion upon the question. It is not necessary for me to repeat my objection half a dozen times.

Mr. BROWN. I do not wish to debate it.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Brown] proposes to state any fact, that may be in order as an explanation; but matter in the nature of debate, the Chair supposes is not in order.

Mr. BROWN. I mean only to state that the Chair is mistaken in his decision in this, that the original bill proposes to give the land to the settler, but the substitute proposes to give him only the right of occupancy; and the two subjects are precisely the same, or as near as they can be.

Mr. HALL. I call the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Brown] to order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the remarks of the gentleman [Mr. Brown] partake of the nature of debate.

Mr. BROWN. I have this to say, that if the friends of this bill are disposed to choke debate in this manner, I for one will abandon the bill.

A VOICE. So will I.

Mr. McMULLIN. I desire to know of the Chair, if the information is in his possession, if this same amendment, or one of a like character, was not offered to a bill of a like character, in the Thirty-first Congress, and it was not then ruled out of order?

Mr. HALL. I call the gentleman from Virginia to order.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a question for the Chair to decide. The question now before the committee is upon the appeal taken by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Brown] to the decision of the Chair.

Mr. McMULLIN. Do I understand the Chair to decline to answer?

A Voice. Order! Order! I call the gentleman to order.

The CHAIRMAN. It will not be in order for the Chair to debate this question, any more than for any other member of the committee. That matter relates to a point of history, which is argumentative, and not a question of order.

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi. I ask for tellers upon the appeal.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. McMULLIN and Brown appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 56, noes 66.

The CHAIRMAN. The decision of the Chair is overruled, and the substitute offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Brown] is decided to be in order. The question now is upon that amendment.

Mr. BROWN. I do not intend to detain the committee even with a five minutes' speech, for I am as anxious as other gentlemen can be that we shall dispose of this question to-day. But I am anxious, sir, that the American Congress, in disposing of the public lands, shall at least protect the persons who are the recipients of this bounty against imposition. It does seem to me, sir, that if we give the occupant the right to settle upon the land, and to remain there so long as he chooses to remain, we shall have accomplished all for the settler that the most benevolent could desire. You secure him in the possession of a home—you secure him in a position against his own profligacy, against his own misfortune, and against all the world, including himself. It is his home; from which he cannot be turned out, under the provisions of this substitute. If you give him the title to the land, you expose him to be turned out by misfortune, by waste, by profligacy, and in a thousand ways; and then the land which you have given to him is gone, not only from the Government, but from the recipient of the bounty.

As I said in a speech I made a few days since, I do not stand here for the purpose of giving men lands to pay their debts with, but I stand here to protect men, as far as I can, against misfortune, and against their own wasteful profligacy. I am ready to give them a home upon the public land, and secure them in the possession of it so long as they think proper to remain there; and whenever they think proper to own the soil, in their own right, I am for taking the money from them, as I would from anybody else.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If the gentleman will permit me, I would ask him what, in his opinion, a tract of land of one hundred and sixty acres is worth, supposing the settler has been on it ten or fifteen or twenty years? How much is it worth aside from the labor which he has put upon it?

Mr. BROWN. That will depend altogether upon the quality of the land, and its location. If it happens to be on a navigable stream it may be worth twenty dollars per acre. If it be in the barren pine lands it will be worth nothing. If it be worth twenty dollars per acre, then the occupant can hold it at one dollar and a quarter per acre and pocket the profits, as he ought to do, and as he ought to be secured the right to do. But if it be a piece of barren pine land, remote from market, and of no value, he can remain upon it ten, twenty, or a hundred years, without buying it at all.

Mr. JONES. I ask the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. Brown,] if it is not the labor which the settler may have put upon his tract of land, and the labor which others put upon the land in the neighborhood, that gives the land its value, and not the location? I ask him to say what are the public lands in the new country worth where there are no settlers?

Mr. HALL. I wish to prevent discussion upon this proposition. I am opposed to the amendment.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. Is it in order to move a substitute for the substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. A substitute is in the nature of an amendment, and is itself amendable.

Mr. HARRIS. Then I offer as an amendment, by way of a substitute for the substitute offered by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. Brown,] what I send to the Speaker's table.

Mr. BROWN. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman proposes to strike out the whole of the amendment proposed by me. That, I think, is out of order. He cannot strike out the whole of it, because it is equivalent to a vote upon the proposition itself, which is not an amendment to an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If the motion of the gentleman was simply to strike out the whole of the original amendment the Chair thinks it would not be in order, but as he proposes to strike out, and insert a substitute, the Chair thinks it is in order.

The Clerk then read the substitute offered by Mr. HARRIS, as follows:

SEC. 1. And be it further enacted, That all of the lands of the United States lying within any State of this Union, which were subject to entry on the first day of July, eighteen hundred and fifty-one, and have not since been sold, shall be subject to entry for actual settlement and cultivation, for any quantity not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres, as follows, viz: all of such lands which, on that day, had been subject to entry ten years and not exceeding twenty years, may be entered, under this act, at the price of one dollar per acre; all of such lands which had been subject to entry twenty years and not exceeding thirty years, may be entered at the price of seventy-five cents per acre; all of such lands which had been subject to entry thirty years, may be entered at the price of fifty cents per acre; all of such lands which had been subject to entry less than ten years on said first day of July, eighteen hundred and fifty-one, which shall not be sold under the existing laws within ten years thereafter, shall, after that time, be subject to entry as aforesaid, at the price of one dollar per acre. And when any of the aforesaid lands shall have remained ten years subject to entry, at any of the reduced rates aforesaid, without being sold, the price shall be reduced twenty-five cents per acre; and such reduction of twenty-five cents per acre continue to be made every ten years, until such lands shall be sold, or the price thereof be reduced to twenty-five cents per acre. And on any day appointed as aforesaid for the reduction of the price of the said public lands, any other lands of the United States, lying within the said States, not subject to entry on the first day of July, eighteen hundred and fifty-one, which shall have been subject to entry ten years or upwards, on any such future day for reducing prices as aforesaid, shall be subject to a like reduction of twenty-five cents per acre, which reduction shall be repeated every ten years until the land shall be sold, or the price reduced to twenty-five cents per acre: Provided, however, That no land shall be considered as entered under this act, unless the price at which it is entered is less than one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre: And provided further, That no alternate sections or mineral lands which have been or may be reserved by the United States, shall be entered under this act.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the person making entry or application for entry under this act, at a price less than one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, shall first make an affidavit before the register or receiver of the land office where the entry is proposed to be made, that the said applicant enters and proposes to enter the same for his own use and benefit, for settlement and cultivation by and for himself or herself, and that the said applicant has made no entry under the provisions of this act, which, with the additional entry then proposed to be made, will make the whole quantity so entered and proposed to be entered exceed one hundred and sixty acres.

Mr. OLDS. I rise to a point of order, which is, that the amendment is not germane to the bill. Its object is precisely the same as that proposed by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Cobb,] to graduate the price of the public lands; which was ruled out of order.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. The object of the amendment is to change the mode of disposing of the public lands, which is the object of the original bill, and is, therefore, certainly in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio makes a question of order that the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Harris] to the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi is not in order, it being not germane to the subject of the substitute.

Mr. CLARK. I wish to ask the question if it is not as much in order as that to which it is proposed as an amendment, which was ruled to be in order by the House, when an appeal was taken from the decision of the Chair, deciding it to be out of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair begs leave of the committee to state that, but for the recent decision of the Chair being overruled, that the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi was out of order, it would be the individual opinion of the Chair that the present amendment is not in order. The Chair understands the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi to provide for a system of preemption, and that of the gentleman from Tennessee in effect a system of the graduation of the price of the public lands to actual settlers.

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi. The Chair misunderstands the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. OLDS. The motion is to strike out the amendment which the committee ruled to be in order, and to insert this of the gentleman from Tennessee, which is of the same nature as that presented by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Cobb,] and ruled out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. It is the opinion of the Chair, in accordance with the spirit of the decision of the committee, which he thinks it is proper and his duty to respect, that the amendment of the gentleman is in order, and he so decides.

Mr. OLDS. From that decision I take an appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question was then put, and, upon a division, there were—ayes 66, noes 56.

Mr. MASON. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. Brown and McDonald were appointed.

The question was again put, and it was decided in the affirmative, the tellers having reported—ayes 68, noes 55.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. I do not know, sir, with what favor the amendment I have offered may meet in this committee. It indicates, however, very clearly, my own views as to the proper policy of this Government respecting public lands, and I think it should be adopted.

By adopting the policy of this amendment, there will be several important objects obtained—the first of which is to bring within the reach of every industrious citizen of the United States a home at a price so low that he may obtain and make his own, avoiding the doubtful question as to the constitutional power to donate the public lands; and also the question (of equal doubt, in my mind) as to the policy of giving the public lands that belong to all the people of the United States to a portion of the people of the United States. Each of these questions of doubt are avoided by the adoption of my amendment. The prices of the land are reduced twenty-five cents per acre for every ten years they have remained in the market subject to entry, until they are reduced to twenty-five cents per acre, a rate at which, I think, all men may obtain a home without much difficulty, in any part of the United States. The amendment, in another point of view, is, I think, worthy of the favorable consideration of the committee. It is certainly very improper that lands of all qualities, varying as they do in quality and value, should be held at the same price, and anything that approximates fixing them at prices in accordance with the actual value is certainly just and proper. I know that from the length of time that lands have been held in the market, subject to private entry, is not an accurate or infallible standard of value, but it approximates as nearly to it, in my opinion, as any other policy that is practicable that we can adopt. Of course, when the lands are thrown into market, all subject to entry at the same price, the best lands are invariably first selected, leaving the worst lands longest in the market.

Under the provisions of this amendment, it will be observed that none but the actual settler can avail himself of the reduced prices or graduated rates. Before he can make an entry under the provisions of this bill, he must show that the entry is being made for the purpose of actual settlement and cultivation, and he is limited in quantity at these rates, to one hundred and sixty acres. The lands are held subject to entry by persons other than actual settlers at the minimum of $1.25 an acre, thus securing them at low price to the actual settler, and at the same time, withholding them from the control of the speculator.

For these, and other reasons that I cannot give within the limits of a five minutes' speech, I have thought proper to offer this amendment, reflecting as it does my own opinions as to the true policy of this Government respecting the disposition of the public lands.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I have not participated heretofore in this debate, yet I could see in the bill presented by the colleague of the gentleman who has just taken his seat, [Mr. JOHNSON,] a very valuable principle, which I thought ought to be ingrafted upon the land system of the country—one which, if adopted, would contribute vastly to the national wealth, and be doing an act of justice to the hard-working and laborious citizen of the country, who might thereby be induced to settle upon the uncultivated lands of the West. I have, however, all along seen a difficulty about it. I have felt oppressed with the idea of a donation of the public lands under those cessions by which the Government has derived title to them, but I have looked with pleasure to the proposition which has just been presented by the honorable gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. BROWN,] as relieving us from that embarrassment, while it preserves that grand feature which I think should not be overlooked. Every individual who wishes to enter upon the public lands, to select a proper portion of them, and to become an industrious cultivator of the soil, should have that opportunity, and thereby contribute to the public wealth. The amendment which has just been introduced by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] is nothing more than the proposition which has heretofore, for many years, been submitted from time to time to the action of the Congress of the United States. It is the graduation system, and after a vast amount—

Mr. CABLE, of Ohio. I rise to a point of order. Two speeches, I think, cannot be made in favor of the same amendment. The gentleman from Tennessee made a speech in favor of his amendment, and the gentleman is now making another. He is not in order, I think.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order raised by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SEYMOUR. When interrupted, I was saying that the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] was but the revival of a proposition which, for many years previous, has been presented to the Congress of the United States for the purpose of graduating, by a general system, the price of our public lands. There are many things about that, to be sure, which should commend it to the favorable consideration of the Government; but there are about it great evils also. One (and I have not the time now to name others) is this, which is known to every member of this committee: The amount of public lands which is exposed for sale is always largely in advance of the demand. We have, at this time, over 3,000,000 acres of public land open to private entry, and awaiting cultivation purchasers. If this system is continued, and the graduation system is applied to it, we can see at once there would be a vast waste of the public domain, inasmuch as there would be a vast quantity of land—good land—always in the market, the price of which should not be reduced; but which will be reduced—not according to its value—not because it is inferior to other good lands—but simply because, on account of the large quantity which has been exposed for sale, it has remained such a period in the market as this bill proposes.

Mr. SKELTON. I rise to a question of order. We have had two speeches upon the same side of the question, and I ask, whether it is not now in order to make one in opposition to it?

The CHAIRMAN. The question of order, if it were well taken, is now too late; but the Chair understands it to be otherwise.

The question was then taken upon the substitute offered by Mr. HARRIS, and it was disagreed to; there being, upon a division—ayes 47, noes 98.

Mr. COBB. I offer as a substitute the amendment which I submitted an hour ago. It is with some difficulty, I know, that I can get what I desire, but I trust that I may be able now to succeed.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. That is precisely the same amendment which was offered by the gentleman and ruled out of order, a short time since.

Mr. COBB. It is the same identical amendment I presented to the original bill.

Mr. OLDS. I rise to a question of order. My point is, that this is the same identical amendment that the committee decided to be out of order to the original bill. Though it may be germane to the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. BROWN,] yet inasmuch as the motion is made to strike out the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi, it then holds the same relation to the original bill that it did before, if the motion to strike out prevails.

Mr. COBB. The gentleman mistakes the question. The committee has never ruled that amendment out of order. The Chairman did, but the committee did not.

Mr. OLDS. The committee acquiesced in the Chair's decision.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is not debatable. The gentlemen from Ohio raises the question that the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] is not in order. It is the opinion of the Chair, that according to the spirit and effect of the decision of the committee touching the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi, and the decision of the Chair sustained by the committee touching the amendment just offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, that this amendment is in order.

Mr. OLDS. It is the identical amendment the Chair overruled this morning.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposes that that decision has been virtually overruled, and he is bound to obey the decision of the committee.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. From that decision I take an appeal, and say to the friends of the bill, that if they ever expect to get it through, they must sustain the original ruling of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, then, "Shall the decision of the Chair remain as the judgment of the committee?"

The question was then taken, and the decision of the Chair was sustained by the committee—ayes 78, noes 57.

So the amendment, as previously published, was ruled to be in order.

Mr. COBB. I desire, Mr. Chairman, to have the attention of certain gentlemen, particularly, to the remarks I intend submitting. When gentlemen rise in their places, and admonish this committee to resist all amendments which may be offered, they should especially bear in mind that I am as good and staunch a friend of the homestead bill as any member of the committee. I will here state, and hope it may be borne in mind, that my object in presenting the amendment I have, was not to embarrass the bill in any respect whatever. Since this proposition has been under consideration, I have taken a great deal of pains in making inquiries of gentlemen as to whether they would vote for the bill of the gentleman from Tennessee if my amendment were attached to it; and I announce now, in justification of the proposition I have submitted, that not one gentleman told me he would vote against it in that case. Had but one gentleman told me that my amendment, if adopted, would affect injuriously the homestead as well as the graduation bill, I would not have assumed the responsibility of now submitting it. I would have trusted it to the future action of the House. I wish it distinctly understood here, and throughout the country, that, in sincerity in the support of this bill, I yield to no man. I am an older soldier in favor of this measure than many of those who have advised the committee against receiving any amendment to perfect this bill. Last Congress I submitted an amendment to the Oregon bill—which was then under consideration, and which proposed a grant of a homestead to actual settlers—that the provisions of the bill should be made applicable to all the lands held by the United States. It is to be found in the second volume of the Congressional Globe, for the first session of the Thirtieth Congress, page 1548, and is as follows:

"Provided, That the provisions of the act which relate to a donation of the public lands to actual settlers shall extend to all the public lands belonging to the United States, except as to the quantity, which shall not exceed one hundred and sixty acres to each head of a family."

It will be seen that I am as old a soldier in the cause as some others. I will further state, that during the last summer I discussed this subject fully before my constituents at home. I told them, from one end of the district to the other, that the question of granting a homestead to actual settlers would be brought before this Congress, and that if—and I looked to its being introduced by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JOHNSON,] as I gave him the honor of having so done before—it was not proposed, I pledged myself to present it. Go to the record, and you will find that at a very early period of the session, I gave notice of my intention to do so. My action now is but a redemption of the promise I made my constituents, that if I were not instructed to vote against I would vote for the measure. I intend, if I live long enough, to vote for it in some shape or other. But my friend from Tennessee [Mr. JOHNSON] will recollect that I told him I preferred the proposition of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. BROWN,] for the reason, that while it secured to the settler a homestead, it also gave him the privilege of perfecting his title, if he chose to do so. I prefer the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi, as a separate and distinct question; but if it is lost, I intend to vote for the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COBB. I propose to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. I object to its withdrawal.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. COBB,] and he appears to be opposed to it himself.

Mr. COBB. No, sir.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I apprehend that his own speech convinces him that it is wrong: I am also opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS,] and voted against it, not on account of the principle contained in that amendment, but on account of the object which he seeks to achieve by it. I am also opposed to the amendment offered by the honorable gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. BROWN,] I am opposed to that amendment upon the ground that it is intended to build up and perpetuate a system of perpetual vassalage between the citizen and the Federal Government. Now, if I understand one great object which this bill has in view, it is to make freeholders of the cultivators of the soil. Under the principle contained in the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. BROWN,] that great object would be defeated, and instead of being freeholders, the occupants of these lands would become the tenants of the Government—a position which I never desire to see the freemen of this country occupy towards their Government. The amendment should, in my opinion, be entitled An act to create the perpetual relation of landlord and tenant between the citizen and his Government. This much I say for the reasons which influenced me in voting against the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Mississippi. I was opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS,] which is the same in substance as the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. COBB,] I do not consider that the bill before the House—the homestead bill; as it is called—makes a final disposition of this question of the public lands. It is only a measure intended to induce and promote the cultivation, and contribute to the productive improvement of the public domain. It is no system for the final disposition of the public lands. The principle contained in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] does propose a system which I think will meet with the approbation of the people of this country. They have directed their attention towards adopting some plan which shall finally relieve the General Government of the responsibility of taking care of this vast public domain. That public sentiment, although it was small at first, has increased in volume until its influence has reached this Hall. If it should be decreed that this bill shall be defeated at the present session, it will be through the instrumentality of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. BROWN.]

And here permit me to say to the real friends of this measure—to those who, in their hearts, desire to see it enacted into a law at this time, to guard against the effect which the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi will inevitably produce, and which every true friend of the bill now must see will be produced, if the amendment should prevail; and that effect will be the defeat of the measure, in every shape in which it can be presented. The amendment is a weapon in the hands of the enemies of the bill; and its originator, whose heart, I believe, is with the principle, should see to this. The responsibility of defeating this great measure, when divided amongst many, is no light matter; but if it should center upon a single head, the weight will be insupportable.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question was then taken upon Mr. Cobb's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. MOREHEAD. I submit the following amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. Brown:]

And be it further enacted, That the lands herein granted shall be exempt from taxation for twenty years from and after the passage of the bill.

I offer this amendment to carry out the object which the friends of this bill have in view. I understand that the object of the measure before the committee is, that the General Government, being abundantly able, shall supply the poor people with homes. The advocates of this measure claim that the Government has abundant means to furnish all the people in the United States, who are in straightened circumstances, with a homestead. It is intended to include no other class of persons. It is intended to have the lands settled, and the wilderness cleared. If our object really is to confer a benefit upon the poor people of the United States, why, let us not stop at a half-way point, but let us carry out, in effect, the terms of the bill, which provide that no one shall go to settle upon these lands, except he is an extremely poor man. In the practical operation of this measure, nineteen twentieths of these settlers will not have as much as a cow when they occupy these lands. Let us not turn loose the tax-gatherer upon the poor man, just as he is settling the country. You must remember that they will occupy a frontier country. I take it for granted that tools of husbandry are much dearer there than in the old States; and the little pittance which the poor man will have when he gets there, will be required directly, not only for the support of himself and family, but for procuring the necessary tools for labor. I say, if we do anything for the poor man, let us do the best thing we can for him. The old States cannot complain of it, for this reason: In many of the States of the Union, the taxes are equable and graduated. I know it is so in my own State. We pay six cents in every $100.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. With the permission of the gentleman from North Carolina, I wish to say—

Mr. MOREHEAD. Any other time in the world but this, but I cannot be interrupted now. I know that in my own State, the freeholder pays six cents in every $100 value. I will observe that it must be a very poor homestead that is not worth $100, and it would be a curse to a man to give him one that was not worth that amount.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. Morehead.] It is a release from taxation for twenty years. Upon the same principle that I am opposed to his amendment, I am opposed to the whole substitute of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. Brown.] With all due respect and kindness to that gentleman, I must say, that I believe it will be the death of this bill, if it is to produce any effect at all. If the object of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Morehead] is to relieve the settlers from taxation for some twenty years, I believe it is hardly necessary, because the character of the title itself, which is proposed to be made to those who receive lands under the substitute of the gentleman from Mississippi, is such, that no title exists, and no taxes can be laid. The gentleman from Mississippi proposes, that the mere right to pass the whole title shall remain in the United States. If the whole title continues in the United States, the States themselves have got no right to tax the Government lands. If that be so, what will be the consequence to the new States? The consequence will be, that you give these lands away to persons—which remain merely in their possession—and you destroy the power of the States to support themselves, upon the very basis which exists in every State—you deprive them of the power to raise revenue from a tax on the lands. Permit these settlers to pass from one spot to another, and though there be thousands settling down upon your public lands, yet no taxes can be levied upon them, because the lands are not theirs, but held by the United States, and not, therefore, subject to taxation.

Under these circumstances, I cannot consent to see a proposition of this sort offered in this manner, without expressing some opposition to it upon my own part. I am for the bill which was offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. Johnson,] and I hope to see it passed, for a dozen reasons, all amply sufficient to myself. First, it would relieve my own State from a system of vassalage, and put her upon an equality with the balance of the old States of the Union. The proposition of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. Brown,] is to give a guarantee to protect the profligate and the improvident. Those gentlemen who go for this, in many places, are not gentlemen who will go for women's rights—to give them the right to hold private and separate property, not amenable to the debts of their husbands. That is a much more righteous movement. Those who are virtuous and ought to be protected, are refused such protection by the legislation of men, while we propose, by a bill of this character, to protect the profligate and improvident. Against what? Against their own honest debts and liabilities. These are the reasons which influenced me to vote against the system of tenancy which is to be created by the substitute of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. Brown.] The proposition which he has offered I do honestly believe will have the effect to defeat the whole of this measure, which I deem most glorious in itself—the giving away of lands to those who are landless.

Mr. MINER moved that the committee rise.

The question was put, and the motion was agreed to—ayes 105, noes not counted.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman (Mr. HERRARD) reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly House bill No. 7, being a bill to encourage agriculture, commerce, &c.

Mr. WILDRICK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported back, as correctly enrolled, the following joint resolution; which received the signature of the Speaker, viz:

Joint resolution granting the right of way of the Fayetteville and Central Plank Road.

On motion by Mr. LETCHER, the House adjourned until to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

PETITIONS, &c.

The following petitions, memorials, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. BUELL: The memorial of 600 citizens of Georgetown, District of Columbia, approving the memorial of the proper authorities of Georgetown, in their application to Congress for the construction of a bridge over the Potomac river, at some point west of Alexandria.

By Mr. LANDRY: The memorial of citizens of New Orleans and Texas, ship-masters and ship-owners, praying for the erection of a permanent light-house on Ship Island Shoals, on the coast of Louisiana.

By Mr. FLORENCE: The memorial of the heirs of Adam Prager, deceased, praying Congress to pass a law indemnifying them for French spoliation, prior to 1800.

By Mr. HENN: The petition of H. M. Taylor, and 92 others, citizens of Poweshiek county, Iowa, asking for a mail route from Union Mills to Montezuma.

By Mr. BUSBY: The petition of John Sünchcomb and others, praying for a mail route from Galion, Crawford county, Virginia, via Corsica, McEwen's cross roads, to Lexington, Richland county, Ohio, semi-weekly.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, May 12, 1852.

Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

Mr. SEWARD presented the report of a committee of the Chamber of Commerce of New York, in favor of the establishment of a Light-house Board; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

A motion to print the report was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. SHIELDS presented a memorial of the corporate authorities of Georgetown, District of Columbia, praying the construction of a bridge across the Potomac river, at some proper point west of the Alexandria aqueduct; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Also, the petition of a committee of workmen employed on the extension of the Capitol, praying relief for loss of time by suspension of the work; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings.

Also, a petition of citizens of Peoria county, Illinois, praying that the public lands may be transferred to the States, for the purpose of being granted to actual settlers not possessed of other lands; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, a petition of citizens of the West, praying the improvement of the Ohio river, particularly at the Falls at Louisville; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, presented a petition of citizens of Van Buren county, Iowa, praying a donation of land to each of the distinguished Hungarians at present located in Decatur county, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, presented the petition of Parry W. Porter, inventor of a patent self-loading fire-arm, praying that the Secretary of War may be directed to furnish the militia with his fire-arms out of the annual appropriations required by the act of 1808; which was referred to the Committee on the Militia.

SALARIES OF CLERKS.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. President, I am charged with many petitions from clerks in the various Departments, in relation to an increase of their salaries. Before presenting them, I will say that they seem to be under some misapprehension in relation to a bill which they suppose I have introduced for that purpose. I have introduced no such bill. Some time ago, I made a call upon the heads of Departments for a plan for classifying the clerks, and for equalizing the salaries of the clerks within their respective classes. The answer to that call has but recently come in. I present the petition of clerks in the War Department, praying for an increase of salary, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I present, also, the petition of clerks in the Navy Department, which I ask may be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. I present the petition of clerks in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Finance. I present the petition of clerks in the General Land Office, which I ask may be referred to the Committee on Public Lands. I present the petition of clerks in the Bureau of Indian Affairs, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The petitions were so referred.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHIELDS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the petition of Charles G. Merchant, an officer of the Army, praying the settlement of his accounts in the Commissary Department, on just and equitable principles, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read and passed to the second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the petition of John Moore, praying the settlement of his accounts as commissary of subsistence of the Missouri militia, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read and passed to the second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, showing the amount of rations issued by Robert B. Carter and James Roddy, reported it back and asked that it be laid on the table; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the following petitions, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to:

A petition of the officers of the Army at Fort Leavenworth, in relation to rank and command in the Army;

The petition of Thomas Jefferson Sutherland, praying an act of Congress to aid in the establishment of a Polytechnic Institution in Nebraska Territory; and

The petition of Pamela Preswick and other heirs of William Wigton, for amount due for his services subsequent to the last war with Great Britain.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Osborn Cross, of the United States Army, reported it back without amendment.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the memorial of the Legislature of Mississippi, praying the establishment of a port of entry at Biloxi, and additional mail facilities to that place, reported a bill to establish a port of delivery at that place; which was read, and passed to the second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to which a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject was referred, reported a bill authorizing imported goods, wares, and merchandise, entered and bonded for warehousing in pursuance of law, to be exported by certain routes to ports or places in Mexico; which was read, and passed to the second reading.

He also, from the Committee on Printing, to which was referred the motion to print the petition of laborers lately employed on the addition to the Capitol, praying to be allowed pay for the time lost by them in waiting for the work to be continued during the past winter, reported against printing the same; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the motion to print the memorial of M. F. Maury, of the Navy, praying the establishment of a line of mail steam ships from Norfolk or Charleston to Para, at the mouth of the Amazon, to connect with a line running thence to Rio de Janeiro, reported in favor of printing the same; which was agreed to.

Mr. MASON, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the petition of Joseph Balestier, praying to be allowed certain items rejected in the settlement of his accounts at the Department of State, for services and expenses as special agent to Cochín China, and other portions of Southeastern Asia, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRADBURY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the report of the Secretary of War, in relation to contracts made with officers of the Army to furnish supplies to the Government, reported a bill making it penal for officers of the United States Army to become contractors, either directly or indirectly; which was read and passed to the second reading.

ORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Committee on Military Affairs have instructed me to make a report accompanied by a bill, in relation to the several departments of the Army—the Subsistence Department, the Quartermaster's Department, and the Adjutant General's Department. I may say, at this time, that the bill contemplates the abrogation of those departments, and the filling them up by details from the line. It is a bill to repeal the several acts organizing the Staff Departments of the Army therein mentioned, and to provide for the discharge of the duties thereof by a detail of officers of the line. This is a measure of very great importance, and it is hoped that it will accomplish a very desirable object. It is hoped that it will prevent the abuses which have become so common in those departments. This is a very radical bill, I confess, but it has the approval of the head of the War Department, and the approval of the General-in-Chief of the Army. I may as well add, that the Secretary of War has aided the Committee on Military Affairs very materially this winter in bringing forward measures to prevent the abuses that have become so very prevalent in the Army.

The bill was read, and ordered to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHIELDS. I rise to request that the bill and report may be printed together. I before stated the reason in one case. We are exceedingly anxious, in making these great changes in the Army, to derive what information we can from the suggestions of experienced officers in the Army in every part of the country, and we can only do that by sending the bill and report together to those officers. In relation to measures that have been brought forward, I have already received from them an immense amount of instruction and information of which I shall avail myself hereafter. I will now move that the bill and report, in this case, be printed together.

The PRESIDENT. No motion is necessary for that purpose. The Secretary can give directions to have them printed in that way.

Mr. SHIELDS. I move that ten thousand extra copies of the bill and report be printed.

The motion was referred to the Committee on Printing.

RAILROAD IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. GWIN, by unanimous consent, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill granting the right of way and a portion of the public lands to the State of California, to aid in the construction of a railroad from the city of San Francisco to the city of San José, in that State; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. RUSK gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to reduce the rates of postage upon newspapers and other printed matter, and to regulate the salaries of postmasters, and for other purposes.

Mr. SHIELDS gave notice of his intention to introduce a bill granting the right of way and making a grant of public lands to the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, in aid of the construction of a railroad from Cincinnati to St. Louis.

ISLAND OF MATINICAS.

The bill to annex the Island of Matinicas, in the county of Lincoln, in the State of Maine, to the collection district of Waldoboro', in said county, was read a third time and passed.

IMPROVEMENT IN LIGHT-HOUSES.

Mr. SEWARD submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to transmit to the Senate a communication from J. W. P. Lewis, under date of the 7th of May, or thereabout, with the accompanying documents, relating to the subject of the improvement of light-houses.

LIEUTENANT TEMPLE'S MEMOIR.

On the motion of Mr. BELL, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by him some days since:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to furnish the Senate with a copy of the memoir of the landing of the United States troops at Vera Cruz in 1847, by Lieutenant William Grenville Temple, with an appendix containing the written orders of General Scott and Commodore Conner, on file in the Navy Department.

Mr. CASS. Who proposes the resolution?

Mr. BELL. I have offered it.

Mr. CASS. I hope the honorable Senator will be good enough to state what is the object of it.

Mr. BELL. I understand that this is a very brief memoir of an achievement which I have heard highly spoken of by many officers. I have never yet read a statement of it which was satisfactory or very interesting to me in its details. I understand that this memoir possesses a great deal of merit; that it is very brief, and even including the appendix, mentioned in the resolution, does not exceed forty folio pages of manuscript. I did not suppose that there would be an objector in the Senate to having it transmitted to us. If it should be transmitted, the question of printing would, of course, go to the Committee on Printing; and if it should be found not worthy of publication by order of the Senate, it would be laid on the table. This memoir is an interesting part of our military history. I understand that it is chiefly professional, and designed for the information and gratification of the officers of the Army and Navy. I do not see any possible objection to the resolution in that point of view. I do not see why there should be an objection to having the communication made to the Senate. I have never read it; but I have heard several gentlemen speak of it as a performance within a very brief compass, and possessing a great deal of merit.

Mr. CASS. I would ask the honorable member if this is an official report of this officer to his superior, or to the Navy Department?

Mr. BELL. I suppose it is a volunteer memoir communicated to the Navy Department. I understand that it is approved by the head of that Department.

Mr. CASS. I am unwilling that the Senate should be made the vehicle of these applications. An officer, when he is in the service, may write something, and come to the Senate and endeavor to make the Senate the vehicle of spreading his communication before the country. I think the practice is wrong.

Mr. HAMLIN. When the resolution was first read, I supposed the object was precisely what the Senator from Tennessee now avows it to be—the publication of another small book. I hope the resolution will not pass, if that is the only object—if it is to bring this document here to the Senate for the purpose of publishing the work of this officer. I think we have had enough of that. We have published a variety of books. We have drawn greatly upon our contingent fund for that purpose; and I think we may just as well go into the whole circle of the sciences and publish scientific works, or works of fiction, which would be interesting to some, as to be continuing this system. Recently, if a man wants to make a book, he gets into the Navy, or into the Army, or into some survey, and makes a report to some of the Departments, invites a kind friend here to call it out, and behold, a book is spread before the world! I hope a stop will be put to this. I therefore move that the resolution be laid upon the table; and upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BELL. I hope the honorable Senator will withdraw the motion for a moment.

Mr. HAMLIN. I will.

Mr. BELL. I have utterly disavowed any idea of making a book for the printers, or of making a job for anybody, or of taxing the Senate beyond what it might choose voluntarily to tax the contingent fund.

Mr. MANGUM. I hope honorable Senators will not persevere in their opposition to the resolution. I see that gentlemen already shrink from it with a great deal of sensibility. They seem to be afraid to let the people get at this information. Perhaps it is punishing gentlemen unnecessarily in advance.

Mr. BELL. I beg leave to add, that I had no view of a political character. I had no view of alarming the sensibilities, or of exciting the apprehensions of gentlemen of any political creed, or of exciting their fears by the introduction of this resolution. I have risen for the purpose of disavowing any intention of desiring to add to the number of books which we print. I think this is very small game. I think this is a very small object upon which to settle a precedent for putting a stop to these numerous publications. I admit that a good many communications of this description have been made to this body; but I beg honorable Senators to remember that this is but a very brief detail of an achievement of which the whole country may well be proud. I am told that the circumstances under which the debarkation of our troops at Vera Cruz was effected were very extraordinary; that striking skill was manifested, considering the perils they had to encounter.

This memoir does not exceed forty pages in manuscript, and I suppose it would not make a book of more than twenty pages. Let gentlemen look at the voluminous documents of the regular reports. Gentlemen object to this because it is not an official report. Let them look at their official reports—so ponderous, so voluminous, that not one man in a hundred thousand in the United States ever thinks of wading through them to get at the details of our military transactions. I believe that our documentary reports from the heads of bureaus amount to volumes, instead of, as formerly, a single volume, communicated by the Executive annually to Congress.

In offering this resolution, I had no motive but to have this memoir furnished for my own gratification, and for the purpose of illustrating a portion of the annals of the country that I thought would be interesting to everybody, and, perhaps, taking from the contingent fund of this body some few dollars, if it should be thought worth while to print it. How can honorable Senators object to having this information communicated? If it is furnished to us, honorable Senators can inspect it, and see if it be not worthy of printing, and if it be not a production of unusual merit. One great merit, which it certainly has, consists in its brevity. It condenses within a few pages some of the most important military details, the perusal of which would not only gratify and instruct every officer of the Army and Navy, but particularly those who were not directly engaged in the transaction. It would also be gratifying to every inquiring gentleman on such subjects. Let us have the communication laid on the table. Honorable gentlemen object to making a book of this. Then I shall not urge it any further, if it is objected to by a majority of the Senate. I had no personal object in asking for this information. I had no motive to gratify distinguished individuals in any quarter, or to impede the prospects of others. Such a consideration never flashed across my mind. I had no communication with gentlemen of that class upon the subject.

Mr. BERRIEN. I ask that the resolution may be read.

The resolution was accordingly read.

Mr. BERRIEN. It does seem to me to be very singular, that when a member of the Senate desires to obtain from one of the Departments a document in which he takes an interest, and which he believes to be interesting to the public, there should be any objection to making the call and having it answered. If, after the paper be laid on the table of the Senate, a motion shall be made, having for its object the making of a book, as gentlemen express it, then, it appears to me, would be the proper time to urge the objection. But, I really think that due courtesy to a member of the Senate who desires such information, should induce us, at least, to acquiesce in the call.

Mr. CLEMENS. Mr. President, it seems to me that after the declarations made by the Senator from North Carolina, the Senator from Georgia need not have been surprised at any opposition being made to the adoption of this resolution. Why, sir, the Senator from North Carolina avowed in as plain language as if he had said it in so many words, that it was intended for an electioneering purpose—that it was offered here to aid a presidential aspirant—that it is to take part in political intrigues. He tells us not to object to this, because we are to be punished sufficiently by the people. Who are to be punished? Why, sir, those who object to this resolution; the Democrats are to be punished by the people. And he supposes that we wished to prevent the publication of this memoir because it might add to the reputation of his particular candidate for the Presidency. I shall vote against it for that reason, and for that reason alone.

I have had as little to do with political intrigues as any member of this body, and I intend to have as little to do with them. But I do not intend to countenance any proposition to print documents here at the expense of the Senate, to aid a political aspirant. Besides, of what use is it to us? The Senator from Tennessee says he wishes this document communicated in order that we may examine it. Suppose it is sent here, how many will examine it unless it is printed and laid upon our tables. Who will go to read it in manuscript? Not half a dozen members of the Senate. The object is to print; the object in bringing it here is to secure its being printed, and a further object which is intimated by the Senator from North Carolina, is to use it as an electioneering document.

I am willing to give to General Scott all the credit to which he is entitled. I have heretofore manifested that willingness again and again. I intend to manifest it at this session. I intend to urge the adoption of a resolution conferring upon him the highest rank which has ever been conferred upon a citizen of the United States save one. But when it is intimated that this document is to be brought here to be used for the purpose of electing him to the Presidency of these United States, I shall go against it, even if the result should be injustice to him.

Mr. MANGUM. Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama entirely and totally misconceives me. I did not know of the existence of such a resolution until the debate was opened. I did not intimate, nor do I now intimate, that there was any purpose whatever to use this as an electioneering document. But what I did intend to say was this: I understood this to be a resolution calling for a memoir that was supposed to be very highly creditable to the commanding general in the late war. I saw that gentlemen winced under its developments. I did not say that the expense of printing this document should be necessarily incurred with the view of advancing partisan objects. What I did say, and what I meant, was, that I thought it a little inhuman to be "piling up the agony" upon gentlemen who felt a little shrinking under the influence of such developments. I had seen, as the debate went on, a motion to lay the resolution upon the table. It is utterly immaterial to me what is done with it. I never conferred with the honorable Senator from Tennessee in regard to it. I do not know what is the nature of the memoir indicated. I take it for granted that it is one highly honorable to the commanding general. I thought it would be a little cruel now to punish gentlemen who vote against it. What I meant, simply was that these gentlemen, in the course of destiny, will have to encounter some very rough and stumpy roads, and I thought it unnecessary to be premature in inflicting punishment. That is all I meant.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I regret that there has been anything of a political character connected with this debate. It was the farthest thing in the world from my intention to say aught or to do aught that would be productive of such a debate. Perhaps I should have stated that the subject of printing has been investigated by the Committee on Printing, and I am gratified to be able to say, that upon a full examination, a majority of that committee have come to the conclusion to make an effort to put a stop to book-making in the Senate. I am willing to admit that it is as appropriate to print books eulogistic of individuals as books of any other character, and I should offer no objection to the printing of this memoir that I would not offer to the printing of any other document, looking towards the making of a book. It is upon the general principle that I oppose it.

It is true that the resolution is a simple call on the Navy Department for this memoir. It is equally true that the honorable Senator from Tennessee stated expressly that the object of that call was to print it. It was, therefore, inasmuch as it came within the rule which the Committee on Printing would attempt to enforce, that I made the motion to lay it upon the table. I will not now renew that motion, but I am willing to allow the question to be taken upon the direct passage of the resolution, hoping and trusting that it will be rejected, not because I am unwilling that the utmost publicity in the world should be given to it, but because it is a matter which should not come before the Senate. I think the Senate should not be asked to make a book on this occasion. I will state that the committee have already reported against the reprinting of one of the books which have already been published by the Senate.

In relation to the political character of this debate, I will only say to the Senator from North Carolina, that however many obstructions there may be in the way, yet, at an appropriate time, I trust they will all be easily removed, and that whoever may be the individual favored by that distinguished Senator, the person who shall be nominated by my friends on this side of the Chamber is destined to be the next President of the United States.

Mr. HUNTER. It is now time to call up the deficiency bill, and I therefore move to postpone the further consideration of the resolution until to-morrow.

Mr. CASS. I merely want to say, that when I interposed an objection to this resolution, I had no more idea that it referred to General Scott than that it referred to the Queen of England. I supposed that it was just one of those applications which are made to us by young officers, who think they have written something creditable, and want it to get before the world, and come to the Senate to make it the vehicle of communication. I did not hear one word the Senator from North Carolina said. I was at that time engaged in talking with a gentleman in the lobby. The first intimation that I had that anything was said in relation to General Scott was from the gentleman from Alabama. I should not have said a single word, if I supposed the resolution had any such bearing. But the Senate will do me the justice to recollect that this is the ground I have taken two or three times before. I have opposed the transmission of such information to the Senate. I have been opposed to making the Senate the vehicle to spread papers before the public, but under the circumstances, I shall interpose no further objection to this resolution.

Mr. HALE. As I have a word to say on this subject, and as I do not wish to occupy the time which the Senator from Virginia wishes devoted to the deficiency bill, I move to postpone the further consideration of this subject until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

THE DEFICIENCY BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1852," the question pending being upon the amendment of the Committee on Finance, as it had been amended, to insert the following:

For additional compensation for increasing the transportation of the United States mail between New York and Liverpool, in the Collins line of steamers, to twenty-six trips per annum, at such times as shall be directed by the Postmaster General, and in conformity to his last annual report to Congress, and his letter of the 15th of November last to the Secretary of the Navy, commencing said increased service on the first of January, 1852, at the rate of $33,000 per trip, in lieu of the present allowance, the sum of $236,500: Provided, That it shall be in the power of Congress, at any time after the first day of January, 1854, to terminate the arrangement for any additional allowance herein provided for.

Mr. BORLAND addressed the Senate for some time without finishing, and on his motion the further consideration of the subject was postponed until to-morrow.

ENTRIES OF LAND IN FLORIDA.

On the motion of Mr. MALLORY, the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill from the House of Representatives to legalize certain entries of public land made in the State of Florida, and no amendment being made, it was read a third time and passed.

CLAIMS AGAINST THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I now ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill which has been lying on the table for several days, and which I would like to have recommitted. It is a bill to amend and extend the provisions of an act approved July 29, 1846, entitled "An act in relation to the payment of claims."

The PRESIDENT. The bill will be taken up for a third reading, if such is the pleasure of the Senate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I feel very reluctant, Mr. President, to throw myself upon the indulgence of the Senate at this late hour to ask for the consideration of a subject which I really deem of considerable importance. This bill proposes to legislate upon the subject of claims against the Government. It proposes to punish members of Congress and officers of the Government for certain acts; but it allows citizens, who are not members of Congress nor officers of the Government, to escape punishment for doing the same things. I do not feel exactly willing to be prescribing punishments for members of Congress and officers of the Government, and permit everybody else to go scot-free. While we are legislating upon this subject, I desire to embrace the whole, and to prescribe punishments for those agents out of doors who, I think, by their conduct, are as much amenable to the censure of morals, and should be as much under the condemnation of the law as members of Congress and officers of the Government. When you come to examine that bill, you will find that there are no penalties to be inflicted on citizens and agents such as are imposed on members of Congress and officers of Government.

What is the object of this bill? It supposes that there are various improper practices existing in reference to the claims against the Government; that members of Congress prosecute claims for themselves; that by their contracts they become interested in claims, and then vote for bills to pay them, and thus put money in their own pockets. Sir, that imputation, made against members of Congress by the bill itself, is one that I am very much disposed to shudder under. I do not like it. I scarcely know how to express myself with regard to it. But it is an imputation against members of Congress, made by the bill itself, which strikes everybody as a thing to be regretted. But while we make that imputation, I think that in making provision for the punishment of the offense, we should go to the whole extent and reach everything which public rumor has alleged to be improper.

Well, sir, to make imputations against the officers of the Government, and say that they act improperly in the executive stations which they hold, is likewise a matter which should give none of us pleasure; and I am sure that every right-minded Senator would feel a disposition to lament that such malpractices exist among our executive officers as to require penal statutes for the purpose of reaching and suppressing the evils. But evils, I fear, do exist; not confined to the officers of the Government; not confined to members of Congress; but, I believe, existing in many cases far more injurious than those intended to be suppressed by this bill. One of them consists in this: There are those who go through the country, hunting up claims against the Government, which are not well-founded; and, having sought and found them, they set up and support the claims by subornation and perjury. Sir, I regret to say that, in my own State, we have had cases of that sort, and that we have prosecuted and sent to the penitentiary those who have been guilty of this very crime. Claims may be fabricated and sustained by perjury, and the laws, perhaps, are now sufficient to punish the perjured witness. But claims may be just, in part; and, if speculating agents are allowed to purchase them, there is great temptation operating upon them to enlarge the claim. It is almost, or quite, impossible to convict an agent of subornation. The only effectual remedy is to prevent him from purchasing or prosecuting claims for an interest in the claim, and thus to remove temptations from before him.

There is another class of evils which this bill does not reach; and, if rumor tells the truth, it is a crying evil. There is a class of agents who speculate on those who own just claims against the Government, inducing claimants to believe that they have influence with members of Congress, and then selling their pretended influence to claimants for a large price. They say to such persons: "If you do not pay me so much, I will exercise all my influence with members of Congress to prevent them from passing your claim; but if you fee me, I will secure its passage." In this way, I am told, there are persons in this city, who are rewarded bountifully for the exercise of their real or pretended influence with the members of Congress. It is also said that these persons tell applicants for office, "We have much influence with the Departments, and with members of Congress, and if a Department should be reluctant to appoint you, we can bring in the aid of members of Congress to second your application; and, for $500 or $1,000 can obtain a commission for you." Now, if these things do take place—and rumor says that they do—and if there is a class of agents of that description located at the seat of Government, they should be rendered as liable to prosecution as that class of agents who are prowling all over the country, even to the very extremes of our empire, hunting up and purchasing claims against the Government, supporting them by ex parte and false testimony, and getting them passed here by transferring an interest to members of Congress.

What does this bill propose to do, even supposing that members of Congress, and the officers of the Government, are guilty of the practices which it is intended to punish? Why, the punishment is only some six months' imprisonment, and a fine not exceeding $1,000. I ask Senators, what kind of punishment a fine of $1,000 would be, in a case where the claim was some $100,000 or $200,000, and where the agent puts one-half the receipts into his own pocket? It would not be as a "drop in the bucket." What would he care for $1,000, if he could secure, by the operation, a portion of the public plunder, amounting to hundreds of thousands of dollars? Nothing at all. He would only laugh at you. Sir, if we do anything, I am for making persons, in cases of that sort, disgorge every dollar, and I think I can do it. I can prescribe a mode of reaching him, which will make it certain that there will be a witness against him, and he shall know, when he takes the money, that there is a witness who can expose him. And I can furnish a motive to that witness to expose and take from him every dollar. Do that, and you will remove temptations, and lessen the disposition which now exists to procure champerty and maintenance contracts. Do this, and the speculating agent, officer of Government, or member of Congress will see, as soon as he has received the money, that there is a witness who knows he has received it contrary to law, and that the witness can make him disgorge every dollar. Men are not likely to offend in the face of certain exposure, when profit is impossible. I think that, when you legislate upon this subject, you should not stop at a fine of $1,000, but go to the extent of the money the offender receives, and make him pay back every dollar of it.

Sir, in the wisdom of our English ancestors I have some authority for my opinions. I can state to you what were the old laws of England against champerty and maintenance, and you will see that these laws have a direct application to the objects of this bill. I wish to adopt, in substance, their provisions, as you will see when I read the substitute which I propose in lieu of this bill. By the statute of 20th Edward I., champertors were punished by imprisonment for a term of three years. In this bill we only propose an imprisonment of six months. These contracts in regard to claims, it is true, are not exactly what is called champerty; it is not a division of the field; but it is in principle the same thing as a division of the field. Our English ancestors not only punished champertors by inflicting an imprisonment for three years, but, in addition thereto, fined them at the pleasure of the Crown. I will refer you to a subsequent statute. Your bill only proposes an imprisonment for six months, and limits the fine to $1,000, although the party thus prohibited from the prosecution of claims may put a hundred thousand dollars in his pocket by violating your law. I therefore say that in the legislation of our English ancestors there is an authority condemning your present legislation, and showing that you do not go far enough. By the 32d Henry VIII., in order to punish maintainers, the law required them to refund the whole of the amount received—one half to the use of the Crown and the other half to the use of the informer. This, Mr. President, is a principle which I wish to apply in this case. I desire that the individual who, by these forbidden and prohibited contracts, improperly obtains large sums from the Government should be compelled to refund every dollar, precisely as the statute of Henry VIII. required that the maintainer should refund every dollar.

Now, sir, I have suggested my objections and shown that the bill does not, in my opinion, go so far as it ought to go. I will read what I have prepared as a substitute; and then, if the Senate should think it worthy of their consideration, I should be glad to have the original bill and the substitute referred to the Committee on Claims. That committee can compare the bill as it now stands with the substitute, and if the substitute is too stringent, if it goes too far, if it punishes too severely, then modify it, and mollify it; but, sir, it does seem to me that the bill as it now stands, does not take hold of the evil in its full extent; that the penalty of one thousand dollars is wholly inadequate as a punishment to the individual who may receive fifteen, or twenty, or a hundred thousand dollars by violating the law.

Again, there are one or two operations of this bill which I conceive to be unjust, and I desire to call the attention of the Senate to them. This bill prohibits and makes void all contracts whatever, in relation to claims against the Government until after they have been allowed, and the warrant for their payment has issued. Now, I am not disposed to indorse that. I think that if a gentleman has an honest claim against the Government, he should, at least, be permitted to use that claim, to mortgage it, or to pledge it as security for a bona fide debt, or, if he pleases, for the purpose of raising money. I do not see any objection to allow him to use what is justly due to him, for purposes of that nature. That is not the evil; the evil that we wish to reach is, to prevent such contracts in relation to claims as will induce the agent or attorney with whom the contract is made, to resort to improper practices for the purpose of getting a claim allowed or passed. That is the evil; and I cannot perceive how an individual's mortgaging or hypothecating his claim for an honest debt, or to raise money which he may wish to use in some other way than in the prosecution of the claim, can amount to any evil at all. I therefore think that the operation of the bill, as it stands, is prejudicial to the rights of contract, and should be modified. You merely declare all transfers void until the warrant for the payment issues, and then you leave it in the power of the agent to appeal to the honor of the claimant to make the assignment or transfer, which he is certain to do, unless he is utterly mean and degraded. And thus it is, your bill leaves the evil to go unpunished, except in regard to officers of Government and members of Congress. Sir, in regard to all past contracts, they should stand, and agents should have the benefit of them; but, in regard to the future, I am for turning over a new leaf.

There is another provision of this bill, which I think should not be sanctioned. It is this: it punishes officers of the Government connected with Departments, who may aid or assist in the prosecution of claims, although they receive no reward for so doing. In the other provisions of the bill, the punishments are connected with the reception of rewards on the part of the individual who prosecutes improperly. But in regard to officers of the Government, a captain in the Army, or a clerk in a Department, for instance, if he assists an old father or mother, or brother, or sister, or friend, in the prosecution of a claim against the Government, though he does not receive a cent, or any benefit whatever, he is liable to be indicted, and punished by imprisonment for six months, and a fine of $1,000, under the operation of this bill, as I understand it. Now that seems to me to be a degree of rigor, for the exercise of mere benevolence towards a friend or relation, which is excessively severe. There is no evil, it seems to me, likely to grow out of gratuitous service rendered for a relative or friend. There is no motive to induce an officer to suborn witnesses when he has no interest at stake, or to act corruptly in any manner whatever. If an officer in the Departments should give information to claimants, which the books in their custody would furnish, I think it is all right and proper, provided they do so without fee. Indeed, I think they should be compelled to give such information. I am against Government secrets, which cheat people out of their honest dues. And yet, if a clerk should communicate to a claimant a fact which is verified by the records of his office, I do not know but he may subject himself to fine and imprisonment under the provisions of this bill, for aiding in the prosecution of the claim.

I think these suggestions are worthy of consideration. To inflict punishment in such cases as those I have just mentioned, would be an act of unmitigated cruelty; and yet, if I understand this bill correctly, it may be done.

There is another thing to which I have repeatedly called the attention of the Senate, and which I have provided for in my substitute, but which is not provided for in this bill. It seems to me to be a fit occasion to introduce it, and I hope it may be done. I have again and again called the attention of the Senate to the double payment of claims, for the same service, to two different families, operating by two distinct sets of agents. The Treasury has suffered largely in that way. I have called the attention of the Senate to a case happening in my own family. An old revolutionary uncle of my own, by the name of John Rogers, died shortly after the war, and was entitled only to some few years' half pay, and his family received the amount due for his services some twenty years ago. That family held his two commissions, the one of a captain and the other of a lieutenant, and they held his diploma as a member of the Society of the Cincinnati, and held and used the lands obtained as bounty for his revolutionary services. And a few years ago, another family came forward, claiming to be the heirs of the same Captain John Rogers, and on that claim took some $10,000 or $20,000 out of the public Treasury. Now, one of these families ought to disgorge. It is not right that both should be paid in consideration of the same services of the same man. My bill proposes a remedy for cases of that sort. It is that the payments made by the Executive Departments shall not be considered final adjudications, concluding the rights of the United States, but that in all cases like this such payments shall be open to judicial investigation; and it shall be the duty of the proper officers of the Government to institute proceedings to recover the money thus improperly paid. I have mentioned this subject often, and two resolutions have been sent to the Committee on the Judiciary, to request them to consider whether it requires any legislation of this sort, and if it does, to apply the proper remedy, so that where such double payments have been made for the same service the matter shall be rectified and the Government shall not be swindled.

These are the reasons and motives which have led me to pay attention to this bill. I know it may be said that I have sat here, and negligently allowed the bill to progress until it had passed to its engrossment, and have said nothing upon the subject. In answer to that, sir, my apology must be, that it is impossible to attend to everything in due time. I do my best to keep up with the business; I pay attention to many things, but I find that a great deal passes here that I am unable to notice, and that is the reason why I have not called the attention of the Senate to this matter at an earlier period.

I have nothing to do now but to read what I conceive to be a fit remedy for all the evils which I have mentioned; and if I can so far meet with the approbation of the Senate as to have the matter referred back to the committee, and let them have both the views I have suggested, and the amendment which I propose, I shall be perfectly content if they return the bill back, and say that what I have proposed is not worthy of a moment's consideration.

My substitute provides that it shall not be lawful for any member of Congress, or any other person whatever, to contract for, or to purchase an interest in, any claim against the Government of the United States, or any Department thereof, before the same has been settled and allowed by the proper authority, except as a security for a bona fide debt, or for money loaned, having no connection with the prosecution of the claim. Nor shall it be lawful for any member of Congress, or any other person whatever, to engage, contract, or agree, in consideration of an interest in a claim against the United States, whether such interest be the entire consideration or only a part, to aid, assist, or give counsel, in any manner whatever, in the prosecution of such claim. Nor shall it be lawful for any member of Congress, or any other person whatever, in consideration of money or property thereafter to be paid, conveyed, or delivered, upon the condition that the specified claim against the United States is allowed or paid in whole or in part, to engage, contract, or agree to aid, assist, or give counsel in the prosecution of any such claim. Nor shall any member of Congress receive any gift, present, fee, or reward, other than his lawful wages, for his vote, or for attending to any business pending before Congress, or before any board of commissioners, when the Government of the United States is bound to pay the award of such board, or for recommending a person, or using his influence to procure an appointment or office for any person. Nor shall any person whatever receive any gift, present, fee, or reward for his or her influence, to be exercised in any manner whatever, in procuring the passage of a law, or an appropriation by the Congress of the United States, in favor of any individual, company, corporation, or State; or for recommending a person, or using his or her influence to procure an appointment or an office for any person. And all such practices, contracts, and agreements are hereby declared to be misdemeanors, and are prohibited. And any member of Congress, or other person, who shall, in any respect, violate either of the provisions aforesaid, shall, on conviction before any court of competent jurisdiction, be punished by imprisonment not exceeding six months, in the discretion of the court.

Now, sir, the second section goes on to require that he shall refund the money received. The first section, you will perceive, imposes a punishment of six months' imprisonment for violating the provisions of the act. The second section of the bill provides for a fine of $1,000, in addition to imprisonment. My second section goes on to provide, that any member of Congress, or any other person, who shall receive any sum of money or thing of value, under, or in virtue of, any contract, agreement, or engagement, forbidden by the first section of this act, or who shall accept any gift, fee, donation, or reward, in violation of the said section, shall refund or restore the money or thing received to the person conveying, paying, or delivering the same; and, if it be not so refunded or restored within three months after it has been received, it shall then be lawful for any person to sue for and recover the same in the name of the United States; one half for the use of the person thus instituting the suit, and the other half for the use of the Government.

Then comes my third section, which I intend to meet the last class of evils which I pointed out. It provides that payments of money made by any of the Executive Departments or officers of the Government, in satisfaction, either in whole or part, of any claim, shall not be considered final and conclusive, so as to bar a suit for the recovery of the money, when it may have been erroneously paid; and all payments made under the decision of any of the Executive departments of the Government, shall be open to reinvestigation in the courts of the United States, before whom it shall be the duty of the proper officer to institute suit for the recovery of any money paid through error, fraud, or mistake.

I am told that where a payment is made under an award of an Executive Department, it is regarded as final and conclusive, like the judgment of a court, so as to bar any suit by way of reinvestigating the matter. The object of this proposition is to prevent a payment made under the award of an Executive Department from having this binding and conclusive effect. I do not know—indeed, I am inclined to question the propriety of that opinion under the law as it now stands—that any payment made by an Executive Department is binding and conclusive, so as to bar a judicial investigation. But surely, if there be any doubt on the subject, it cannot be improper to remove all doubt by an express provision that such payment shall not be final and conclusive. This is a question that I have referred, time and again, to the Committee on the Judiciary, to inquire whether it be necessary to legislate. But whether it be necessary or not, it can do no harm to make a provision, saying, that such payments shall not bar a judicial investigation.

Mr. BADGER. Mr. President, I understand that my friend from Kentucky desires that this bill should be recommitted. I hope that proposition will not obtain the sanction of the Senate. I took great pains, when I introduced this bill, that the nature and purport of it should be, without any loss of time, known to the Senate. The day that I offered it I asked and obtained an order of the Senate that it should be immediately printed, contemporaneously with its reference to the Committee on Claims. It was prepared with some consideration. It was carefully examined by the legal gentlemen who belong to that committee. It was reported with certain amendments. These amendments have been considered and adopted by the Senate, and the bill has been ordered to a third reading. Now, I think, as my friend from Kentucky either would not, or did not, for whatever reason, pay attention to this bill during any of the earlier stages of its discussion, that it is far better that he should allow it to pass; and if there are any further or other evils that require correction, let him bring forward his measure for that purpose; and I assure him, as far as I am concerned, to such an extent as they are real evils, and capable of being relieved, he will receive my hearty concurrence.

Now, sir, the provisions of this bill are very simple. The bill was not intended to embrace and cover, and remove, and provide a remedy against all the evils which exist in the Government. It was confined to one or two specific purposes. It was intended for the benefit of a class of men who are entitled to the aid and assistance of the Government—for the benefit of the poor and ignorant, who have claims against the United States, and who are put under the necessity, as the law now exists, of submitting to the most grinding oppression—the most cruel and merciless oppression—for the purpose of getting their claims brought forward and sanctioned here in Congress, or before the Executive Departments.

It was intended, in the second place, to protect the United States, because, as the law stands at present, the largest inducements are held out to crafty or dishonest men to get up, by whatever means, maintain, and carry through before the Departments, or before Congress, claims that are really unfounded, or claims that are greatly exaggerated. The bill, as drawn, sought to accomplish that object by a simple, plain, and practical provision; in the first place, that assignments of contracts for pay, claims, or portions of claims, should be made void until the claim should have been settled, its amount ascertained, and a warrant drawn for its payment; when the claimant, knowing what he was entitled to, and having the legal means to possess himself of it, no longer needed our assistance or protection, and could make what disposition he pleased of it. There is no hardship in that, certainly.

My friend from Kentucky speaks about the assignment of property. Why, sir, a claim against the Government is not property. According to the principles of those "Old Fogies"—our old English ancestors, in the time of Henry VIII. and before—no debt was the subject of assignment—founded upon the principle, that if A owes B money, B cannot make A debtor to C without the consent of A. The assignability of contracts is a matter of positive law, and they are assigned, or they are made unassignable, just in proportion as public policy and the interests of the country require. Hence, we here, and in England, have allowed the ordinary securities of the country to be assignable. We have allowed promissory notes to be assignable, putting them upon the footing of those foreign commercial securities known as bills of exchange. But, to this day, open, unliquidated contracts are not the subjects of assignment by law; and such assignments are merely void, except as courts of equity, for certain purposes, assume jurisdiction over them, and exercise a large discretion to do justice.

The next object was to protect the Government, by preventing the Executive officers of the Government from employing themselves, while they hold office under the Government of the United States, and are paid by the Government of the United States, from availing themselves of their opportunities to hunt up and to prosecute claims against the Government. It is needless for me to say to what crying abuses such a privilege has already led, and must continue to lead, unless it is put an end to.

Then, the committee incorporate another provision into this bill, for the purpose of prohibiting the discharge of similar services, for compensation, by members of either House of Congress. That would have been, by me, incorporated into the original bill, if I had, at the moment, seen the precise mode which the committee hit upon, of so passing a law as not to impede members of Congress in the discharge of those quasi duties which they owe to their constituents, of attending to their interests.

If there are any further evils to correct, let my friend from Kentucky bring forward his bill to remedy them. He has undertaken to enumerate evils. His enumeration, when we come to examine it, is entirely imperfect. He talks about those cases of "champertry," and the cases of "maintenance," which he says, according to common rumor affect the proceedings of Congress, and affect the proceedings of the Executive Departments. Well now, according to common rumor, there is another class of evils of that kind, to which my friend has not alluded at all. It is said that sometimes measures are carried here; it is said that sometimes measures are carried through the Executive Departments; it is said that sometimes appointments are obtained under the very gentle but powerful influence of the other sex. Under what head of the "old fog" titles of the ancient days he would have included that particular adverse and injurious influence, (if he so considers it,) I do not exactly know; for he has not said. I know but one, and that is the old offense of "embracery." [Laughter.] But, Mr. President, I am sorry to be led into anything like a jocose remark upon this subject. This bill is an important one. It is calculated, as far as it goes, to do good, and, so far as I can see, to do no harm. I hope the Senate will not recommit it. It ought not to be delayed. Every hour that it remains here until it becomes a law, is only extending the period within which those harpies that play upon the ignorant and undesigning may secure to themselves, in anticipation of its passage, the assignments which they will afterwards be able to enforce. I hope we shall pass the bill. If there are other evils to be corrected, let my friend bring forward his bill. This has been carefully considered. It has been matured by the Committee on Claims. Amendments have been proposed by that committee. Those amendments have been sanctioned by the Senate. It is now ready for its passage. I hope that we shall not postpone the further consideration of the bill, because it does not reach all imaginable or unimaginable evils.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I did not object to the bill solely upon the ground that it did not propose a remedy for all imaginable evils. I objected to the bill because it had positive defects, as well as omissions, in my opinion. One of the defects which I pointed out was a prohibition of the right to transfer a just claim against the Government even to secure a bona fide debt, or a sum of money advanced. Now, I know, as well as my friend from North Carolina, whose astuteness as a lawyer I have had many occasions to test and to admire, that, according to the old common law, choses in action were not assignable. But I know perfectly well that the policy of this country in many States has modified, and in very many instances, if not in every case in all the States, has repeated this old common-law rule, and made choses in action transferable and assignable. That is the rule in my own State. That being the law in my own State, I want to secure to the citizens of my State the same privileges in reference to a claim against the Government of the United States that they would have in reference to claims amongst each other. I want them to have a right to use those claims in the advancement of their personal interests, for lawful and legitimate objects. But at the same time that I want to secure that, I am for punishing them for making any improper use of this privilege. I make that distinction. So much for the argument of my friend on that point.

Now, I have to inform him, by way of correction, as he corrected me the other day in a calculation—and I take pleasure in paying him back—that he was in error. I like to discharge all debts. My friend from North Carolina was so anxious to display his wit—as he generally does upon occasions of this sort—that he did not attend to the reading of the provisions of my substitute. I wish to read a portion of it to him again; and he will find that even “embezzlement,” to use his own term, is provided for. My substitute provides—

“Nor shall any person whatever receive any gift, present, fee, or reward for his or her influence to be exercised in any manner whatever in procuring the passage of a law, or an appropriation by the Congress of the United States in favor of any individual, company, corporation, or State, or for recommending a person, or using his or her influence to procure an appointment, or office for any person.”

So, then, it will be perceived that my friend's fruitful imagination in imputing defects to my proposition, has failed on the present occasion. I knew his great susceptibility to that kind of influence, which seems to have entered into his thoughts. That ethereal sex has as much influence upon me, I hope, as upon him. I wanted to guard both him and me against it. Therefore I provided for it in my amendment.

I hope that, as no great delay can occur from this matter again going before the Committee on Claims, who have prepared this bill, and as really the subject, in my humble judgment, is one that is of vast importance to this country, and to our own honor and credit, it may be permitted to take that course, and let the committee see whether there are any suggestions in my proposition worthy of consideration. If there be not, then they can report the bill back to-morrow, or the next day, and I shall be content. I have no pride of opinion in this matter—none whatever. I have already accounted for the reason why I could not attend to the matter earlier. I do not care about making any argument. I do not feel any kind of gratification in submitting a speech on the subject. I have acted because this matter, while I was a member of the Committee on Claims, was occasionally talked of in that committee, and because one branch of this amendment has been a matter that I have looked at for years, for it grew out of personal and family transactions, and it could not escape me. Having thought upon it in the manner I have done, I deemed it proper to bring it to the attention of the Senate.

One remark more. We gentlemen here are to blame, in a great degree, for all this, by not providing a board, or court of claims, before which the claims against the Government could be settled. If we had an efficient court, or board of claims, which should consider all claims presented against the Government, you would never hear of those personal imputations which this bill unfortunately provides for against members of Congress. These claims would then go through a judicial tribunal. That tribunal would settle the merits of the claims, and report to us what allowance ought to be made. If we thought they were improperly settled, we could exercise a sort of revising control over the board. I humbly conceive, that while we are upon this subject, members of Congress cannot do better than to reflect seriously upon the propriety of establishing a board of claims, before whom these cases should be adjudicated, and thus take them away from the action of members of Congress until they shall have been adjudicated by such a board.

Mr. BADGER. Mr. President, I do not think my friend has relieved himself at all from the difficulty which I pointed out to him; for when you come to consider his proposition, it merely excludes the influence to which I have alluded when that influence is given for “fee or reward.” Now, the danger of that influence is the higher when it is not mercenary, but is gratuitous, and more completely takes away from those upon whom it is brought to bear, the calm exercise of a judicious understanding. That is my answer. I will not go into the question of the propriety of the establishment of a board of claims, for I do not see exactly that it has much to do with this question.

Mr. MASON. I think it is perfectly manifest to the Senate that the unfortunate difference between the honorable Senators from North Carolina and Kentucky is irreconcilable; and as the hour is late, I move an adjournment.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I cannot vote for the recommitment of this bill, for the reason that I think the evils intended to be remedied are, so far as legislation can prevent them, already provided for by the bill as reported by the committee. The main object of the bill is, as I understand, to reach a class of cases which cannot, in any other way than that pointed out by this bill, be reached. It is known that persons having claims against the Government, who are uninformed in relation to their rights; are necessarily compelled to employ others to prosecute those claims. As the practice now is, the whole of the compensation, and the rights of the parties, depend to a great extent, upon the agents for claims. The object of this bill is to shift and to change the character of the rights of the parties, so that the claimant himself, or herself, may have it in his or her power to make such compensation as he or she may think proper, and not leave it to any agent to demand just such compensation as he may think proper.

According to the decision of Attorney General Gilpin, at a former day, upon common-law principles, the agent or attorney had a lien in the Department upon the recovery, against the Government for the amount of the contract, be it one half, or more or less. The Attorney General, in the case of an Indian, decided that inasmuch as the recovery was the result of the labor of the attorney, he had a lien, upon common-law principles, to the extent of his contract, upon the recovery, and that it must be paid to the agent, and to nobody else. When Governor Marcy was Secretary of War, that rule was reversed. But since that time, I understand that the opinion of Attorney General Gilpin now prevails in the Departments, and that when an individual recovers a claim, a caveat is filed at once for ten, twenty, thirty, or even fifty per cent., and the claimant is compelled to yield to whatever the agent may demand of him, or may allege or prove that he has agreed, perhaps with an imperfect knowledge of his rights, to pay.

The object of this bill is, that the claimant shall have the liberty of complying with his contract or not, as he shall think proper; so that the agent must rely exclusively upon the honor of the individual who employs him. That is the great object of the bill. For myself, I think that there is no danger of a claimant failing to pay a reasonable compensation. It is utterly impossible to prevent champerty. All that Congress can do, is to throw the parties upon the contract, and if individuals make contracts, let them go to the courts of justice to enforce them. Let us not give these agents the privilege of filing their caveats in the Departments, and prevent honest claimants from getting their money, after having been delayed year after year in procuring it.

This is the great object of the bill. There are other provisions with reference to members of Congress, and preventing them from prosecuting claims for a consideration. This is right and proper. But, as to the amount of penalty to be annexed, we know that it never will be enforced. If persons are disposed to avoid it, they will do so. But, according to the provisions of the bill—and this is one of its main features—they must go into the courts of justice, in order to enforce their contracts. I do not see that the bill could be much benefited by a recommitment. The Committee on Claims have carefully considered the matter, and I think the bill which they have reported is a very good one.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I have only to say, that I concur in the views expressed by the honorable Senator from North Carolina, and by the honorable Senator from Mississippi. I think this is a very good bill as it stands. It goes pretty far. I do not wish to detain the Senate by any remarks. I will, therefore, merely say, that I hope the motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Claims will not prevail, but that we shall pass it at once.

The motion to recommit was not agreed to.

The bill was then read a third time and passed.

On motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 12, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PRINTING OF CONGRESS.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I desire to make a report from the House members of the Committee on Printing, and I hope that by unanimous consent of the House, the report will be ordered to be printed, and that its consideration will be postponed until Tuesday next, or to any other day that suits the convenience of the House.

Mr. HOUSTON. I object to the reception of the report, if it is to be postponed until any day that will give it the preference over other business.

Mr. KING, of New York. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the consideration of the report from the Committee on Printing. The gentleman from Kentucky proposes to make an additional report from the same committee. There is a rule which gives that committee power to report at any time.

Mr. HOUSTON. The Committee on Printing have a right to report in connection with the current printing; but will the Chair decide that they have a right to report in favor of private claims that have been referred to them, so as to give those claims a preference over claims referred to other committees? I must object to the report, if it is to take precedence over the regular business.

Mr. OLDS. I make another point of order, and it is this: that the regular order of business is the consideration of a report from the Committee on Printing, which, being a privileged question, cannot be superseded by another privileged question.

The SPEAKER. The Twenty-first joint rule is as follows:

“It shall be in order for the Committee on Printing to report at any time.”

The Chair therefore overrules the point of order made by the gentleman from Alabama, but sustains the point made by the gentleman from Ohio. The consideration of a report from that committee, made in accordance with the rules, must take precedence of another report from that committee.

Mr. FOWLER. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business has been called for, and the Chair has stated it.

Mr. FITCH. I understand, then, that the report from the Committee on Printing is the regular order of business, and that it is now under consideration. I ask that the resolution may be read.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the following resolution, reported from the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing, under the joint resolution of the third of August, 1846, “have power to adopt such measures as may be deemed necessary to remedy any neglect or delay on the part of the contractor to execute the work ordered by Congress, and to make a pro rata deduction in the compensation allowed, or refuse the work altogether, should it be inferior to the standard; and in all cases may hold the contractor and his securities responsible for any increased expenditure consequent upon the non-performance of his contract.”

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. By the permission of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr.

FITCH.] I would make a single suggestion, and it is this: we have had a measure (the homestead bill) pending before the House for some time, and it seems to have been in the way of other business. Now, if we go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to-day we can dispose of that bill and get it out of the way. I understand from the members of the Committee on Printing that they have no objection to the postponement of this matter; and I would suggest, therefore, that we should go into committee, and finish the homestead bill. The gentleman from Indiana will still be entitled to the floor when this matter comes up again.

Mr. GORMAN. With the permission of my colleague, I will move to postpone this matter until Monday next.

Mr. CLINGMAN. The territorial business is the special order for the whole of next week.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I desire to know what is the condition of the report I made a few minutes ago? I understood the Chair to say that I had a right to make the report.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman from Kentucky cannot have heard the decision of the Chair on the point of order raised by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. OLDS.]. The Chair decided that notwithstanding the Committee on Printing have a right to report at any time, they have no right to make reports, the consideration of which will come in conflict, and that, in the opinion of the Chair, one report from that committee being the first business in order, it must be disposed of before the committee can make another report. In other words, the Chair decides that the first report from the committee being the first business in order, it must be disposed of before another report can be thrust on the consideration of the House. Otherwise, where would be the place of the second report, unless, by unanimous consent, it was received, and its consideration postponed to some future day? It could not take precedence of the report now before the House.

Mr. FITCH. I would yield with great pleasure to the gentlemen who desire the postponement of this matter, but it is manifest that if postponed now, it cannot be taken up again for a long time, as there is a special order which will occupy a great part of next week, if not the entire week. It is as important to dispose of this printing question as it is of the homestead bill, which the gentleman desires to take up, for they are both alike in the way of all other business. I therefore prefer the discussion of the former should be had now, particularly as it is a special order for to-day, and the sooner it is disposed of the better for all parties.

The wide range taken in the previous debate upon this subject has necessarily associated with its further consideration questions which were not originally connected with it. But I desire to travel as little beyond the immediate issues before us as an answer to the previous defense of the action of the committee will admit—such answer as that defense seems to require.

My friend and colleague, [Mr. GORMAN,] the chairman of the Committee on Printing, during his closing remarks upon the previous report of the committee, reiterated a charge which had been before made, and before denied; that a coalition existed here, having for its object the defeat of the action of that committee—a coalition composed of gentlemen, mostly Democrats, entertaining opposite sectional sentiments. Now, as I have before said; I do not belong to either of the extremes, (Free-Soilers and ultra State-Rights men,) between which the coalition is alleged to exist; but having acted with those who have opposed the action of the committee, I may be supposed to know something of their motives and views. I can, therefore, say, as I have said before, that no such coalition exists outside of the imaginations of those who make the charge. And even if it did exist, it would be powerless here; at least it would not constitute a majority, as was clearly proved but a few weeks since by the votes upon the compromise resolutions. The two extremes, between whom a coalition is now alleged to exist, opposed those resolutions; but, notwithstanding their opposition, the resolutions passed; and thus it would be now, if such coalition existed—it would be powerless in opposition to the action of the Printing Committee. It has been only by the votes of many of the National Democracy that the proposed action of the committee—the consummation of their intentions—has been hitherto prevented. The only coalition that can even be suspected to exist, is one which might be inferred from circumstances to exist between the members of the committee, of opposite politics, and those who sustain their action in the House. I do not allege that there is such a coalition; but if circumstantial evidence is to be received in proof of its existence, the proof will be found to be so strong as to justify any jury of intelligent men in hesitating long before relieving the parties concerned of the charge by a verdict of "not guilty."

Now, sir, I desire to revert for a few moments to the first report from the committee, and to a resolution adopted by the Joint Committee on Printing, which accompanied that report, and to call the attention of the House to a few facts connected with both. That resolution was irregular, because it was reported from a joint committee of Congress, by a majority not recognized by the rules which ordinarily govern the proceedings of joint committees. It is well known that the majority necessary to enable a joint committee to report must consist of a majority of the committee from each body—the House portion and the Senate portion respectively. But in this instance, there never was a majority of the Senate committee. It was only a numerical majority of the joint committee that adopted that resolution.

Again: that resolution was irregular, because it was not the resolution which the committee directed to be reported; it was another, as the records of the committee will show, and as the then chairman of the Senate portion of the committee [Mr. BORLAND] has declared.

During the discussion upon that report, it was charged that opposition to the action of the committee, was opposition to Donelson & Armstrong, and the chairman of the House portion of the committee [Mr. GORMAN] proceeded to defend those gentlemen before they were assailed, and to defend them against members who had no thought of assailing them—against members who were in fact, better friends of Donelson & Armstrong, and of the Democratic party, than were the Democratic members of the committee themselves, because he was defending them against members who would have saved those gentlemen and the Democratic party from the odium of a partnership with a leading political paper of the opposite party—a partnership, not for the dissemination of political principles, but for a division of profits—of money from the National Treasury; and would have saved them from the charge of corruption, which such a partnership would inevitably originate.

[Here a message was received from the Senate of the United States by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, Esq., its Secretary.]

Mr. POLK. Will the gentleman from Indiana allow me to make a statement at this point in his remarks?

Mr. FITCH. Certainly.

Mr. POLK. It might be inferred from the remarks of the gentleman that Donelson & Armstrong consented to the arrangement of the committee.

Mr. FITCH. I have not so asserted, but such is the belief. I trust it is erroneous.

Mr. POLK. Messrs. Donelson & Armstrong never consented to the combination of the two presses to which the gentleman has referred. They never consented to the action of the committee on that subject.

Mr. FITCH. I am happy to hear it; exceedingly so. I was about to say, when interrupted, that the committee made no defense of the other parties to whom they proposed to give a portion (half) of the printing—Gideon & Co., of the Republic—other than the general statement of the chairman, that the Republic was in favor of the finality of the compromise. Yet, the committee knew that much, very much of the opposition to their action originated from their proposition to give one half of the printing to that paper. Sir, that paper has abounded in unmeasured and unwarranted misrepresentations of the Democratic party, its men and its principles. Yet we find a Democratic committee of a Democratic Congress proposing to place at its disposal, out of the public Treasury, the means of multiplying its misrepresentations, and propagating them more extensively throughout the country, that they may be more effective! Why did not the committee defend Gideon & Co., and the Republic? The members of the committee might then have had the pleasure, or the mortification—whichever they esteemed it—of seeing pamphlet copies of their speeches issuing from the office of that paper embellished, mayhap, with a wood-cut of a coon, significant of the office from which it was issued, and typical of the principles of the paper which it defended.

The same exceptions which I take, and which most Democrats would be disposed to take, to the matter of the political editorials of the Republic, that paper and the Whig party generally would doubtless take to the Democratic press, and, perhaps, not without some foundation. Indeed, sir, it is not a pleasant confession, but probably true, that some foundation for such exceptions appears to be inseparable from the management of a political party press. But that is no recommendation to the support and patronage of an opposite party. The exceptions in the case of the Republic do not extend to the manner, so far as ability is concerned, of its editorship. Its columns display an ability for political warfare, a readable raciness of style rarely equaled, an ability which it is to be wished might be imparted to a few more Democratic papers.

If it be admitted that editorial support of the compromise entitles to a reward out of the National Treasury, where are the rewards to stop? If it be proposed to confine them to this city, and be thought necessary to divide them between a Whig and Democrat, another question presents itself—who is to be the recipient of the Democratic portion, Donelson & Armstrong or Mr. Ritchie? It was Mr. Ritchie who edited the Union during the pendency of the compromise measures; it was he who advocated those measures, defended their friends, and assailed their enemies; it was he who fought through in this city the Democratic editorial fight in behalf of the compromise. But we do not understand him as asking a reward for such services out of the national funds, though he may have some claim upon our justice for services rendered, independent of his political opinions or editorial career. And I should regret to learn that Donelson & Armstrong sought any such reward. However, sir, I make no such admission; I do not admit our right to reward any person out of the National Treasury for partisan political services, especially when it can only be done in violation of the spirit, if not the letter, of existing law. And more especially still do I deny the propriety and the right of a Democratic Congress bestowing a bonus out of the National Treasury upon a somewhat unscrupulous partisan paper of the opposite party, and thus giving it the means of rendering itself more mischievous.

I have before said, and repeat it, that if the contract system was not in existence, and the question before us was the election of a printer, I know no reason why Donelson & Armstrong should not receive my cordial support. But in expressing this preference for those gentlemen, I do it not solely and exclusively because they support the compromise, though that has its weight, but because they are Democrats, and editors of a Democratic paper in this city—the "organ," if you please so to call it. They are opposed, and very properly, to secession, or they could receive no support from me for any position; but they are not understood to be opposed to the proper and legal exercise of reserved State rights. Hence reasonable State-Rights men can, and the contract law out of the way, doubtless would, support them. The defense of State rights, to the extent of preventing encroachments upon them by the General Government, (which it has a constant tendency to make,) is the duty of every editor, and still more, of every Representative. If recreant to that duty, they are unfit to be clothed with any trust. Much as I revere the "Union of the States," if I thought the power of that Union was used, regardless of the Constitution, in a manner destructive of the rights and interests of any State, I would resist; but the resistance should be first under the Constitution—should consist in an appeal to the Judiciary, the United States Supreme Court, the last peaceful arbiter in disputes among the States, and between the States and General Government. If the decision of that court was adverse to me and mine, it would be quietly submitted to; but if in our favor, and disregarded, or upon some pretext evaded by the General Government, and its oppression continued, so help me Heaven, I would advocate forcible resistance—for that would then become a duty both to State and General Government.

If Southern Secessionists had sought a legal—a constitutional remedy for their real or imaginary grievances, no one would have gainsayed their right so to do, or oppose their effort; but their error was, in advocating as a first remedy, and the only one to which they were willing to resort, one outside of the law and the Constitution. No one can class me with either the Northern or Southern extremes in sectional sentiment. I am, like most of the great West, of and with the Nation as a whole—not with the sectional North or South. I neither opposed all the compromise measures, because they were not as favorable to the North as could have been wished, and thus took rank with the Free-Soilers; nor did I denounce such as were favorable to the North, because of their imagined encroachments upon the South, and thus act with their Southern opponents. I voted for most of them, and readily acquiesce in all, not because I think all of them are right—and not so thinking, no motive shall induce me to say so—but because whatever of evil the measures contain sink into insignificance, when compared with the greater evils which we may reasonably expect to result from reopening and reargiting them. For the votes which I did give, I have no whining regrets—such as we have heard expressed for a dodge on the fugitive slave law. I then esteemed those votes right; and have subsequently discovered no reason to change my opinion. Under the same circumstances, the same votes would doubtless be given again. My negative vote upon the passage of the fugitive slave law, was a vote, not against executing the provisions of the Constitution requiring the delivery of fugitives, but against a bill containing features which I esteemed unnecessarily harsh—features indicative, as I have elsewhere said, rather of angry than of enlightened legislation. But the previous question having been sustained, no opportunity was permitted of objecting to any of its features, or proposing amendments, and the only other means left of dissenting from any of the bill, was a negative vote against the whole of it. There is a wide difference between expressing opinions adverse to a measure; or seeking to amend it while pending; or opposing it on its passage, because of objectionable features, and continuing that opposition after it has become a law. The former is a right to be exercised by every independent Representative—the latter is incompatible with the duty of a good citizen. The compromise has passed, and the measures composing it are, it is to be hoped, settled; and no person has a right to go back to the period of its passage, and attempt to make a vote for or against it the exclusive test of Democracy. And such attempt, whenever made, and by whomsoever, will prove a mortifying failure.

While saying this, however, I must be permitted further to say, that it is the duty of every good citizen to acquiesce in all provisions of the Constitution, and observe in good faith all laws necessary to enforce them, although those laws may contain provisions which he objected to having embodied in them; and especially is this his duty when evils greater than the laws contain are likely to result from his refusal to observe them. And believing all Democrats to be good citizens, and nullification of a law, or of a constitutional provision, no part of the Democratic creed, I therefore believe it right and highly proper for the party, as such, to avow their acquiescence in all the provisions of the Constitution, and their observance, in good faith, of all laws necessary to enforce those provisions, and to place that avowal upon record, that the country may see and know their position, to condemn or sustain it, as the majority may deem proper. I have, therefore, acted with those who sustain the compromise, and shall continue so to do; but it is not hence to be inferred that I wish on the one hand to denounce or punish those who opposed it, but violated no law in such opposition, or on the other to myself violate a law, as is proposed by the committee in this printing matter, for the purpose of rewarding those who sustain it.

Mr. STANLEY. I rise to a point of order, that it is not competent for the gentleman to discuss the compromise measures in connection with this subject.

Mr. FITCH. The compromise has been connected often with the printing by others in the previous debate. I have followed their example, though, perhaps, it was erroneous in its inception. But the gentleman makes his point of order too late, for I have no more to say upon the subject of the compromise.

Mr. STANLEY. All I want is fair play. I want the same privilege extended to others as to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. FITCH. I know of no one to whom I would more willingly extend any such privilege than to the gentleman from North Carolina. I shall certainly, therefore, not object to his exercising it.

Mr. STANLEY. I am confident the gentleman would not.

Mr. FITCH. It will be remembered that during the debate upon the first report from the Committee on Printing, I expressed the opinion that the committee sought to usurp a power belonging exclusively to Congress—namely, the power to practically repeal or suspend the contract system, and to declare who should, and who should not, be the public printers. I declared that their action, if sustained, must result in making their favorites the printers to Congress, for that, by withholding from the contractor a portion of the printing, perhaps the profitable portion, and that he could readily execute, they would justify him in abandoning his contract, and asking for damages, or perhaps coerce him to such abandonment, and all the printing would thus be placed in the hands of their favorites—they would become the sole printers to Congress. The result I then anticipated, if the action of the committee is sustained, has already arrived. The committee informs us, in the report now before us, that the contractor has memorialized them for relief, and intimated his inability to comply with his contract. Therefore, the committee, in pursuance of their plan, will give the entire printing to men selected by themselves, without the knowledge or consent of the House, and contrary to its heretofore well-understood wish. They will indirectly, by their own dictation, have appointed the printers to Congress, and set aside the law and the contract system. They will not pretend to say they have the power to do this directly—they will not deny but the attempt would be illegal. Then why seek to do it indirectly? The latter is equally in violation of the spirit, if not the letter of the law. During that debate, the chairman of the committee, [Mr. GORMAN,] said:

"When the proposition was first made to give the future printing to some one beside the contractor, the question immediately sprang up, whether or not we had the power to do that. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN,] one of the members of the committee, who has the reputation of being as good a lawyer as any other in the country, suggested that it was doubtful whether that power could be exercised by the committee. What did we do? Persist in doing a thing about which there was a doubt of our power to do? No! We conceived, therefore, that we had no power to make this transfer for the future printing. Whatever the contractor fails or neglects to do of the printing that is ordered now, according to his contract, we may make arrangements to have done. That was our argument there; it is our argument here, and I am satisfied it convinces everybody here."

Then the opinion of the committee was, that they had no right to contract for future printing—a correct opinion, and one in which the House will readily concur; but subsequent to that time, the committee appear to have had a new reading of the law, or the gentleman from New York [Mr. HAVEN] has discovered a new version of it, or the committee have received light from without, relative to its proper construction, for it appears from the report before us, that they have arranged with a party other than the contractor for future printing, printing not yet ordered.

Mr. GORMAN. If the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him. We have certainly not given one particle of future printing to Donelson & Armstrong. We have simply done this: We have provided for supplying any deficiency where the public printer fails to execute his contract, but not one job has been voted into their possession upon the part of the committee. We conceive that we have no power to give any future printing into the hands of any party other than the public printer, until we find he fails to execute it.

Mr. FITCH. I may have more to say upon this point in another connection. I will now only say, that if this committee have not given the future printing to Donelson & Armstrong, the language of their report is extremely loose, because it informs us that the committee have provided for the execution of printing which may hereafter be ordered, and made that provision with other parties than the contractor—parties of their own selection.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. If the gentleman will refer to the report, he will find that it says no such thing.

Mr. FITCH. The gentleman does not understand the force and meaning of the language of his own report, or is very oblivious of facts. The language of the report is, that "the committee entered into contracts with Donelson & Armstrong to execute so much of the public printing as had been or might be ordered by the House, and which the public contractor could not or would not do; and with Gideon & Co. to do that ordered by the Senate." If it was illegal and wrong when the chairman made the remarks I have previously quoted, to bestow future printing upon any other than the contractor, it is equally so now; for, however circumstances may have controlled the action of the committee, no circumstances can change the law. I have more hereafter to say of the report now before us.

The committee have assumed, and so has the editor of the Union, that the reference of the first report back to that committee without instructions, was indorsement of their action, and that, therefore, they were justified in pursuing that action. The committee and the editor of the Union must have known that no such indorsement was intended or understood upon the part of the House. Out of deference to the feelings of the committee, the House delicately forbore giving a vote, which would have been construed into one of censure, and hence referred the matter back to the committee without instructions, but with the full understanding that other and different action should be had. It appears that our consideration for their feelings was thrown away, for they have not appreciated it. The understanding that other and different action should be had was based upon the opinions elicited during the previous debate, upon the votes had during that debate, and upon the promises, positive and implied, of the committee. And how have those promises been redeemed? Have we been deceived—sadly deceived? Or have we deceived ourselves? Which ever it may be, sir, if we are deceived again, the fault will be our own. It will be because of our want of determination to enforce that accountability from the committee which it is our right to expect, and their duty in common with all other committees to yield. It will be because of our want of sufficient self-respect to insist that our instructions shall be respected and obeyed. I do not wish to be understood as charging intentional deception to the committee. It was the result probably of a misunderstanding between the House and committee relative to their respective action and intentions. But however it may have occurred—whosoever was the fault, its repetition should be avoided, and it is the duty of the House to place that avoidance beyond the possibility of doubt.

Complaints are made by gentlemen upon this side of the House, of the non-fulfillment of certain promises, which they allege were made them—promises, that if the first report was referred back to the committee without instructions, all of whatever printing was given to any other than the contractor, should be given to Donelson & Armstrong. How has this promise been redeemed? But, sir, whatever others may do, I am not disposed to make any complaint of this character, because no promise controlled my vote, and no promise should have controlled the vote of any other gentleman; first, because it is wrong to vote with a view to the bestowal of the printing upon any individual by the mere action of the committee, on terms higher than those at which it would be executed by others, and in violation of the spirit of the existing law, the contract system. That system is the correct one, and should be enforced to the full extent of the intention of the law.

Mr. GORMAN, (interrupting.) I made the suggestion to which the gentleman alludes, that if that matter was referred back to the committee without instructions, in all probability the whole of the printing would be given to Donelson & Armstrong, and I suppose the gentleman is aware that I acted accordingly.

Mr. FITCH, (resuming.) I look to the result, and find half of the printing is to be given to Gideon & Co., of the Republic, and half of it to Donelson & Armstrong. And no promise, further—more, should have controlled the votes of gentlemen, because the previous action of the committee should have had more weight than any promise that could come from them during the pendency of a proposition to indirectly censure them by referring the matter to another committee; and again, because it was manifest, by the votes on the other side of the House, that the majority there, though doubtless fully aware of the alleged promises to Democrats, were nevertheless sustaining the action of the committee. Hence it was fair to infer that counter promises were understood by our political opponents, or that they fancied themselves in possession of a key to the manner of a fulfillment of those made to Democrats.

Mr. GORMAN. I will be obliged to any Whig gentleman upon this floor, if he will rise in his place and say that from me he had the slightest intimation—

Mr. FITCH. I do not say it or believe it. There is a Whig upon the Printing Committee.

Mr. GORMAN. That is all satisfactory.

Mr. FITCH. While upon the subject of promises, it will be as well, perhaps, to allude to two or three others. The one I have mentioned was made to individuals. There were promises made to the House. We were told, that if the entire matter was referred back to the committee without instructions, whatever printing they should give out to any party other than to the public printer, should be given upon the terms of Towers's bid. Has this promise been fulfilled? Let that report upon your desk answer. The committee, in that report, and in the late debate, admit that they have deviated from that promise, but tell us that the terms which they have adopted, in giving out the printing to other parties, are substantially the terms of Towers's bid, and that the variations are not material. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the committee deem material, but it appears from the figures of the terms published by them, and from the statement of gentlemen who know, practically, something of printing, that the difference between the terms of Towers's bid and those adopted by the committee, is some fifteen to thirty per cent.; that the committee have adopted terms much in advance of the terms of Towers's bid. This is a difference which, I apprehend, the country will esteem somewhat material, the opinion of the committee to the contrary notwithstanding. They justify their action in this respect, by stating that they have adopted the terms of Towers's estimate. Now, sir, is it sought, by associating Towers's bid and Towers's estimate, to convey the impression that the terms are the same? There is the difference I have mentioned—a difference of from fifteen to thirty per cent.

The bid by Towers was made more than a year since, when he was competing with Rives, Hamilton, and others for the public printing. The estimate was made very recently—made at the instigation of a gentleman who is interested in having the action of the committee sustained. It was given to that gentleman, as is understood, without any knowledge upon Towers's part of the use to which it was to be applied, and its terms have been adopted, not to give the printing to Towers, who made the estimate, but to give it to other parties, to whom the committee had predetermined to give it under any circumstances. And they gave it to those other parties upon the terms of the estimates; notwithstanding Towers notified them that he was ready and willing to execute the printing in good faith and give unquestionable security therefor, in accordance with the terms of his bid, the terms which the committee had promised to adopt. Have we no cause to complain of the manner of the fulfillment of this promise?

Again: on Thursday, the 6th instant, the day after the instructions were adopted and sent to the committee, we were distinctly told that these instructions should be followed. But I will read the language used:

"Mr. GORMAN. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to allow me to make one remark. The House have given us directions in relation to the public printing, and I now give notice that we intend to execute strictly those directions, and if the House wants any of its printing done promptly, it must give some other directions."

And again:

"Mr. GORMAN. I only wish to repeat what I have said, that the House have directed that we shall let out this printing which the public printer cannot execute after ten days' advertisement. Now, the public printer has not done anything according to the contract; and I give notice that the committee will execute strictly the directions of the House, whatever may be the delay in procuring the printing necessary to be done from time to time."

I am bound to believe that my colleague [Mr. GORMAN] endeavored to carry out those instructions, but was defeated, out-voted, in his efforts in the committee.

Mr. GORMAN. I did; and I felt bound to do so, or resign my place upon the committee.

Mr. FITCH. It matters little, however, what was the cause of the failure to fulfill the promise; its fulfillment has failed; for so far from obeying the instructions of the House, the committee now report to us deliberately their intention to defy and disobey those instructions. They present to us the alternative either of sacrificing our self-respect by allowing them to defy and disobey the House, or permitting them to retire from any further duties upon the committee. Can we hesitate one moment which of these alternatives to accept? No, sir; self-respect, and a proper regard for the business of the House and the legislation of the country, demand our acceptance of the latter. Let it be accepted! We were told, during the previous debate, that a "small section" of the Democratic party was endeavoring to rule the House, in endeavoring to prevent the bestowal of the printing upon partisan editors for partisan purposes, and that we had "tolerated their recalcancy" too long, and that there was no hope of success if it was only "to be purchased at the expense of our long-established principles." True! Yet, sir, we find a "small section of the party" conjoined with a portion of the Whigs, under the lead of the Committee on Printing, asking the House to "tolerate their recalcancy" in attempting to bestow the printing upon their favorites at prices higher than it would have been taken by others, without competition, and in violation of the spirit of the contract system, although our doing so must be "at the expense of our long-established principles;" for there is no better established principle of the Democratic party than the contract system for the execution of the public printing, and opposition to its bestowal, at unnecessarily high prices, upon partisan politicians in payment of partisan services. It is to be hoped that what this "small section of the party" requests will not be granted, and that the law, in its spirit as well as its letter, will govern our disposition of the printing.

The report now before us objects to the instructions of the House, that they contemplate the exercise of a power which the House does not possess. The committee assume that the House printing and the Senate printing each are joint matters, and that, therefore, the House cannot dispose of its printing without the consent of the Senate. But the arguments they use in support of this, are sophistical. As the House pays for its printing out of its own contingent fund, it is not easy to perceive why we should not control its disposition, especially under the circumstances now presented, and when we propose to dispose of it in accordance with the spirit of the existing law. It is surely our duty to guard our contingent fund; and all other Government funds intrusted to our guardianship, as far as possible, from unnecessary expenditure. If the other branch of the legislative department do not choose to exercise a vigilant watchfulness over their contingent fund, but permit it to be squandered for the benefit of partisan politicians, or in payment of the extravagant wine and cigar bills of an adventurer, who may wish to draw upon our gullibility for his own purposes, their example, to say the least of it, does not recommend itself for our adoption.

If we have not the power to order a reletting of our printing, then neither have the joint committee the power to do, as it is admitted they have done, namely, constitute themselves the House and Senate portion each a separate committee, each to have the entire control over the printing of its respective body. In taking such action, the committee assumed a power, the possession of which they now deny to the House, and of necessity to themselves. They assumed that power when they thought it necessary for the progress of a particular plan which they had in view; but they now deny the same power, when its denial, under changed circumstances, is equally necessary to the completion of their plan. They make the House and Senate printing each a joint or separate matter—separate to-day, joint to-morrow, as their will or their plans may dictate.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, (interrupting.) The gentleman makes a statement, which I am sure he makes under a misapprehension, because the Joint Committee on Printing has never divided itself.

Mr. FITCH. Then the report before us is again at fault.

Mr. STANTON. I will state to the House what the joint committee did, and then the gentleman will see whether the report is at fault. The report states the facts precisely as they were. The Joint Committee on Printing appointed the three members of the House, who were on that committee, a sub-committee, and the three members of the Senate, who were upon that committee, a sub-committee, simply for the purpose of performing a little portion of the labor of that committee; and that labor was, to ascertain in what respect the public printer was in default in regard to the printing for either House. It was to be reported to the joint committee; and no action was to be had by either sub-committee, independent of the action of the joint committee. We do not pretend to be independent of the joint committee at all. Merely as a matter of convenience, we are required to perform a portion of the labors which it would be useless to require the whole committee to perform. What we do report to the joint committee. It would be inconvenient for the whole committee to go to the printing office to ascertain how much the printer is in default.

Mr. FITCH. Now, sir, if they have not made this division, how came the House portion of the committee to say that they had nothing to do with the Senate printing, and were not responsible for its bestowal upon the Republic, and that the Senate portion had nothing to do with the House printing?

We were told a few days since by a member of the Committee on Printing of the last Congress, that it was usual for each portion of the committee respectively to report to their bodies the number of extra copies of any document they deemed it desirable to print. Thus far and no further the independent action of each portion of the committee has hitherto extended. But here we find a case of independent action covering the whole ground; for each portion of the committee not only reports the number of extra copies, but selects the men and fixes the prices at which the printing is to be executed.

Mr. STANTON. The gentleman places me in the position of having stated facts which I now deny. I have submitted to his misunderstanding of the report; but the fact is, that the House committee did not say that the Senate committee have exclusive control over the Senate printing, or that we have exclusive control over the House printing. But I say, that with three votes in the Senate, part of the committee acting against us, our three cannot control a matter any more than the three members of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, appointed by the House, can control the three members appointed by the Senate for the same purpose; and therefore, by agreement, we divide the business, each taking a certain part. Nor can the House any more instruct the Joint Committee on Printing than it can the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

Mr. FITCH. The gentleman's comparison of his joint committee with the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, does not hold good. The cases are not parallel. There are other gentlemen belonging to the Board of Regents than members of Congress, who could give the casting vote, and control the action of the Board in the event of any disagreement between the House and Senate members. But the statement just made by the gentleman [Mr. STANTON] confirms what I have said relative to the division and separate action of the Committee on Printing. Neither the House nor Senate portion constituted a majority; they were equally divided; they could not agree, and neither could control the other on the joint committee. Instead, however, of reporting, as all other joint committees do, that they could only agree to disagree, and asking instructions, or asking to be discharged, they each undertake separate and independent control of the printing of their respective bodies. They can agree upon this separate action, and so report, but now deny that any such action has been had. So far as concerns the power in the House to instruct the House portion of the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, no one of the Board, and especially of the House portion of it, will question that power, and the right to exercise it. The House is, in part, the guardian of the funds of the Institution—responsible for their expenditure, in accordance with the law organizing it; and, if it be thought those funds are being squandered, by being lavished upon favorites, or in any other improper manner, the House has an undoubted right to instruct its portion of the Regents relative to the matter; ay, sir, and those Regents would obey those instructions; and, if they found other members of the Board, upon whom the instructions would not be binding, disposed to pay them so little respect as to refuse to permit them to be carried out, that fact would be reported to the House for further action. The House portion of the Board would not set up some construction of their own of the law, and say to the House that construction was right, and must be accepted, and the instructions repealed, or they would be disregarded and disobeyed. I trust never to be found a party to any such attempt at dictation. Neither would the House portion of the Regents say to the rest of the Board, "As we cannot agree in this matter involving the expenditure of money, you (the Senate portion) may take separate control of the expenditure of half, pay it to whom you please, and on whatsoever terms you please, and we will do the same with our half, and say nothing to the House relative to it, until compelled, and then inform them they have no right, under the law, to instruct or control us?" If the joint committee have the power to thus bisect themselves, and give to each half independent jurisdiction, they must possess it by virtue of their appointment by the two Houses, and not under the law of 1846, by which they profess to be governed; for no such power is conferred by that law; therefore, the same power of independent action must of necessity belong to the two Houses respectively. If the committee have not the power, their action in this, likewise, has been illegal, and presents another argument in favor of superseding it by action of our own.

The report before us assumes a state of facts somewhat at variance with those actually found to exist; it assumes that the House has instructed the joint committee, and then denies our right to do so. Let us examine the real facts in the case. The House portion of the committee report a proposition to print a certain number of extra copies of a document, (Patent Office Report.) This report—this proposition, undeniably comes from the House portion of the committee—the joint committee has nothing to do with it. The House recommit, with instructions, this report—this proposition—not to the joint committee—a committee which knew naught of it, and from which it never came—but to the House committee, the committee which reported it. That committee, being apparently predetermined not to obey the instructions, justify their refusal to obey by assuming the instructions to have been to the joint committee, and denying our right to instruct that committee. We have not claimed the right—we have not attempted to exercise it. Yet the House committee prepare a report purporting to be from the joint committee, assuming that we have instructed that committee, and denying our right to do so, and shield behind that report their refusal to obey instructions to themselves—the House committee.

Aside from having in other respects transcended their powers, the action of the committee has been improper, in bestowing such printing as has been, or may be, neglected or delayed by the contractor upon the men of their selection at prices higher than those at which others stood ready to take it, and give security for its faithful execution. By so doing, they would deprive us in part of our remedy upon the contractors for the difference between the contract price, and the price at which the committee procure the work to be executed. If the contractor obligated himself to do a particular amount and quality of work at $25,000, and so neglected or delayed its delivery that the committee gave it to another party at $50,000, while a third party stood ready to do it, and so notified the committee, at $30,000, no man will pretend to say that the liability of the contractors extends beyond $5,000, the difference between his contract price and the price at which the committee were notified by another party he was ready to take it. We thus lose $20,000. That $20,000 is given as a bonus to the favorites of this committee. It is a loss to us, and a gain to them.

During the discussion upon the first report, it was urged, among other objections to the action of the committee, that such action would subject them to the suspicion of having been governed by improper motives in the disposition of the printing, and that, perhaps, charges would grow out of such suspicion; and further, that if their action was sustained, then the same suspicions would be entertained, and the same charges arrayed against those sustaining it. Under such circumstances, it was clearly the duty of the committee, not only to the House and the country, but to themselves; to change or abandon the action which the well-understood wishes of the House had condemned; or at least, to make a voluntary, full, and candid report to the House of their proceedings, of the parties to whom they had given the printing, the prices at which they had given it, and the reasons for both. Such a report we were induced, many days since, to expect; but it never came, and so far from altering or abandoning their action, they have but added to it. They have taken a step in advance in the same line, and made a plan, sufficiently objectionable before, still more so. So far from making, voluntarily, a full and candid report of their proceedings, they so made none, except a proposition that we should place at their disposal the printing of some 50,000 extra copies of a profitable document; and even upon that proposition the chairman of the committee moved the previous question, to cut off discussion, by which alone, experience proves, we can elicit any knowledge of their action. And the report which they have now given us under peremptory instructions, is conclusive of but one thing, and that is; their determination to defy the House, and to disobey its instructions.

If the whispers which the committee admit they have heard, which indeed are audible throughout the city, should assume such shape, through the press or otherwise, as to subject them to censure, and to grave charges, they will have but to thank for it their own perverse perseverance in a plan condemned by the House.

"To willful men,
The injuries they themselves procured,
Must be their schoolmaster."

As a résumé of my views in relation to this matter, and of the action which the House should take in the premises, I offer for adoption the following resolutions as a substitute for the resolutions offered by the committee:

Resolved, That the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution directing the manner of procuring the printing for the two Houses of Congress," approved August 3d, 1846, empowers the Committee on Printing to provide only for the execution of such printing as has been "ordered by Congress;" and in the execution of which there is "any neglect or delay on the part of the contractor."

Resolved, therefore, That, in making a contract or contracts with any other party or parties for the execution of future work—work not yet ordered—the committee exceeded its powers, and such contract or contracts are null and void.

Resolved, That the action of the committee was improper in proposing to procure the execution of such printing now, or hereafter to be ordered, as is or may be neglected or delayed, at prices unnecessarily high, inasmuch as by procuring its execution at such prices, they would release, in part, the contractor from liability "for any increased expenditure consequent upon the non-performance of the contract."

Resolved, That the committee on the part of the House having exceeded their powers, and having declined obeying the instructions of the House, and expressed a disposition rather than do so to vacate their position on the joint committee, the latter of the alternatives they have presented be accepted, and that they be and hereby are discharged from any further service on said committee; and the Speaker be requested to fill the vacancy thus created in the Joint Committee on Printing.

The first resolution is merely declaratory of the powers of the committee under the joint resolution of 1846. The second declares that they exceeded those powers in making contracts for future printing; and that those contracts are null and void. The third declares their action improper in having, by giving printing out at unnecessarily high prices, taken such action as may release the contractor from liability for all the difference between his contract prices and the prices at which the committee propose to give the printing to others. The fourth resolution accepts the only one of the two alternatives presented by the committee, of which respect for ourselves, and a regard for the business of the House and the legislation of the country, will permit the acceptance.

I have the utmost respect for the members, individually, of that committee. There are none here I respect more; but in the position in which they have placed the House, and themselves as a committee, and under all the resulting circumstances of delay, embarrassment, and difficulty, relative to the printing, it is not easy to see what other action they can expect from us, or what other action the considerations I have mentioned will permit the House to adopt.

Mr. POLK. I do not see that we will be enabled to get through with this question to-day; and as we are so near the close of action upon the homestead bill, I hope the House will indulge me in a motion that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the special order.

Mr. HOUSTON. We cannot get through the homestead bill to-day.

Mr. STANLY. Has not the printing business priority over the motion submitted by the gentleman from Tennessee?

The SPEAKER. It has not, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I would request of the gentleman a withdrawal of his motion. A few minutes ago I would have consented to its adoption by the House, but as I expect to leave the city to-morrow, and will not be back again for ten or twelve days, I cannot, consistently with my own views of self-respect, allow the extraordinary speech of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FITCH] to go unanswered. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his motion.

[Cries of "Withdraw it!" "Withdraw it!"]

Mr. POLK. I have no objection to withdraw my motion, provided it is understood that when the subject again comes up for consideration that I shall be entitled to the floor. I would like very much to accommodate my friend from Kentucky.

Mr. STANTON. I do trust that my friend from Tennessee will waive his motion for the present.

Mr. POLK. I will withdraw my motion if the gentleman will renew it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state for the information of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLY] and the House generally, that it is the right of the Committee on Printing to report at any time; but when the report is made, and is before the House, it is to be disposed of subject to all the rules which operate upon reports from other committees.

Mr. POLK. I yield the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANTON] the floor with the condition that he will renew my motion.

Mr. STANTON. I do not design, if I can avoid it, to detain the House very long upon this subject, having upon a former occasion spoken in regard to it at length; and I would now abstain from any remarks if they were not called for by the very wanton and extraordinary speech of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. FITCH], the great object of which seems to have been to pervert facts and misrepresent the action of the committee of which I am a member, with a view of driving me and my colleagues upon that committee to abandon our places. Now, sir, let me say to the honorable gentleman, that however much I should be disposed to gratify the wishes of the House, if it so desired, and resign my position as a member of that committee, I shall never do so at his arrogant dictation, except upon one condition.

Mr. FITCH. With the permission of the gentleman, I will interrupt him for one moment. He intimates that I have evinced a disposition to drive, by arrogant dictation, him and his House colleagues from the committee. I only proposed to accept one of the alternatives presented to the House by the committee themselves—aye, presented by that gentleman.

During the debate, when the resolution was presented, the gentleman—himself having presented the report—said:

"If required to obey the instructions of the House, against the law, we cannot do it, and our duties are at an end; and so far as I am individually concerned, I shall be compelled to wash my hands of it, and so also will the rest of the committee."

They place such construction upon the law as their will, or plans may dictate—a construction different from that of the House, and arrogantly tell us, unless their construction is adopted, and the instructions of the House repealed, that they (the House committee) will disregard and disobey those instructions, or abandon their position on the joint committee. They have presented the alternatives to us, and told us that one we must accept. Is there no arrogant dictation in this? Yet the gentleman now prates of arrogance and dictation from others. For one, I will not submit to the alternative which the committee hoped to force upon us, and which their report and resolution contemplate—namely, their retention on the committee, and permission to them to defy us and our instructions. No, sir; they shall neither dictate to me, nor, I trust, to the House, what construction of the law we shall accept, nor which one of their proposed alternatives adopt. They have informed us they would leave unless they were permitted to rule. They have opened the door, and I am not disposed to close it against their exit. Let them go! That is all I have said—that is the extent of my dictation. I have refused to bow to that of the committee.

Mr. STANTON. The gentleman wholly misunderstands what I said. I made no such declaration as that "unless the House would permit the committee to make the contract they have made, I and the other members of the committee would wash our hands from further duty on the committee." Those who heard my remarks, when I made the report, and who listened with a view of not misrepresenting the committee, will recollect that I said:

"The Joint Committee on Printing desire to know of the House, whether they are to obey the law as it stands upon the statute-book, or to obey the instructions of the House? If required to obey the instructions of the House, against the law, we cannot do it, and our duties are at an end; and so far as I am individually concerned, I shall be compelled to wash my hands of it, and so also will the rest of the committee."

Now, sir, there is a very wide difference between what I really said upon that occasion, and what the gentleman alleges I did say. What I said then, I repeat now, and it is only what any gentleman, having proper regard for his official obligations, would say and do under the same circumstances. I say, that if the House of Representatives, under the impulses of heated excitement, and mad counsels, should determine that it has more power than both Houses of Congress together, and the President of the United States combined, and undertake to instruct us to perform duties against the plain provisions of the law under which we derived our appointment, without the concurrence of the other branches of the Government, our plain and obvious duty would be to obey the law, or wash our hands of the matter. This is the question which the report submits to the House. We only ask, sir, whether we are compelled to violate the law, or act in obedience to its provisions. I was about to say, when interrupted by the gentleman from Indiana, that I would not be driven by his dictation to abandon my place upon the committee, except upon one condition, and that is, that the House will appoint him to fill my place, a position which his accuracy, his regard for the laws of the land, and his excessive zeal against coalitions of all kind, eminently qualify him.

Mr. FITCH. Thank you—I do not wish the place. I have no disposition to manage a matter which you have made offensive to the House and the country.

Mr. STANTON. I should like to know, sir, how the gentleman, with all his accomplishments and qualifications, could perform the paradoxical duty of obeying the law and the instructions of the House at the same time. Perhaps his ingenious mind is equal to the task of devising some plan by which such a thing might be accomplished. It might be well for the House to avail itself of his services.

The Committee on Printing are charged by the gentleman with having usurped the power which belongs to the House, in the selection of public printers, and trampled the law of the land under their feet. This is a grave and serious charge, but serves no other purpose than to show how extremely ignorant is the gentleman of the very law upon which he has commented. I should like much to know from the honorable gentleman in what particular we have trampled upon the law? He will oblige me and, no doubt, the House by enlightening us on this subject.

Mr. FITCH. If the gentleman desires it, I will state a particular, and a strong one. I think, upon inquiry, it will be found that, about the time the gentleman's committee reported to the House a proposition to order the printing of fifty or sixty thousand copies of the Patent Office Report, and the House declined to order them printed until it was known who was to do it, and at what prices, the committee, in disregard of law, directed that document to be sent to Donelson & Armstrong to be printed. Subsequently, however, seeing the difficulty in which it was likely to involve them, they retraced their steps.

Mr. STANTON. That is a matter about which I know nothing.

Mr. FITCH. It is, however, a fact.

Mr. STANTON. I knew nothing of it; and if it was done it was by others than myself.

Mr. GORMAN. The Committee on Printing, before instructions were passed by the House, supposing that the regular number of the Patent Office Report had been ordered, among certain other documents, sent it down to the printers the gentleman has named to be printed, in the event Mr. Hamilton was not able to execute it. Immediately upon the passage of the resolution by the House, I sent an order, as the Clerk who sits at the desk well knows, for it to be returned.

Mr. STANTON. That was a matter in which I had no participation, but have no doubt that the statement of my colleague in the committee is strictly correct. But, admitting the example presented by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Fitch] to be true, just as he has stated it—that the Patent Office Report was sent to Donelson & Armstrong to be printed after the instructions of the House were passed—it was no violation of the law, and the committee had full power to do so. If the public printer had never seen a line of the manuscript—if he had never been called upon even to execute the job—under all the circumstances, the power conferred upon the committee by the joint resolution of 1846 was sufficient to justify them in giving the work to Donelson & Armstrong, or any other printer with whom they thought proper to contract. It was known to the committee, and to every other person who chose to be informed upon the subject, that your public printer had been in default with the public printing from the first day he commenced making an impression upon paper until that very moment. In no single instance since he commenced the performance of his duties has he complied fully with the terms of his contract.

I confess, sir, for myself, as one of the Committee on Printing, that the great error I have committed has been in permitting the contractor to trifle so long with us. The committee would, no doubt, have acted more wisely if they had arrested the work at the earliest moment, and compelled him either to comply strictly with his undertaking, or refused to permit any more to pass into his hands. We relied upon his solemn promises, both written and spoken, until we became convinced that they were entirely worthless. The committee would have been blind to the most incontestable evidence, every day presented to them, if they had remained insensible of the fact that the contractor was incapable, from want of disposition, capital, and skill, to execute the immense amount of work in his hands according to the requirements of the law and the terms of his contract. Why, sir, I am told upon good authority that he says now, that if required to execute these very Patent Office Reports, at the prices named in his contract, and in the manner and with the materials required, it will entail upon him a debt so large that he would not be able to get rid of it should he live ninety-nine years, so immense would be his losses. No wonder, sir, when the whole sum he has contracted to take for all the work to be ordered by Congress would not be more than sufficient to pay him a reasonable price for this single job! Under such circumstances, and in view of these facts, known to the committee, would it not be worse than folly to place such a job in his hands? Knowing that the public printer was shamefully in default with the work already intrusted to his hands; that he was indisposed or incapable of executing it as rapidly as the necessities of Congress required, and in the manner provided by his contract, would the committee have been excusable in intrusting to him a work of so much magnitude and importance as those reports? Sir, no prudent business man would have hesitated one minute to withhold it. Well, if he could not do it, and this was manifest, did not the law authorize the committee to have it done? It surely did. Has the gentleman from Indiana ever read the law? Were I to judge from the exhibition of intelligence which he has made here to-day upon the subject, I should say that he never read it in his life. What power is given to the committee by the law? A power to adopt such means as they may deem necessary. The law vests the discretion in the committee as to the mode of remedying the neglect or delay of the public printer in executing the work ordered by Congress. What more has the Committee on Printing attempted to do? They employed, under their discretion, competent men to do such of the work as the contractor could not or would not do. And this the gentleman from Indiana, in the bitterness of his spirit towards the committee, calls "trampling upon the law."

The gentleman has talked much and indignantly of coalitions formed by the committee between political editors of different parties. I have, upon another occasion, denied any purpose of that kind, so far as my own action was concerned. The honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Polk] has exculpated promptly his friends Donelson & Armstrong from any such charge, and I very cheerfully indorse what he has said. I know that from the beginning to the end, these gentlemen resisted any division of the work between themselves and the Republic; and if any political idea had controlled the action of the committee, such as the gentleman from Indiana intimates, I know these gentlemen well enough to say, that neither of them would have received a single dollar of the work upon such terms. But the gentleman's new-born zeal against coalitions is, to my mind, inexplicable. He startles as if thunder-struck, at the mere suggestion of so monstrous an outrage, as a coalition between the Union and the Republic, to obtain such of the public printing as the contractor cannot do. Great God! It was not always so with this zealous guardian of the public integrity. Two years ago, when Mr. McWillie, of Mississippi, then chairman of the Printing Committee, came into this House with a report, asking to release Mr. Ritchie from his ruinous contract, and to give to him and Gales & Seaton the public printing, where then was the indignation of the gentleman? How happens it that he, who is now so sensitive of the political honor of his party, remained silent, and did not rise from his seat and denounce that committee for proposing so unholy a combination or coalition? Was he silent because there existed then no motive, as there is now, for such heroic indignation?

Mr. FITCH. This is the first knowledge I have had of any such proposed coalition as the gentleman mentions.

Mr. STANTON. I have it here, and can read it to the gentleman from the original manuscript.

Mr. FITCH. It may be so; I do not deny it. But I can tell the gentleman how it happened I did not oppose it. There was no definite action probably had upon it, or I should have opposed it. So far from being a party to the origin of any such coalition, as is the case with the gentleman, I should have opposed it, as I do the one now under discussion. Whatever the gentleman may assert, I know that no proposal for such coalition as he mentions—and as he has made himself a party to—was long entertained by the last Congress, or any final action had relative to it. The gentleman will find no vote upon the subject. Hence, its arrayal here as argument or precedent in this case, is a species of pettyfogging which a township justice's court would rule inapplicable.

Mr. STANTON. The gentleman's zeal against coalition did not happen to be aroused at that time.

Mr. STANLY. Without intending to impeach the motives of my friend from Indiana, I will tell the gentleman from Kentucky, that he will find it about the time Mr. Ritchie complimented the gentleman from Indiana "as able, accomplished, and eloquent." [Laughter.]

Mr. STANTON. I thought there must have been some reason for his silence.

Mr. FITCH. I wish the gentleman from North Carolina would show me the compliment. I am as fond of compliments as himself, though not of the character of some he has received.

Mr. STANLY. I made a speech last session referring to it, and I will show it to the gentleman.

Mr. FITCH. The gentleman's speeches are always complimentary—to himself! if not to others.

Mr. STANTON. Another point in this controversy which disturbs the equanimity of the gentleman from Indiana, and has afforded him a wide field for the exercise of his peculiar characteristics, is the prices the committee have agreed to pay Donelson & Armstrong and Gideon & Co. for the work they may do. Now, Mr. Speaker, the resolutions to which I have referred, as part of the report of Mr. McWillie, and which the gentleman quietly permitted to be acted upon in the House, without any exhibition of rage, such as we have seen to-day, not only proposed to form a coalition between the leading Whig and Democratic organs in this city, but actually proposed to pay them not less than twenty-five per cent. higher than we shall have to pay Donelson & Armstrong and Gideon & Co.! Here, sir, are the resolutions in the handwriting of Mr. McWillie, of whom it may be said, a better Democrat, or a more high-toned gentleman, never occupied a seat upon this floor. I will read from the manuscript:

"Sec. 2. And be it further resolved, That Thomas Ritchie and Gales & Seaton be appointed by the two Houses to execute the printing contracted for by the said William M. Belt, for the remainder of the Thirty-first Congress, at the price of thirty-five per cent. reduction for short numbers, and forty-five per cent. reduction for numbers above five thousand on the prices of printing fixed by the joint resolution of the 3d March, 1819, and that the said Thomas Ritchie and Messrs. Gales & Seaton be required to give bond with good and sufficient securities," &c.

Here was a proposition to release William M. Belt and his securities from their contract—to abrogate it entirely. Not only to do this, but to form a coalition between adverse party organs, and give them very high prices, greatly beyond those provided for in the contract made with the Union and the Republic, which are at least fifty-five or sixty per cent. below the prices of 1819. The gentleman from Indiana saw nothing terrible in all this. He startled neither at the coalition nor the prices, but sat quietly in his seat, and permitted the report to be proposed to the House and acted upon. So little impression did it make upon his calm and placid mind, that the whole matter had, until now, faded from his recollection.

I maintain, sir, that the Joint Committee on Printing has, in no respect, transcended the plain requirements of the law. We have attempted, according to the best dictates of our judgments and consciences, to adhere to them in all respects. The duty imposed upon us by law was, to provide against the delinquency of the contractor, and "remedy his neglect and delay." The gentleman, in his excessive zeal to find fault with the committee, very absurdly denies that we have power to do what the law in such plain language commands. He assumes the ridiculous position, that no matter what may be the future "neglect or delay" of the contractor, if in any arrangement to protect Congress against present and past defaults of this kind, we provide for those to take place hereafter, we "trample upon the law," and transcend our powers. A most sage conclusion, truly, and worthy of the enlightened mind which makes it!

Suppose, at the commencement of the session, or now, the contractor should refuse to execute any of the work ordered by the House, and make no provision for it whatever; suppose it was apparent to all, that he was neither willing nor prepared to execute the various items of work as they were ordered each day by the House: what, under these circumstances, would be the duty of the committee? According to the learned exposition of the law, made by the astute gentleman from Indiana, we must quietly wait until a reasonable time has elapsed for him to execute the work, and then give out each single job as it arrives, after having afforded him an opportunity to do it, and make a new contract for every job to be done. That is the process, in the view of the honorable gentleman, which the law requires the committee to pursue. Is there another member of this House stupid enough to believe that such is the character of the law? It requires no such absurd procedure. Under the authority "to adopt such measures as may be deemed necessary to remedy the neglect and delay of the public printer," the committee are authorized to provide for prospective as well as past delinquencies, and there would be no wisdom in the law if such power were not given. The committee have not yet given any work to these men. We have only entered into such an engagement with them as the law authorized, to do that work which the contractor could not, or would not do. Such a contract is more economical and wiser than to let out each job as it occurs.

In this very report, to which we refer, we tell the House that it is a temporary expedient, intended to last only until the House shall take some action upon the subject, and relieve the committee from it. That is a matter which the gentleman overlooks. I have no design to put money in the hands of the Republic, for the purpose of enabling that paper the better to fight the Democratic party of the Union. I could have no design of that kind. All that I designed to do, and all that I believe any member of the committee designed to do, was to secure to this House and the Senate, that description of printing which they needed for legislative purposes, and which had been unnecessarily delayed by the public printer. We tried, as the House knows, and as the country knows, if the country pays any attention to this discussion, for two months, to give it to Donelson & Armstrong, but failed to do it; and we were compelled, as a last alternative, to take the Republic or have no printing done. The gentleman, too, complains about the prices, and says that we ought to have taken Towers's bid. We took Rives's bid, which, upon the printing yet to be done, was supposed by the committee to be lower than Towers's bid, but the contractors would not consent to receive those prices. To end the dispute, and to adopt a fair scale of prices which would afford a moderate and reasonable profit, we called upon three of the best printers in the city—practical men, who stood high in their profession as well as in the community as gentlemen—and asked them to submit to us an estimate of what would be reasonable prices. They did so, and their estimates were presented to the committee. That committee, after examining and comparing the three statements, found that John T. Towers's estimate was lower than all the rest, and that it is made upon business principles. There was no trick in it—no putting up one item high and another down low, to entitle him to the contract.

Every gentleman in this House knows how bids are made. Take up Mr. Rives's bid, for instance, when he desired to get the public printing, and you will see, that for some pages of printing he bid only two cents, while on others he charged $1 25. He put it down low upon some items, expecting to make up his loss upon others; and so it runs all through the bid. Such bids are not fair business estimates from which to make a scale of prices. We took Towers's estimate, because it was the lowest one submitted to us. The gentleman says it differs some fifteen or thirty per cent. from Towers's bid. Mr. Towers, I understand, did not say so. The whole difference, summing up the average of all, would not exceed five or ten per cent. over his bid provided all the work were done. You must recollect that there is only a remnant of the work to be done, and that only in small jobs. A man can afford to do a large quantity of work a great deal cheaper than he can a small one.

The gentleman has arraigned the committee for defying the instructions of the House, and says that we have set ourselves above it, and determined not to obey its orders. The gentleman misunderstands, or misrepresents us, when he makes such a charge. We do not place ourselves in any such position. We say, if such an enlightened gentleman will tell us how we can obey those instructions, we are willing to try and do it. I would be glad if he would point out the way in which we can obey them, organized and constituted as the Committee on Public Printing is. We were told to do—what? We were told by this House to advertise and let out the contract to the lowest bidder. The instructions were not to the three members of the House committee, although, I confess, if the House had instructed us, we would have felt bound, to the best of our ability, to obey the instructions, because we deemed ourselves at the time under the control of the House. The instructions went to the whole committee. Now, you tell the whole committee, the members of the Senate as well as of the House, to do a thing which they have no power to do under the circumstances, having already adopted the means required by the law, to remedy the evil provided against. You ask, by your resolutions of instruction, that these means, thus adopted, shall be abandoned, and others substituted. You instruct the joint committee to annul its contracts, and let out the work to the lowest bidder. The members of the Senate upon that committee, maintain that you have no jurisdiction over them, and they are not bound to obey your instructions. How can the three members of the House, acting alone, and without the concurrence of the three from the Senate, carry out your instructions so as to make them effective? The Senate members will not recognize your authority, and annul contracts made in pursuance of law, without the consent of the other parties to them. How are we three to do so?—and I trust the gentleman from Indiana will point out the mode. I hope that if he shall succeed me upon the committee, he will at least make an effort to carry the instructions into effect. Let him unite with the other members of the committee from the House, attach his name to an advertisement calling for bids, and insert it in the public papers. The Senate part of the committee will not act with you, and what would be the effect of your action? If any printer should think proper to send you proposals, what would you do with them? Could you make a contract that would be binding upon the Government, or valuable to the parties contracting with you? Most assuredly not; for it requires a majority of the whole committee to act, and your action would be neutralized by the votes of the members of the Senate.

I contend that the case is an analogous one to that of the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution. Under that law, which I have before me, it is provided that there shall be three Regents appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives and three by the Senate, who, with the Vice President and some one else, shall constitute the Board of Regents. That Board of Regents are instructed by this act to do certain things. Discretion is given to them to build houses. The manner in which these houses shall be built is pointed out. Does the gentleman pretend that we have a right to introduce resolutions instructing that Board of Regents to do differently from what the law authorizes them to do? I know the gentleman is not silly enough for that. I know, with all his disposition to distort, misrepresent, and change the character of the facts, that certainly he is not silly enough to stand up and assert such doctrine as this, that this House, without the concurrence of the Senate and President of the United States, could direct and control him in his conduct, and make him do what the law absolutely forbids him to do. He is a member of this House, as I am. I tell the gentleman, in the management of that institution, in the opinion of many, they have not only violated the law, but they have indulged in a ridiculous absurdity in the manner in which they have constructed the building, and that absurdity has been perpetuated in the manner in which they have given documents and publications to the world. Mr. Smithsonian, who bequeathed the funds to endow that institution, never designed that publications such as have been given to the world by its managers should be the only character of works disseminated by that establishment. The object of the institution was to diffuse useful knowledge amongst mankind, and works of more elementary and practical value were contemplated, if that were the mode he designed his intentions should be accomplished. Suppose this House should undertake to instruct that gentleman, and put a stop to such proceedings. Suppose this House were to undertake the ridiculous folly of instructing the whole of that Board, composed of the Vice President of the United States, the Mayor of the city of Washington, and several Senators, would the gentleman from Indiana think such instructions obligatory upon those gentlemen, and would he say that they were compelled to carry them out in violation of the law?

Mr. FITCH. I answer the gentleman with pleasure. But first, let me inform the gentleman, that notwithstanding his supercilious fluency about the silliness of any member, or even of the whole House, differing with him in opinion, and presuming to instruct him, or question the infallibility of his knowledge or his judgment, I shall venture to enlighten his understanding, or correct his obliquity of moral vision upon a subject upon which he professes to be well informed, and to speak "from the book." The Regents of the Smithsonian Institution have no control, and wish to exercise none, over its publications. They are in the charge of other officers of the Institution, by the side of whose intelligence and qualifications those of the gentleman [Mr. STANTON] would shine like a farthing candle under the glare of a bright noon-day sun. His judgment to be consulted as to the character of these publications!! Well, that is rich! But would we obey instructions if they were sent us by the House? I have already said "Yes." We acknowledge the right to send such instructions, and they would be obeyed. And I will tell the gentleman what we would not do. We would not ask the Senate portion and other members of the Board to agree in a declaration that the House could not instruct the entire Board, and cloak under that declaration our refusal—the refusal of the House Regents—to obey instructions, in order to permit us to persist in a plan upon which we had previously determined, in violation of the known wishes of the House, and of the law. We would not place such construction upon a law as to answer our own purposes, and then modestly place that construction in opposition to one entertained by the House, and tell them our construction or none must be acted on. I repeat, the House has the right to instruct its portion of the Regents relative to the care and disposition of the Smithsonian funds, and if they are likely to be squandered and wasted, to direct them to be applied in accordance with the law and its intention. And I do not believe the Regents are so wise in their own estimation as to esteem their opinion of the law and its intention as more valuable or more binding than that of the House.

Mr. STANTON. That is nothing more than we have done, and nothing more than we have reported to the House. We have told the House that we are willing to carry out the instructions, where it does not produce a violation of the law, and where we are not neutralized by a vote upon the other side of the Capitol of an equal number. But the gentleman from Indiana does not maintain that Senators would be bound by instructions from this House, or that they could reach the Vice President, Mayor, and others. I have detained the House long enough, and the only remark I will make in conclusion is this—

Mr. VENABLE. I wish to make only a single remark before the gentleman is through. It is simply to present the true state of facts in regard to the report from Mr. McWillie. I had a recollection of the facts as they occurred, and I find that I am right, for I went into the Library of Congress for the purpose of finding out what was the history of that transaction. I find that Mr. McWillie made the report. Democrats, unfortunately, like Whigs, do wrong sometimes. A proposition was made, the paper which he has before him, and came before the House. The subject was discussed and referred, but upon that proposition there has never been a vote. I wanted the history and records of the House, to show that whoever made that report made a blunder. I never would have voted for it.

A Voice. You ought to have said so at the time.

Mr. VENABLE. I never shoot at anything until the mark is before me, for it would be a waste of ammunition.

Mr. STANTON. I intended to say, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion—

Mr. VENABLE. Will the gentleman from Kentucky permit me to say, that I thought it important to say, in the investigation of this matter—a matter which I think it is important for the country to understand, and the House to come to a proper conclusion upon—that report was made by the chairman of the Committee on Printing, [Mr. McWILLIE,] which never met the approbation of the House, which was referred to the committee, and which never came back, and upon which this House never voted. I have hunted up the Journal, and I was satisfied that my memory was right upon the subject.

Mr. STANTON. All I designed to say about this report was, that it had been presented to the House by a distinguished Democrat not now a member. Although it contained a proposition similar to the one now proposed by the Committee on Printing, yet it had not attracted the attention of the honorable gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. FITCH,] and had been quietly referred to the committee, and permitted to pass off without exciting his indignation. All I intend to say now, in conclusion, is this: whether the House vote to sustain the law or not, I am conscious of having attempted honestly to perform my duty, and in no respect whatever, in connection with this matter, have I had any other object in view than to get the public printing done as speedily as possible. I am under obligations to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. POLK] to renew the motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the special order, and I do so accordingly.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of order. The question of order that I make is this: That the last resolution of this series is not in order, because it is not germane to the subject. The resolution proposes to dismiss the committee, and I submit that that is not germane to the subject.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will examine the resolution, and reserve its decision on the point of order, until the question shall arise.

Mr. STANTON. What is the motion now pending?

The SPEAKER. To go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the special order.

Mr. STANTON. When will this matter come up again, if we go into committee now?

The SPEAKER. It will be the first business in order in the House, just as a report from any other committee would be.

Mr. STANTON. And we adjourn over from tomorrow till Monday?

The SPEAKER. That is the order of the House, and the Chair presumes it will be executed.

Mr. STANTON. Then this resolution will not come up again for two weeks? I hope the House will not go into committee.

Mr. HOUSTON. You cannot dispose of the resolution to-day; so we may as well go into committee.

HOOR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Before we go into committee, I will state to the House that it has been usual, when the House adjourns over for the purpose of having the Hall refitted, to adjourn on the day preceding that fixed for the adjournment over, until eight o'clock the following morning, and then to adjourn immediately, so as to enable the hands to go to work at once, and clean the Hall. If there be no objection, I move that, when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet at eight o'clock to-morrow morning.

There being no objection, the motion was considered and agreed to.

ARRANGEMENT OF THE HALL.

Mr. MEACHAM. I rise to a privileged question. It is now agreed that we are to adjourn over from to-morrow till Monday next; and I desire to move, that when the Hall is rearranged, the chairs for members, which have been placed in the front area, and by the sides of the aisles, be removed. I have only to say that, for the last four months, I have had to travel round by the passage, outside the bar, to get to my seat, because the aisle leading to it has been blocked up with these chairs.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Well, it is very good exercise for you to travel round. [Laughter.]

Mr. POLK. I move to increase the gentleman's mileage, so as to allow him for this extra travel. [Renewed laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is out of order. The Chair is not inclined to regard the proposition of the gentleman from Vermont as a privileged question.

Mr. MEACHAM. I move, then, that the chairs be removed.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order.

Mr. STANLY. Is not a question in regard to a seat upon this floor a question of privilege? Can I have a chair put for me in the area, in front of the chairs which are already there?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that such a question is not one of privilege.

Mr. MEACHAM. How, then, is the evil to be remedied?

The SPEAKER. The proposition of the gentleman relates to the convenience of members—

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, (interrupting.) Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. Order! order! Only one gentleman can speak at a time.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, sir, who has the floor now?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has the floor. [Laughter.] This proposition relates to the convenience of members and the arrangement of the Hall; and, in the opinion of the Chair, it is not a question of privilege.

Mr. STANLY. I do not wish to appeal from the decision of the Chair; but suppose I have no seat here at all—that they are all occupied?

The SPEAKER. The Chair doubts very much whether it is not his duty to order those chairs to be removed. The Chair will think of it, however, as the proposition to remove them has been made.

Mr. MEACHAM. I wish to ask the Chair, how the evil can be corrected, if it is not a matter of privilege?

The SPEAKER. It can be corrected by a motion made in order, as any other proposition can be offered in regard to the building, or to the improvement of the Hall.

Mr. MEACHAM. Can I make the motion now?

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the gentleman cannot, and that this conversation is all out of order.

Mr. STANLY. When can the gentleman make the motion?

The SPEAKER. He can suspend the rules on Monday, or introduce it as a report, or as a bill, or in any of the forms known to our rules.

Mr. STANLY. In that way he can never get at it.

The SPEAKER. That is the fault of the rules, and the misfortune of the House.

Mr. HOUSTON. I insist on the vote being taken on the motion to go into committee.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I submit that all this conversation is out of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has decided that it is out of order.

Mr. ORR. I desire to express the opinion that it was the duty of the Speaker to have these chairs removed. They got in here without authority, and it is the duty of the Speaker to order the Doorkeeper to remove them.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I desire to say that I do not concur with the gentleman from South Carolina.

The SPEAKER. This conversation is not in order.

Mr. FOWLER. I wish to make an inquiry respecting this matter, and it is this—

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that any inquiry in regard to these chairs in the area is not in order.

Mr. FOWLER. Then I make another inquiry, and that is—

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Massachusetts rises to a question of order, he has a right to state it; otherwise, he is not in order.

Mr. FOWLER. I ask if it would not be in order for the gentlemen who occupy these seats in the area, to go and take the seats which they drew at the commencement of the session? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. It would be perfectly in order. [Laughter.]

Mr. STANLY. If I were to appeal from the decision of the Chair, would that open the door to debate upon this question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair believes that it would.

Mr. STANLY. I will spare the Speaker and the House, and not take an appeal. [A laugh.]

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I appeal from the decision of the Chair, and I do it for the purpose of saying, that when the motion comes up in order, to remove these chairs from the area—if such a motion shall be made—I shall move, as an amendment, to remove the desks from the Hall, which cause a portion of the members to be banished to a part of the House where they cannot hear, or participate in the proceedings.

[Cries of "Good!" "Good!"]

Mr. STANTON. That is all I have to say, and I now withdraw the appeal.

The appeal was withdrawn.

HOMESTEAD BILL.

The question now being upon the motion that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the special order—

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi, demanded tellers; which were ordered, and Messrs. BROWN, of Mississippi, and FOWLER were appointed.

The question was then put, and it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 79, noes 56.

The rules were accordingly suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. HIBBARD in the Chair.)

The CHAIRMAN stated as the business before the committee the consideration of the special order, being House bill No. 7, "For the encouragement of agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and for other purposes;" and that the pending question was on the substitute for the bill offered by Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi—[published in the proceedings of yesterday, and to be found in a subsequent part of this day's proceedings.]

Mr. STANLY. Is that amendment open to amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. STANLY. Will it be in order after that amendment is disposed of, to offer an amendment to the original bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it will.

Mr. STANLY. Then I will wait until that time.

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi, called for tellers on the amendment; which were ordered, and Messrs. APPLETON, of Maine, and MASON appointed.

The question was then put, and it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 67, noes 56.

So the amendment was agreed to as a substitute for the original bill.

Mr. STANLY. Is the amendment just adopted a substitute for the whole bill?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. STANLY. Will it be in order to amend the bill as amended?

Mr. HOUSTON. The substitute has been adopted by the committee, and cannot be amended.

Mr. STANLY. That is the question. I want to offer an amendment, as an additional section to the bill as amended.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment to strike out any part of the substitute is not in order; but it is the opinion of the Chair that an amendment, as an additional section, is in order.

Mr. MASON. I understand that no amendment can be offered. I move that the committee rise and report the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that an amendment is in order, as an additional section.

Mr. MASON. I appeal from that decision.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that as the substitute has been adopted by the committee, that no motion to strike out any portion of it could be entertained, but the Chair is inclined to the opinion that the committee may add to it.

Mr. HOUSTON. Does the chair decide that the substitute just adopted by the committee, is subject to amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that no part of it can be stricken out, but that an additional section may be added.

Mr. HOUSTON. The Chair will remember that there is a rule of the House, which governs the committee, which authorizes the friends of a bill to perfect a bill, before a motion can be entertained to strike it out. The same rule authorizes the friends of the substitute proposed to be offered, to perfect it before the vote can be taken to strike out and insert. But after that vote has been taken, the proposition is then beyond the power of the committee, because the friends both of the original proposition and that proposed to be substituted, have had the opportunity to render their respective propositions perfect before the vote was taken.

Mr. STANLY. The Chair will remember that before the vote was taken, by which the substitute was adopted, I proposed to offer an amendment, but was informed by the Chair, that I could offer it after the substitute had been disposed of, and on that account I neglected, at that time, to offer it.

The CHAIRMAN. It was the opinion of the Chair, and he is still of the same opinion, that the original bill, if the substitute were voted down, would be amendable; and that the substitute, if adopted, would be amendable by addition. He recollects of no usage in committee upon a similar question. That is his impression, however; but he would be happy for an appeal to be taken, in order to test the sense of the committee upon the question.

Mr. HOUSTON. For that reason, and not out of any opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLY,] for I do not know what his amendment is, I take an appeal from the decision of the Chair. If that decision be adopted, it makes an unending struggle to get through with the business, and the committee would never come to a conclusion upon the subject.

Mr. STANLY. Then, as I understand it, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] does not object to my amendment as a question of order.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not object to the gentleman's amendment at all, for I do not know what it is. I only said that, in my opinion, the bill, in its present form, was not amendable.

Mr. STANLY. But the gentleman raises the objection, not because it is a violation of the rules of the House—

Mr. HOUSTON. Certainly I did object for precisely that reason.

Mr. STANLY. I understood the gentleman to object because it would be an unending business. Now, Mr. Chairman, I object to this mode of choking off amendments unfairly. I ask the Chair if he does not remember that I put the question to him, before this substitute was adopted, to know if it would be in order to offer an amendment after the substitute was adopted, to which he replied in the affirmative? I now want to know how many decisions shall I have before I have an opportunity to offer my amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is not debatable. The Chair, however, has been happy to hear suggestions relative to the point of order. The gentleman from North Carolina moves to amend the amendment by adding a section. To this the objection is made that the amendment is not in order. The Chair decides that the amendment is in order. From that decision the gentleman from Alabama appeals, and the question now is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

Mr. STANLY. I hope my amendment will be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has a right to have his amendment read.

The Clerk then read the amendment, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That any person who is the head of a family, residing in any State in which there is no land belonging to the United States, who is not worth the sum of $500, shall, from and after the passage of this act, be entitled to enter, by his or her agent, free of cost, one hundred and sixty acres of land: Provided, said person shall make oath of his or her intention to occupy or reside on said land within — years from the time of entering the same.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I desire to inquire of the Chair if the question has been taken on striking out the entire bill, and inserting in lieu of it the substitute of the gentleman from Mississippi?

The CHAIRMAN. It has.

Mr. STEPHENS. Then the proposition of the gentleman from North Carolina is to amend what has been inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. The proposition of the gentleman from North Carolina is not to strike out any portion of the amendment, but to add to the substitute.

Mr. STEPHENS. That is clearly out of order.

Mr. STANLY. If it is in order, I move to strike out the whole amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order to move to strike out anything the committee has inserted.

The question was then put, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?" and the Chair announced the state of the vote as follows—ayes 64, noes 59.

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi. I ask for tellers.

Mr. STANLY. It is too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that it is not too late to call for tellers. The Chair had stated the vote, but had not announced the decision when tellers were demanded.

Mr. STANLY. I appeal from that decision.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks an appeal cannot be taken at this time.

Mr. STANLY. I appeal from that decision.

[Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina is out of order.

Tellers were then ordered on the appeal.

Mr. STANLY. Is it in order to say that I was misled by the Chair in offering this amendment? I put the question to the Chair, and he answered very distinctly, that after the vote had been taken upon the adoption of the substitute of the gentleman from Mississippi, it would be in order to offer an amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. As far as I am concerned, if the committee—

Mr. HALL. I call the gentleman from Alabama to order.

Mr. HOUSTON. I only desire to say that I would be perfectly willing to vote upon the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, if the rules did not prohibit him from offering it.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope it may be offered by general consent.

[Loud cries of "Object!" "Object!"]

Mr. GORMAN. I understand there is no quorum present; I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. It has not been shown that there is no quorum present.

Mr. GORMAN. Well, I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was put, and it was decided in the negative.

So the committee refused to rise.

Messrs. OLDS and HALL were appointed tellers; and the question being again put, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee," it was decided in the negative—ayes 63, noes 64.

So the decision of the Chair was overruled, and Mr. STANLY's amendment was decided to be out of order.

Mr. MASON. I move that the committee rise and report the bill.

Mr. STANLY. Does the Chair sustain his own decision?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that if his own vote is added, it would not change the result.

Mr. JONES. If the Chair adds his vote to the affirmative, it would be a tie—64 to 64, and the decision would not be overruled.

The CHAIRMAN. The burden of getting a majority is with the affirmative, in the opinion of the Chair. The vote is—ayes 63, noes 64, and the decision of the Chair is overruled.

Mr. STANLY. I rise to a question of order. A number of names were included in the count after the tellers had reported, and so great was the confusion that there has been no fair count. I ask for a recount.

Mr. HALL. I will state that after one of the tellers left, certain votes were given in. I think there ought, in justice, to be a recount.

Mr. STANLY. If the amendment is right the House can vote for it; if not, they can vote it down.

Objection was made to a recount.

Mr. STANLY. I object to that. The House is to say whether there shall be a recount or not. It is not the right of one member to overrule the wish of the House in such a matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that after a vote has been taken, and the decision announced, there cannot be a recount except by unanimous consent.

Mr. McMULLIN. I hope that unanimous consent will be given for a recount.

Mr. DAWSON. I object.

Mr. STANLY. I rise to a privileged question.

Gentlemen rise up here and say they were not counted—

Mr. MILLER. I hope there will be a recount. I desire to vote myself. I will state, as my colleague, [Mr. HALL,] who was one of the tellers, stated, that some votes were announced after the tellers had separated, and I asked one of the tellers myself—the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. OLDS]—to announce my vote in the affirmative. And the gentleman told me it was too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must remind the gentleman that a recount was requested by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLY.] The Chair announced that if there was an unanimous consent, there could be a recount. Objection was made, and the Chair decided that it required unanimous consent after the vote was announced. Is there an appeal taken from that decision?

Mr. TOOMBS. I appeal from that decision.

The CHAIRMAN. Is an appeal taken from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. STANLY. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TOOMBS] appeals.

Mr. BROWN. I trust, after the representation of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. MILLER,] that no one will object to a recount. If there was a mistake, there ought to be a recount.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, made some remarks, totally inaudible to the reporter.

Mr. STANLY responded in an equally inaudible tone.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is not debatable.

Mr. STANLY. We will see what the courtesy of the House will do.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a question of order, on which an appeal lies from the decision of the Chair. The decision of the Chair is, that after the decision has been announced, it requires unanimous consent for a recount. The question is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

Tellers were then demanded and ordered.

Mr. HART. Will the Chair state the question before the vote is taken?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the question. A recount upon the vote just taken was demanded. The Chair decided that there could be no recount after the vote was taken and announced, except by unanimous consent. From that decision an appeal is taken.

Mr. STANLY. I beg pardon, but the Chair has not stated the whole question. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MILLER] stated that he desired to vote, but that his vote was not announced in the confusion. The Chair will remember the statement that some votes were handed in after the tellers were separated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the question before the committee is as he has stated it. The statement of the gentleman from North Carolina may, at the same time, be correct.

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish barely to appeal to the committee, to allow the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] to offer his amendment, without overruling the decision of the Chair. He was misled, as he states, and while a majority of the committee have felt it their duty to vote as they have, I hope they will allow the amendment to come in by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is now in the act of dividing the committee, and the Chair must request gentlemen to suspend remarks until the vote is taken. Upon the appeal tellers have been ordered.

Messrs. HOUSTON and OLDS were appointed tellers; and the question being taken, the tellers reported—ayes 80, noes 63.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. STANLY. I have another amendment to offer. I move the same amendment ruled out of order, inserting in the blank the word "two."

Mr. MASON. I was entitled to the floor, being first recognized by the Chair, and the gentleman has no right to take it from me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MASON. I move that the committee rise, and report the bill to the House. I decide that it is out of order to move now an amendment to the bill. I think it is clearly right and proper that the committee should now rise, and the bill be reported to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the committee to have decided that it is out of order further to amend the bill, unless by unanimous consent. Therefore no amendment can be received.

Mr. HOUSTON. I trust that unanimous consent will be granted the gentleman to introduce his amendment.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I presume no one will object to the suggestion of the gentleman from Alabama, of having a vote upon my colleague's amendment. It will take but a short time to dispose of it. He was misled by a remark of the Chair, or his amendment would have been previously presented. No one, I presume, will object to its now being introduced, and the vote of the committee being taken upon it.

[Cries of "I object!" "I object!"]

Mr. CLARK. I desire to offer an amendment, and ask that it be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Amendments are not in order.

Mr. CLARK. After it is reported, I intend taking an appeal from the decision of the Chair. I do not see how I can take an appeal until it is read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that, under the ruling of the committee reversing the decision of the Chair, no amendment to the bill is now in order.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The gentleman from North Carolina wanted a fair count. He can appeal from the decision of the Chair, and there will then be had a count that will satisfy the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. There was an appeal, and the decision of the Chair was sustained by the committee.

Mr. STEPHENS. But he has now offered his amendment in a modified form. I submit that the gentleman can appeal from the decision of the Chair upon the amendment he has now offered.

Mr. STANLY. I wish to interpose no difficulty to action upon this bill, but will proceed, with the courtesy of the committee, to make my five minutes' speech. I do not wish to take an appeal, I desire only to make a five minutes' explanation upon the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate at this stage of the proceedings is out of order. The Chair begs leave to state that he understood the gentleman to inquire of the Chair whether, if the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BROWN] was not adopted, his amendment would be in order. The Chair told him that he thought it would be in order. The gentleman from North Carolina will further remember, that the ruling of the Chair was, that his amendment would be in order after that of the gentleman from Mississippi was adopted, but the committee overruled the decision of the Chair, and virtually ruled that no further amendment would be in order. The Chair thinks, therefore, he cannot receive any other amendment.

Mr. STANLY. I beg the Chair's pardon. The House has not decided that no further amendment is in order, and they have had no such question before them.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand the committee to decide in terms that no further amendment was in order; but he understood the ground upon which the committee decided the former amendment out of order, to be that the substitute already adopted was not amendable. That was, in effect, a decision of the question upon the amendment now offered, and he deemed himself bound by the action of the committee so to rule.

Mr. STANLY. I object to the inference of the Chair. I present my amendment with "two" inserted in the blank, and demand a vote of the committee upon it.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is the point I made for the Chair's decision—that no amendment was now in order.

The CHAIRMAN. It is the opinion of the Chair that the amendment cannot be now received. Does the gentleman take an appeal.

Mr. STANLY. Most decidedly. It is a decision I never heard of before.

The Clerk then read Mr. STANLY's amendment, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That any person who is the head of a family, residing in any State in which there is no land belonging to the United States, who is not worth the sum of $500, shall, from and after the passage of this act, be entitled to enter, by his or her agent, free of cost, one hundred and sixty acres of land: Provided, said person shall make oath of his or her intention to occupy or reside on said land within two years from the time of entering the same.

Mr. STANLY. I wish that amendment received, and to submit a few words on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has decided that the amendment is not in order, and from that decision an appeal has been taken by the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. STANLY. What is the Chair's ground for his decision?

The CHAIRMAN. That the committee have virtually decided that amendments are not now in order.

Mr. STANLY. I appeal virtually from that decision. [Laughter.]

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I will, with the Chair's permission, ask him a question: Suppose this substitute, instead of being adopted in lieu of the original bill, it had been rejected by the committee, would it not then have been competent for the committee to have attached additional sections by way of amendments to the original bill? Then, if that is so—

Mr. HOUSTON. I object to this debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is not debatable.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I demand tellers on the appeal.

Tellers were ordered, and Messrs. THOMPSON, of Virginia, and STEPHENS, of Georgia, were appointed.

The question was then put—"Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"—and it was agreed to; the tellers having reported—ayes 81, noes 51.

And the decision of the Chair was sustained.

The question then recurred upon the motion of Mr. MASON, that the committee rise and report the bill, and it was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman (Mr. HIBBARD) reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly House bill No. 7, being a bill to encourage agriculture, commerce, &c., and had directed him to report the said bill, with an amendment, to the House.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I have an amendment which I wish to offer in lieu of the amendment adopted by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I will send it to the Clerk's desk to be read, and upon it I ask for the previous question:

That any person who is the head of a family, and citizen of the United States, or any person who is the head of a family, and had become a citizen prior to the first day of January, eighteen hundred and fifty-two, as required by the naturalization laws of the United States, shall, from and after the passage of this act, be entitled to enter, free of cost, one quarter section of vacant and unappropriated public lands, or a quantity equal thereto, to be located in a body in conformity with the legal subdivisions of the public lands, and after the same shall have been surveyed.

*Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the person applying for the benefit of this act shall, upon application to the register of the land office in which he or she is about to make such entry, make affidavit before the said register, that he or she is the head of a family, and is not the owner of any estate in land, at the time of such application, and has not disposed of any estate in land, to obtain the benefits of this act; and upon making the affidavit as above required, and filing the affidavit with the register, he or she shall thereupon be permitted to enter the quantity of land already specified: *Provided, however, That no certificate shall be given or patent issued therefor until the expiration of five years from the date of such entry; and if, at the expiration of such time, the person making such entry, or if he be dead, his widow, or in case of her death, his heirs or devisee, or in case of a widow making such entry, her heirs or devisee in case of her death, shall prove by two credible witnesses, that he, she, or they have continued to reside upon and cultivate said land, and still reside upon the same, and have not alienated the same, or any part thereof, then in such case, he, she, or they shall be entitled to a patent as in other cases provided for by law: *And provided further, In case of the death of both father and mother, leaving an infant child or children, under fourteen years of age, the right and the fee shall inure to the benefit of said infant child or children, and the executor, administrator, or guardian, may at any time within two years after the death of the surviving parent, sell said land for the benefit of said infants, but for no other purpose, and the purchaser shall acquire the absolute title by the purchase, and be entitled to a patent from the United States.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the register of the land office shall note all such applications on the tract books and plats of his office, and keep a register of all such entries, and make return thereof to the General Land Office, together with the proof upon which they have been founded.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That all land acquired under the provisions of this act shall, in no event, become liable to the satisfaction of any debt or debts contracted prior to the issuing the patent therefor.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That if, at any time after filing the affidavit as required in the second section of this act, and before the expiration of the five years aforesaid, it shall be proven by two or more respectable witnesses upon oath to the satisfaction of the register of the land office, that the person having filed such affidavit shall have actually changed his or her residence, or abandoned the said entry for more than six months at any one time, then and in that event the land so entered shall revert back to the Government, and be disposed of as other public lands are now by law.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That if any individual now a resident of any one of the States or Territories, and not a citizen of the United States, but at the time of making such application for the benefit of this act, shall have filed a declaration of intention, as required by the naturalization laws of the United States, and shall become a citizen of the same before the issuance of the patent, as made and provided for in this act, shall be placed upon an equal footing with the native-born citizens of the United States.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That no individual shall be permitted to make more than one entry under the provisions of this act; and that the Commissioner of the General Land Office is hereby required with this act, as shall be necessary and proper to carry its provisions into effect; and that the registers and receivers of the several land offices shall be entitled to receive the same compensation for any lands patented under the provisions of this act, that they are now entitled to receive when the same quantity of land is entered with money, to be paid by the party to whom the patent shall be issued: Provided, however, That all persons entering land under the provisions of this act, shall, as near as may be practicable, in making such entries, be confined to each alternate quarter section, and to land subject to private entry: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to impair or interfere in any manner whatever with existing preemption rights.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi. I wish to ascertain in what way the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JOHNSON] offers his amendment. Is it in lieu of the entire amendment adopted by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

Mr. JOHNSON. I offer it in lieu of the entire amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JOHNSON,] proposes to strike out all of the amendment adopted by the committee from the word "that" in the first line, and insert what has been read.

Mr. BROWN. I ask the yeas and nays.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish, for my own information, and probably that of some others, to inquire of my colleague [Mr. JOHNSON] if his bill, if amended, which he proposes in lieu of that adopted by the Committee of the Whole, is substantially what the original bill would be with the amendments made in Committee of the Whole before it was stricken out?

Mr. JOHNSON. Substantially the same, but decidedly improved. [Laughter.]

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I desire to propound an interrogatory to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JOHNSON,] in relation to the amendment.

[Cries of "I object!" "I object!" from several members.]

Mr. EVANS. The courtesy was extended to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JOHNSON.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be happy to extend the courtesy to others, but it was objected to upon the right of the Chair.

Mr. McMULLIN. I move that the House adjourn.

[Cries of "No!" "No!" "No!" from all parts of the Hall.]

Mr. CLINGMAN demanded tellers; which were ordered.

The question was then taken, (Messrs. CLINGMAN, and JONES of Tennessee, acting as tellers,) and there were—yeas 52, noes 81.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question was then put on the amendment to the amendment, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 97, nays 77; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Charles Allen, Willis Allen, Babcock, Bartlett, Briggs, Brooks, Buell, Busby, E. Harris, Hascall, Hebard, Hibbard, Holladay, Horsford, John W. Howe, Thomas Y. How, Jackson, Daniel T. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Kurtz, Landry, Letcher, Mann, Humphrey Marshall, Martin, Mason, McCorkle, McLanahan, McMullin, McQueen, Millson, Miner, Morehead, Murphy, Orr, Outlaw, Peaslee, Penningman, Perkins, Phelps, Ross, Scurry, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Snow, Abraham P. Stevens, Alexander H. Stephens, Strother, Taylor, Tuck, Wallace, Washburn, Welch, Wildrick, and Woodward—77.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Pending the call of the roll, Mr. HOWARD stated that he had paired off upon this bill with Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, moved to reconsider the vote just taken, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. STANLY. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will allow me to say a word upon the question of reconsideration.

[Cries of "No!" "No!" "No!"

The SPEAKER. It would require the unanimous consent of the House.

[Loud cries of "Object!"

Mr. LETCHER called for the yeas and nays on the motion to reconsider.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then put, and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

Mr. CLINGMAN moved that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. LETCHER called for the yeas and nays on that motion; but they were not ordered.

Mr. LETCHER demanded tellers; and they were not ordered.

The question was then put, and on a division there were—yeas 86, noes 86; the Speaker voted in the negative.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. JENKINS moved to lay the bill upon the table; and on that motion he asked the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. St. MARTIN moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. POLK demanded the yeas and nays; but they were not ordered.

Mr. St. MARTIN withdrew the motion to adjourn.

Mr. ORR renewed it.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois, called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

[A message was received from the Senate, by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, Esq., its Secretary.]

The question was then put on Mr. ORR's motion to adjourn, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 74, nays 95; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, John Appleton, Averett, David J. Bailey, Thomas H. Bayly, Barrere, Beale, Bell, Bocock, Bragg, Breckinridge, George H. Brown, Buell, Burrows, Chapman, Chastain, Clark, Clingman, Colcock, Conger, George T. Davis, Dockery, Duncan, Edmundson, Evans, Faulkner, Floyd, Henry M. Fuller, Thomas J. D. How, Ingersoll, Andrew Johnson, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Kurtz, Lockhart, Mace, Edward C. Marshall, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, McCorkle, McMullin, McQueen, Millson, Miner, Morehead, Murphy, Orr, Outlaw, Peaslee, Penningman, Perkins, Phelps, Ross, Scurry, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Snow, Abraham P. Stevens, Alexander H. Stephens, Strother, Taylor, Tuck, Wallace, Washburn, Welch, Wildrick, Williams, and Woodward—95.

lin, McNair, Molony, Henry D. Moore, John Moore, Newton, Olds, Samuel W. Parker, Peaslee, Penn, Penningman, Perkins, Phelps, Polk, Porter, Richardson, Robbins, Robinson, Savage, Schoolcraft, Scurry, Skelton, Smith, Snow, Benjamin Stanton, Stratton, George W. Thompson, Thurston, Townshend, Walbridge, Ward, Watkins, Addison White, Alexander White, and Yates—95.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question was then put on Mr. JENKINS's motion, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 57, nays 112; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, John Appleton, Averett, David J. Bailey, Thomas H. Bayly, Beale, Bell, Bocock, Bragg, Breckinridge, George H. Brown, Burrows, Caskie, Chastain, Clark, Clingman, Colcock, Conger, Dockery, Duncan, Edmundson, Evans, Faulkner, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Hamilton, Harper, Isham G. Harris, Hebard, Hibbard, Holladay, Horsford, Thos. Y. How, Jackson, Jenkins, Preston King, Landry, Letcher, Humphrey Marshall, Martin, McQueen, Millson, Morehead, Orr, Outlaw, Peaslee, Ross, Scurry, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Snow, Strother, Wallace, Washburn, Welch, Wildrick, and Woodward—57.

NAYS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Charles Allen, Willis Allen, Allison, Babcock, Bartlett, Bissell, Briggs, Brooks, Albert G. Brown, Buell, Busby, Joseph Cable, Thompson Campbell, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Churchillwell, Cleveland, Cobb, Cottman, Cullom, Curtis, Geo. T. Davis, John G. Davis, Dawson, Disney, Doty, Durkee, Eastman, Ewing, Ficklin, Fitch, Florence, Floyd, Fowler, Gamble, Gaylord, Gentry, Giddings, Goodrich, Gorman, Green, Grey, Grow, Hall, Sampson W. Harris, Hascall, Henn, Houston, John W. Howe, Ingersoll, Ives, Andrew Johnson, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Kurtz, Lockhart, Mace, Mann, Edward C. Marshall, Mason, McCorkle, McMullin, McNair, Miller, Miner, Molony, Henry D. Moore, John Moore, Newton, Olds, Sam'l W. Parker, Penn, Penningman, Perkins, Phelps, Polk, Porter, Richardson, Riddle, Robbins, Robinson, Sackett, Savage, Schoolcraft, Skelton, Smith, Stanly, Benjamin Stanton, Frederick P. Stanton, Abraham P. Stevens, Stone, St. Martin, Stratton, Taylor, Geo. W. Thompson, Thurston, Townshend, Tuck, Walbridge, Walsh, Ward, Watkins, Addison White, Alexander White, Williams, and Yates—112.

So the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. MOREHEAD moved that the House adjourn, and on that motion he asked for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then put, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 70, nays 86; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Allison, Averett, Barrere, Beale, Bell, Bocock, Bragg, Breckinridge, Brooks, George H. Brown, Buell, Burrows, Chapman, Chastain, Clark, Colcock, Conger, George T. Davis, Dockery, Duncan, Edmundson, Evans, Floyd, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gamble, Gentry, Goodrich, Grey, Hamilton, Harper, Isham G. Harris, Sampson W. Harris, Hebard, Holladay, Thomas Y. How, Ives, Jackson, Jenkins, Preston King, Landry, Letcher, Mann, Mason, McQueen, Meacham, Miller, Millson, Miner, Morehead, Murphy, Orr, Outlaw, Riddle, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Snow, Stanly, Frederick P. Stanton, Ab'm P. Stevens, Taylor, Tuck, Wallace, Walsh, Washburn, Welch, Alexander White, Wildrick, Williams, and Woodward—70.

NAYS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Charles Allen, Willis Allen, John Appleton, Babcock, Thomas H. Bayly, Bartlett, Bissell, Briggs, Albert G. Brown, Busby, Joseph Cable, Thompson Campbell, Carter, Caskie, Chandler, Churchillwell, Cleveland, Cobb, Cottman, Cullom, Curtis, John G. Davis, Dawson, Disney, Doty, Durkee, Eastman, Ewing, Ficklin, Fitch, Florence, Fowler, Gaylord, Giddings, Gorman, Green, Grow, Hall, Hendricks, Henn, Hibbard, Houston, John W. Howe, Ingersoll, Andrew Johnson, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, George W. Jones, Kurtz, Lockhart, Mace, Edward C. Marshall, McCorkle, McMullin, McNair, Molony, Henry D. Moore, Newton, Olds, Samuel W. Parker, Peaslee, Penn, Penningman, Phelps, Polk, Richardson, Robbins, Robinson, Sackett, Savage, Schoolcraft, Skelton, Smith, Benjamin Stanton, Stone, St. Martin, Stratton, George W. Thompson, Thurston, Townshend, Walbridge, Ward, Watkins, Addison White, and Yates—86.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question now being upon the adoption of the amendment as amended—

Mr. MOREHEAD called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. STANLY. Is it in order for me to ask to be excused from voting and to assign my reasons?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order, under an express rule of the House. It used to be in order, but it is not now.

Mr. STANLY. What is the rule?

The SPEAKER. The rule was repealed or changed. But even were that not the case, the Chair thinks it would scarcely be in order now, the previous question being in operation.

Mr. STANLY. I merely want to assign my reasons, that my constituents may know them.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman desires it, the Chair will turn to the rule.

Mr. STANLY. Oh, no; I do not doubt that it is so.

The question was now put, and the result was—yeas 108, nays 57; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Abercrombie, Charles Allen, Willis Allen, Allison, Babcock, David J. Bailey, Bartlett, Bissell, Briggs, Brooks, Albert G. Brown, Buell, Busby, Joseph Cable, Thompson Campbell, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Churchwell, Cleveland, Cobb, Cottman, Curtis, George T. Davis, John G. Davis, Dawson, Disney, Doty, Durkee, Eastman, Ewing, Ficklin, Fitch, Florence, Floyd, Fowler, Gamble, Gaylord, Gentry, Giddings, Goodrich, Gorman, Green, Greg, Grow, Hall, Sampson W. Harris, Hascall, Hendricks, Henn, Horsford, Houston, Ingersoll, Ives, Andrew Johnson, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, Kurtz, Lockart, Mace, Mann, Edward C. Marshall, McMullin, McNair, Meacham, Miller, Molony, Henry D. Moore, John Moore, Newton, Olds, Samuel W. Parker, Penn, Penniman, Phelps, Polk, Porter, Richardson, Riddle, Robbins, Robinson, Sackett, Savage, Schoolcraft, Skelton, Smith, Snow, Stanly, Benjamin Stanton, Abraham P. Stevens, Stone, St. Martin, Stratton, George W. Thompson, Thurston, Townshend, Tuck, Walbridge, Walsh, Ward, Watkins, Addison White, Alexander White, Williams, and Yates—108.

NAYS.—Messrs. William Aiken, John Appleton, Averett, Thomas H. Bayly, Barrere, Beale, Bell, Bocoek, Bragg, Breckinridge, George H. Brown, Burrows, Caskie, Chastain, Clark, Colcock, Conger, Dockery, Duncan, Edmundson, Evans, Faulkner, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Hamilton, Harper, Isham G. Harris, Hibbard, Holladay, John W. Howe, Thomas Y. How, Jackson, Jenkins, Preston King, Landry, Letcher, Martin, Mason, McQueen, Millson, Morehead, Orr, Outlaw, Peaslee, Perkins, Powell, Ross, Scurry, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Strother, Taylor, Wallace, Washburn, Welch, Wildrick, and Woodward—57.

So the amendment as amended was adopted.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move that the vote just taken, by which the amendment as amended was adopted, be reconsidered, and that the motion to reconsider do lie upon the table.

The question was put, and the latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I move that the House do now adjourn.

[Cries of "No!" "No!" "No!"]

The question was taken, and the House refused to adjourn—ayes 71, noes 90.

Mr. EVANS. I call for the yeas and nays upon the motion to adjourn.

[Cries of "Too late!"]

Mr. EVANS. Very well, then; I will call for the yeas and nays on the final passage of the bill.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time; and, having been engrossed, it was read the third time.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I move that the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, be reconsidered; and that the motion to reconsider do lie upon the table.

The question was put, and the latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I ask that the bill may be read through.

The bill was then read through.

The question now being, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question received a second, and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. EVANS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STANLY. I wish to call the attention of the Chair to the forty-second rule. I apologize to the House for troubling it again, after what occurred in the committee. However, I do not desire to go into that matter. I call the attention of the House to the forty-second rule, and submit if I have not a right to assign a special reason for asking to be excused from voting?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from North Carolina be good enough to read the rule?

Mr. STANLY. Certainly, I will. It is as follows:

"Every member who shall be in the House when the question is put, shall give his vote, unless the House, for special reasons, shall excuse him. All motions to excuse members from voting, shall be made before the House divides, or before the call of the yeas and nays is commenced; the question shall then be taken without further debate."

The SPEAKER. But the question is with regard to special reasons.

Mr. STANLY. The note which is appended to the forty-second rule says:

"That part of rule forty-second which allowed a brief verbal statement of reasons to be given by any member for requesting to be excused from voting, rescinded January 2d, 1845."—Journal House of Reps., page 115.

There is some error here, for there is no such thing upon that Journal, nor at that date. Now I want to know, with all due respect to the Chair, how it is that a member shall be excused from voting for a special reason without having an opportunity to give that reason?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that the gentleman may state—but it must be a mere statement—his special reason for wishing to be excused from voting. Whatever may have been the action of this body in repealing the original rule upon the subject, the rule, taken as it now stands, in the judgment of the Chair, gives the gentleman from North Carolina a right to state his special reason, but not to debate the subject at all.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. That note is certainly wrong. There was a provision in that rule which authorized a member, when he asked to be excused, briefly to state his reasons. That was repealed by the House, but not in 1845. If I mistake not it was during the Thirtieth Congress. I know that part was stricken out, and after that a member could only only ask to be excused, without assigning any reason.

Mr. STANLY. That is no doubt true.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that under the existing rule the gentleman from North Carolina has the right to state a special reason, or special reasons, for asking the House to excuse him. That is the construction given by the Chair to the rule. The Chair does not remember what the practice of the last Congress was, but he is inclined to think the facts are as the gentleman from Tennessee has stated them.

Mr. STANLY. I desire to give a special reason for asking to be excused from voting. I will merely say, in order that it may be understood by my constituents, that I offered an amendment this morning to this bill, as I thought in order, in committee, and it was ruled to be in order by the gentleman who occupied the chair at that time. I consulted him previously, and he decided it to be in order. I was led into error by that decision—no doubt unintentionally on the part of the Chair—and was precluded from offering my amendment. My purpose was to show my constituents why it was the bill was in such a form that I could not vote for it. I desire further to say, that it may go upon the Journal, that I shall vote against the bill under the instructions of my own constituents, and of the Whig State convention which recently met in North Carolina. I could not get an opportunity of saying this in committee, or I should not have troubled the House now. I would, if I had had a chance, have said a word to compliment my friend from Tennessee, [Mr. JOHNSON,] but the committee refused me.

The SPEAKER. At the second session of the Twenty-ninth Congress the amendment referred to was made to the forty-second rule. It is, "that 'so much of the phraseology of the forty-second rule as permits any member requesting to be excused from voting to make a brief verbal statement of his reasons for making such request be, and the same is hereby, rescinded.'"

Mr. STANLY. I withdraw my request.

Mr. CLARK. Will it be in order for me to give a reason for the vote I am about to give?

The SPEAKER. Not except by unanimous consent.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object.

Mr. CLARK. Then I shall be compelled to vote "aye." [Laughter.]

The question was then put, "Shall the bill pass?" and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 107, nays 56; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Abercrombie, Charles Allen, Willis Allen, Allison, Babcock, Bartlett, Bissell, Briggs, Brooks, Albert G. Brown, Buell, Busby, Joseph Cable, Thompson Campbell, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Churchwell, Clark, Cleveland, Cobb, Cottman, Cullom, Curtis, George T. Davis, John G. Davis, Dawson, Disney, Doty, Durkee, Eastman, Ewing, Ficklin, Fitch, Florence, Floyd, Fowler, Gamble, Gaylord, Gentry, Giddings, Goodrich, Gorman, Green, Grey, Grow, Hall, Sampson W. Harris, Hascall, Hendricks, Henn, Houston, Ingersoll, Ives, Andrew Johnson, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, George W. Jones, Kurtz, Lockhart, Mace, Edward C. Marshall, McMullin, McNair, Meacham, Miller, Molony, Henry D. Moore, John Moore, Newton, Olds, Samuel W. Parker, Penn, Penniman, Perkins, Phelps, Polk, Porter, Richardson, Riddle, Robbins, Robinson, Sackett, Savage, Schoolcraft, David L. Seymour, Skelton, Smith, Snow, Benjamin Stanton, Frederick P. Stanton, Abraham P. Stevens, Stone, St. Martin, Stratton, George W. Thompson, Thurston, Townshend, Tuck, Walbridge, Walsh, Ward, Watkins, Addison White, Alexander White, Williams, and Yates—107.

NAYS.—Messrs. Aiken, John Appleton, Averett, David J. Bailey, Thomas H. Bayly, Barrere, Beale, Bell, Bocoek, Bragg, Breckinridge, George H. Brown, Burrows, Caskie, Chastain, Clingman, Colcock, Conger, Dockery, Duncan, Edmundson, Evans, Faulkner, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Hamilton, Harper, Isham G. Harris, Hibbard, Holladay, Horsford, John W. Howe, Thomas Y. How, Jackson, Jenkins, George G. King, Preston King, Letcher, Martin, Mason, McQueen, Millson, Morehead, Orr, Outlaw, Peaslee, Powell, Ross, Scurry, Origen S. Seymour, Stanly, Strother, Taylor, Wallace, Washburn, Welch, and Woodward—56.

So the bill passed, (as published above,) being the amendment of Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, in lieu of the substitute of Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi, adopted in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. HAMILTON said: I am requested by my colleague [Mr. HAMMOND] to state that he is absent from the House on account of sickness, otherwise he should have voted against the bill.

Mr. DEAN, when his name was called, said: I ask to have it entered on the Journal, that I have paired off with my colleague, [Mr. SUTHERLAND,] or I should have voted "aye."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot make it a matter of record on the Journal.

Mr. DEAN. Then I will not vote.

Mr. McMULLIN. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The question was put on the latter motion, and it was agreed to.

The question now being upon the adoption of the title, which is as follows:

"A bill to encourage agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and all other branches of industry, by granting to every man who is the head of a family, and a citizen of the United States, a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of land out of the public domain, upon condition of occupancy and cultivation of the same, for the period herein specified."

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I move the previous question.

The previous question received a second, and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. STANLY. I desire to offer an amendment to the title.

The SPEAKER. No amendment is in order, the main question having been ordered to be put.

The question was then put, and the title was adopted.

Mr. McMULLIN. I move to reconsider the vote by which the title was agreed to, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The question was put on the latter motion, and it was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. RICHARDSON,

The House then adjourned until to-morrow morning at eight o'clock.

PETITIONS, &c.

The following petitions, memorials, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. INGERSOLL: The petition of J. A. Potter and 369 others, citizens of the town of Derby, in the State of Connecticut, praying for the enactment of a law granting lands to actual settlers.

By Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee: The memorial of the Mayor and Aldermen of Memphis, praying the surrender of the Arsenal property in Memphis, for the purpose of sustaining an hospital.

By Mr. KURTZ: The petition of 176 citizens of the county of York, State of Pennsylvania, praying Congress to grant 160 instead of 40 acres of land to the soldiers who served in the war of 1812, the Indian wars, and the other wars of the Republic.

By Mr. ST. MARTIN: The memorial of the clerks in the New Orleans custom-house, praying for relief.

By Mr. JONES, of New York: The petition of Anna McLean, of Niagara county, New York, for compensation for money advanced by her late husband, Lieutenant Charles McLean, of the United States Army, in the recruiting service.

By Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York: The memorial of citizens of Troy, New York, praying for a modification of the bounty land law, so that all persons, including seamen and marines, who served for any period in the war of 1812, may be allowed to receive one hundred and sixty acres of land.

By Mr. EASTMAN: The petition of Angelique King, sole surviving child of Pierre Lavasseur, (called Chamberlain,) claiming certain lots of land in Peoria, Illinois.

By Mr. HENN: The petition of Robert W. Steele, asking additional compensation as assistant marshal in taking the Seventh Census in Jefferson county, Iowa.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 13, 1852.

Prayer by the REV. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

Mr. WADE. I have in my hands, and desire to present, the petition of Lockwood & Smith, who represent themselves as owners of steamboats on Lake Erie; and they set forth, among other things, that the bill now pending before this body to regulate steamboats, in order to provide for the better security of life and property on board, will be detrimental to the interests of owners of boats on that Lake. As a bill has been already reported from the committee, I ask that the petition may be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GWIN presented the memorial of William Price, a watchman in the Census Office, praying an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MALLORY presented the memorial of Otway H. Berryman, of the Navy, praying to be allowed an amount equal to the balance found against him on the settlement of his accounts as acting purser, while in command of the United States Schooner "Onkahye," and which account he had been obliged to pay over to the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PETITION WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. HAMLIN, it was Ordered, That the petition of Thomas Thurston, on the floor of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Printing, to which was referred a motion to print the report of a committee of the Chamber of Commerce of New York, in favor of the establishment of a Light-house Board, reported against the printing thereof; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred a motion to print the memorial of Benjamin Crawford, in relation to steam-boiler explosions, reported in favor of printing the same; which was agreed to.

Mr. BRADBURY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill to extend the benefit of an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform rule of naturalization," and to repeal the acts heretofore passed on that subject, "to the wives and children of citizens," reported it back with amendments.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SHIELDS, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill granting the right of way and making a grant of public lands to the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, in aid of the construction of a railroad from Cincinnati to St. Louis; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BRODHEAD, by unanimous consent, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill authorizing the Secretary of War to grant to the Pittsburg, Kittanning, and Warren Railroad Company the right of way over the grounds of the United States, at the Alleghany Arsenal; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

THE LATE MINISTER TO BRAZIL.

Mr. WADE submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury report to the Senate whether the accounting officers have rejected a charge in the account of the Hon. David Tod, late Minister from the United States to Brazil, for money advanced by him to William E. Anderson, who was sent from Rio Janeiro to the United States, to be a witness on a prosecution to be commenced against two persons for carrying on the slave trade; and if so, then to report the facts, and the reasons for rejecting the claim.

TAX ON MISSOURI LANDS.

Mr. GEYER. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to postpone the prior orders for the purpose of taking up Senate bill No. 107, declaring the assent of Congress to the State of Missouri to impose a tax upon all lands hereafter sold by the United States therein from and after the day of sale. I do not think the consideration of this bill will occupy more than five minutes.

The motion to postpone the prior orders was agreed to, and the bill was considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill proposes to give the assent of Congress to the State of Missouri to impose a tax or taxes upon all lands hereafter sold by the United States in that State from and after the day of sale; provided that the assent thus given shall in nowise impair that provision of the compact with that State, which declares that all lands belonging to the citizens of the United States, residing without the said State, shall never be taxed higher than lands belonging to persons residing therein.

Mr. GEYER. I will merely state that this bill is designed to correct what I consider a mistake in the act of 1847. It is in the very language of that act, which declares the assent of the United States to impose a tax upon all lands sold by the United States to all the States admitted prior to the 24th of April, 1820. It happened that the act authorizing the convention in Missouri was passed on the 6th of April, 1820. That State, however, was not admitted until August, 1821. By inserting the words "prior to the 24th of April, 1820," the State of Missouri was excluded from the provisions of that act. The object of this bill is to put the State of Missouri on the same footing as other States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

HOMESTEAD BILL.

A message from the House of Representatives, by the hands of Mr. FORNEY, its Clerk, was received, stating that the House had passed the following bill, and requested the concurrence of the Senate therein:

"A bill to encourage agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and all other branches of industry, by granting to every man who is the head of a family, and a citizen of the United States, a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of land out of the public domain, upon condition of occupancy and cultivation of the same for the period herein specified."

The bill was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

OHIO AND CHESAPEAKE CANAL BASIN.

Mr. PRATT. Some week or two since a bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia, which I will ask the Senate now to take up. It is a bill making a small appropriation to enable the Corps of Topographical Engineers to make a survey and estimate of the cost of constructing a basin at the terminus of the Ohio and Chesapeake Canal at Rock Creek, in Georgetown.

It is a question in which the State of Maryland is deeply interested, having already expended $10,000,000 in the completion of that work, which was commenced under the auspices of the General Government. That expenditure is now rendered comparatively useless in consequence of there being no depot at its terminus in Georgetown. The desired object can only be attained by the General Government prosecuting it; and with this object in view, the bill to which I refer was drawn up appropriating a small sum to enable the Corps of Topographical Engineers to make the necessary survey and estimate. I hope the prior orders will be postponed for the purpose of taking up the bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to authorize the Secretary of War to cause a survey to be made, under the direction of the Topographical Bureau, necessary to a correct estimate of the cost of constructing a canal basin at the terminus of the Ohio and Chesapeake canal, at Rock Creek, in Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, of sufficient dimensions to accommodate the business on said canal at that point, and to cause such estimate to be made and laid before Congress at the earliest practicable period; and it appropriates the sum of $1,200 for that purpose.

Mr. WALKER. I may be in error, but it occurs to me that this is a bill of strange import, as it proposes that Congress should appropriate money for the survey and estimate, by the Bureau of Topographical Engineers, for a basin for a mere State work. That the basin happens to be located in the District of Columbia, it seems to me, constitutes no reason why Congress should assume this expense. If Congress has exclusive jurisdiction in the District of Columbia, it is no reason, in my opinion, why Congress, without incurring any further expense, may not give the State of Maryland, or any other State interested in this work, the right of making this survey and estimate. But there is something further: if I understand the bill, it directs the Secretary of War to detail from the Corps of Topographical Engineers a sufficient number to make this survey, and, in addition, appropriates $1,200 especially for that purpose. Now, I suppose that these officers and engineers are in the public service, and if detailed for this particular employment will only be occupying their time. Why we should make this appropriation, I cannot see; why we should so legislate, I cannot imagine. I do not think it would be done for any other State in the Union. Notwithstanding this belief, I am of opinion that there are other works of a character quite as national as this, for which an appropriation might be asked; but I am not well versed in the history of this work, nor thoroughly acquainted with the extent to which Congress may have adopted it, and become its patron. I thought, however, that it was due to myself to throw out these suggestions in regard to the impression which this bill made on my mind.

Mr. PRATT. I am sure that my friend from Wisconsin will be satisfied, with a very brief explanation, that the bill ought to pass. The Chesapeake and Ohio Canal was originally incorporated by the Congress of the United States, and the States of Maryland and Virginia. The Congress of the United States appropriated $500,000 towards the prosecution of the work. A survey was made by General Barnard, who was at the head of the Topographical Engineers, under a recommendation of Mr. Calhoun, while Secretary of War. The work was commenced, then, under the auspices of these three governments. Private individuals and the cities in the District also subscribed. The United States have paid their $500,000, and $1,000,000 was paid which had been subscribed by the cities in the District, towards the completion of the work. Maryland has paid upwards of $10,000,000 for its completion. Its great object is to bring to the District of Columbia the mineral resources of the western part of Virginia and Maryland. I cannot see but this is entirely right; and I think every one will admit, that inasmuch as the General Government originally patronized this work, and a direct pledge was thus given on the part of the General Government, that it would go with Maryland and Virginia in the prosecution of this greatest work that was ever prosecuted in the world, when Maryland has been involved in an expense of $10,000,000, and when the whole of this expense will be rendered partially useless unless this appropriation is made, the bill should pass. I do think there cannot be any opposition to a proposition so reasonable as that a survey and estimate shall be made by the officers of the Government for the purpose of ascertaining whether a depot can be made for the reception of the trade from that canal, which has already cost so many millions of dollars to bring it to that point.

Now, the only other objection offered by the Senator from Wisconsin is, that he cannot see why an appropriation should be made to enable the officers of the Topographical Engineers to do what otherwise it would be their duty to do. A resolution passed this body requiring the Secretary of War to report such an estimate. On application made by the Committee on the District of Columbia, they were informed that there were no funds over which the Department had any control enabling the Topographical Engineers to make this survey. Consequently some small appropriation—about $1,200 was mentioned—was absolutely necessary to enable the Secretary of War to carry out the requisition embraced in the previous resolution of the Senate. I hope, therefore, that my friend from Wisconsin will withdraw all objection to the passage of the bill, that we may have from the proper Department a report and an estimate of the cost of making this depot for the reception of this trade. I think he will see that justice requires that the General Government should do something in aid of the States of Virginia and Maryland, which were induced to enter into this work in consequence of the aid given by the General Government. The Federal Government, however, backed out of the matter, leaving it to these two States alone to finish it; and Maryland has already expended $10,000,000 in this work, which was commenced under the auspices of the Federal Government. If there ever was a case requiring, in good faith, that the Federal Government should act, it seems to me that this is one; and I hope the Senate will pass the bill.

Mr. WALKER. The secret of this matter I infer from what has been said by the Senator from Maryland. He said the Government was under a tacit or implied pledge to do this thing. Well, sir, it does seem to me that Congress can never speak about any matter but that there is fastened upon it a pledge to expend an illimitable amount of money, whatever may be deemed necessary for the completion of the work. We can see plainly to what this is to lead. If Congress goes on and takes the step of surveying and estimating for this work, why, of course, the next thing will be that we appropriate money to construct the basin. That, as a matter of course, will follow upon the same reason; for if the reasoning of the Senator from Maryland is good for the purpose now under consideration, it will certainly be good to fasten upon the Government the expense of the construction of this work. I should like to know if the bare survey and estimates of this basin is to cost $1,200, what, in the name of common sense, is its construction to cost?

Mr. SHIELDS. As chairman of the committee that reported this bill, I would state to the Senator from Wisconsin, and to the Senate, the necessity for it. After making the most ample inquiries, we found that there was some receptacle necessary at Georgetown in order to prevent the boats from passing down to Alexandria. It was necessary for the benefit of Washington and for the benefit of this District. It was necessary in order to give the people here an opportunity of getting coal, and other articles of consumption, more directly. We cannot tell the nature of that receptacle—whether it is to be a basin, or whether it is to be large or small. We want to ascertain the facts in regard to it. If it shall turn out to be a matter of expense, we shall have it in our power to refuse to construct the work; or we may make terms with the authorities of Georgetown. The object of this bill is to ascertain the nature and character of the construction required.

I will state, that the Bureau, with which we conferred on this subject, gave us, in reply, this information: That to make such an examination as was wanted, they must proceed to bore the ground; they must employ laborers; they must go to some expense. They could not make an estimate satisfactory to us, on which we could act, without some little additional expense, and they name $1,200 as the expense required. It may not cost over $200. It may not go beyond $300 or $400. We cannot tell exactly what amount will be required; but we thought it best to appropriate the sum asked for. Some expense will be necessary to get this information, and then, when it is obtained, all that the honorable Senator from Wisconsin now says may be in very good time. But at present we have not information enough. What we want to get at is a knowledge of the necessity for this work, and the nature of the work required. That we can get, I believe, for a few hundred dollars. I do not think it is necessary to waste the time of the Senate on this subject.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. President, that we have not the information seems evident. That we are under no obligation to procure it is what I am asserting. There are some cities in this world—some in the United States—that have some little ambition to do something for themselves. Here are two cities, in a little flat-iron piece of ground, every citizen, every business man in them, being interested, if possible, more than the residue of the country put together, in the promotion of commerce here. But we find, that, when at a former period these cities made some subscription towards this work, Congress assumed it; and now, when the last thing is wanted, when information is called for in regard to the construction of a basin, they will not even condescend to do that for themselves. I do not believe that there is any obligation on Congress to take this step. But when we shall have had the information, as I before remarked, it is perfectly evident, from the arguments here, that we shall have to take a further step, and incur the expense of constructing this work. The Senator from Illinois says this survey and estimate may not cost more than $200.

Mr. SHIELDS. I cannot tell exactly what it will cost.

Mr. WALKER. If this survey and estimate will only cost $200, why is there an appropriation in the bill of $1,200? I doubt very much whether there can be found an instance in an enterprise of this sort, where an appropriation has ever gone beyond the amount which it was deemed necessary to expend. If we appropriate this amount, it will be pretty sure to be expended.

I believe that the way to keep down Washington city; the way to keep down Georgetown, in a commercial point of view, is for Congress to be continually making these appropriations, and leaving these cities nothing to do for themselves. Why, when we make appropriations, it is very rarely that they are expended for the purposes for which we make them. The people here really seem to think that if they expend the money we appropriate, for the purposes for which it was designed, this city might be finished, and hence there would be no more expenditure. Why, look at Indiana avenue. We made an appropriation of $13,000 for grading and opening it. A responsible citizen of Maryland, and one who could give responsible security, came forward and proposed to take the work for the amount appropriated; but the Commissioner of Public Buildings, (not the present one,) answered him, that he could do it for less than the appropriation; that he would let the work out by the day. Well, he went on; and we have made appropriation after appropriation, for that object, from that day to this, until, at last, we have appropriated $23,500 for Indiana avenue, and it is not yet half done.

I have felt that, when an occasion offered itself, I would make some remarks in regard to the manner in which money is expended in this District. This is, to be sure, a small question upon which to make these remarks, but they are none the less applicable; for the truth is as I have stated. Money is not expended here for the purposes for which it is appropriated. Take the case of this canal for another instance. An offer was made to do the work required on that, for the sum first appropriated; but we have gone on until it has cost three times the amount of the first appropriation. It seems to be the design that Congress shall continually appropriate money in this District, and yet never accomplish the object in view, that is, finishing this city. For one, I hope that Congress will at last begin to close the door of the Treasury against this thing, until the citizens—the responsible people—of the District of Columbia will see their true interests, and come forward as though they were somewhat interested in having money properly expended here. But it is not done. I assert what I can prove in regard to Indiana avenue and the canal. The men who proposed to undertake the work can come forward and testify as to the truth of what I have said.

To whom are these $1,200 to go? To pay the Topographical Engineers for this survey?

Mr. PRATT. Some of it will be necessary to pay laborers.

Mr. WALKER. Will $1,200 be necessary to pay laborers for boring the ground?

Mr. SHIELDS. As the honorable Senator seems to be a little ignorant of the nature of the case which he has attempted to talk about, I will say to him that there is a report here which may explain the necessity of this appropriation; and he will certainly see, when he hears that report read, that in the opinion of the head of the Topographical Bureau, there must be something expended for this purpose.

Mr. WALKER. I think I have read that report. I was surprised at it when it came in.

Mr. SHIELDS. I think the honorable Senator never heard this report read.

Mr. WALKER. It came in some time since.

Mr. SHIELDS. It has never been read yet in this Chamber, and I ask now for its reading.

The Secretary accordingly read a letter from Colonel J. J. Abert, of the Topographical Engineers, dated March 30, 1852, addressed to the Hon. Mr. SHIELDS, Chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia. It states that the object of the proposed appropriation of $1,200 is to enable the Topographical Bureau to make the surveys and examinations upon which an estimate could be founded for the construction of such a basin as might be necessary at the terminus of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal. He states that an estimate of the cost of the construction of such a basin cannot now be made, because the items of an estimate, however rough, must have some reference to the plan, and the plan cannot be estimated without a survey and examination. He further states that the plan will probably involve extensive dredging, protecting walls, a dam, a short canal, condemnation of occupied ground, and its value; and that these items cannot be ascertained without a survey and an examination; and if an estimate were made, only such an amount would be asked for as could be judiciously expended during the present fiscal year. He therefore submits an estimate of $30,000 as the probable amount required for such a work, during the fiscal year.

As to the necessity and want of such a basin, he says, that it is a means of connecting the tide-water of the Potomac with the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal at Georgetown. In the plan of the canal, there are three terminating points, or points of connection with tide-water—one at Alexandria, by means of the aqueduct at Georgetown, and the short canal between the aqueduct and Alexandria; one at the basin at Georgetown, referred to, which, from its condition, being now of no use, is a theoretical and not a practical connection; and one at James's Creek, adjacent to the Arsenal, but which is not yet completed. The trade to the last point has to pass through the Georgetown basin and the Washington city canal; therefore, without the Georgetown basin, the James's Creek basin is useless. There is also a direct communication with the Navy-yard, by a branch of the city canal; but the canal connection with this branch also passes through the Georgetown basin. There is therefore at present but one practical connection between the canal and tide-water—namely, the Alexandria connection. The United States Arsenal and the Navy-yard at Washington both depend upon the Georgetown basin for water for canal connection with the armory at Harper's Ferry, and the coal and the iron region of the Alleghanies. Hence, it is supposed that the reduced price on the coal consumed at these two points, resulting from the use of the canal, would in a short time equal the probable cost of repairing and improving the Georgetown basin. Mr. Abert sums up the advantages to the United States from the improvement and preservation of the basin at Georgetown, as follows: First, the general inland trade of the country, which this canal is well adapted to develop and promote. Secondly, the extensive interests of the United States, as a stockholder in the canal. Thirdly, the extensive interests of the United States as a lot-holder in the city of Washington. Fourthly, the important national considerations involved in a canal connection between the Arsenal at Washington city and the Armory at Harper's Ferry, and the coal and iron region of the Alleghanies; and fifthly, the important national considerations similarly involved in reference to the Navy-yard at Washington.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. President, I do not understand that the Senator from Wisconsin presents any constitutional objection to the appropriation for the purpose of making this survey. This District has no power of legislation, save in this body—the Congress of the United States. This is said to be a very important improvement. There are no public lands within this District that can be appropriated to make this basin.

Mr. WALKER. There are plenty of them.

Mr. DAWSON. Besides, I would suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin, that the principle which he so much admires, and has so often sustained here, is, that anything which would improve the value of the public property should be made the foundation for an appropriation—such as the granting of alternate sections of land. Now, look at the various advantageous influences which this basin or this canal has upon the public property. Your engineer suggests, in the communication which has been read, that the large number of lots held by the Government in the city of Washington, will be vastly enhanced in value by this improvement.

Mr. WALKER. Those lots are public land. Mr. PRATT, (to Mr. Dawson.) He admits your argument.

Mr. DAWSON. Does he acknowledge that the Government of the United States should carry out the principle in this bill?

Mr. PRATT. Yes, sir; I believe so.

Mr. DAWSON. Very well, then, I will let him alone.

The bill was reported to the Senate, and the question was stated, Shall it be engrossed and read a third time?

Mr. BRODHEAD. I am entirely opposed to this bill, and upon the question of its engrossment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BRADBURY. I do not object to the appropriation in this bill, provided it shall not be taken as a pledge that this Government will go on and construct the basin contemplated. The Government has already expended a large amount on this canal. I do not deem it of sufficient importance, whether the basin of this canal shall be at Alexandria or at Georgetown, for the Government to be involved in the expense of constructing it. But this appropriation is for a small amount, and I would not object to it, provided there should be no implied pledge that the Government is to prosecute it.

Mr. SHIELDS. This bill merely proposes a survey and an estimate. We wish to get information in regard to the subject.

The question being taken upon the engrossment of the bill, by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 30, nays 7; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Badger, Bell, Berrien, Brooke, Bradbury, Cass, Clarke, Clemens, Dawson, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Felch, Geyer, Gwin, Houston, Jones of Tennessee, King, Mallory, Mangum, Mason, Pratt, Rusk, Seward, Shields, Smith, Sumner, Underwood, Upham, Wade, and Weller—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Bright, Brodhead, Douglas, Jones of Iowa, Sebastian, and Walker—7.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

THE DEFICIENCY BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1852," the question pending being upon the amendment of the Committee on Finance, as it had been amended, to insert the following:

For additional compensation for increasing the transportation of the United States mail between New York and Liverpool, in the Collins line of steamers, to twenty-six trips per annum, at such times as shall be directed by the Postmaster General, and in conformity to his last annual report to Congress, and his letter of the 15th of November last to the Secretary of the Navy, commencing said increased service on the first of January, 1852, at the rate of $33,000 per trip, in lieu of the present allowance, the sum of $236,500: Provided, That it shall be in the power of Congress, at any time after the first day of January, 1854, to terminate the arrangement for any additional allowance herein provided for.

Mr. WALKER. I wish to say to the Senate, and to the chairman of the Finance Committee in particular, that the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. BORLAND], who made a part of his speech yesterday, is this morning sick abed, and requested me to ask that the deficiency bill might not be taken up, or, if taken up, that it might be postponed until to-morrow, or else taken up and acted upon in its other provisions, leaving this question undecided.

The PRESIDENT. All the amendments have been disposed of except the one pending in regard to the Collins line of steamers.

Mr. HUNTER. There are other amendments to be offered, some from the Committee on Finance, and some from the Committee on Indian Affairs. Two or three additional estimates have come in since the bill was reported. We can go on with the other amendments, and lay the one in regard to the Collins line aside.

Mr. GWIN. I hope not. The Senator from Arkansas can finish his speech on this subject when we get the bill into the Senate. I hope that we shall act now on the pending amendment. After the bill shall be reported to the Senate the Senator from Arkansas can speak on the question.

Mr. HUNTER. I think it would be more courteous to allow the pending amendment to lie over, so that we can offer other amendments.

Mr. GWIN. Suppose we should get through the other amendments to-day, are we then to postpone the bill?

Mr. HUNTER. When we shall get through with the other amendments it will be time enough to raise that question.

The PRESIDENT. The amendment reported by the committee is under consideration. It can only be laid aside by unanimous consent. If there is no objection it will be laid aside, and other amendments will be received.

Mr. GWIN. I am perfectly willing to take up other amendments now, and when we get through with them let us go on with the one in regard to the Collins line.

Mr. SEWARD. I shall insist upon going on with that amendment now. I have been waiting for several days to get a vote on the question.

The PRESIDENT. Then the amendment is under consideration, and the Chair has no alternative but to put the question.

Mr. CASS. It seems to be a matter of comity due to a member of the body, who has commenced a speech, to give him an opportunity to finish it. As there is other business connected with this bill we can go on with that, and finish it so that there will be no time lost. It seems to me that it would be better to go on with other amendments to the bill to-day.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair has no power over the subject. The amendment cannot be passed over except by unanimous consent, and no other amendments can be offered until this is disposed of. By unanimous consent, the Chair stated that it might be passed over, but that was objected to.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I beg to observe to the Senate, and especially to the Senator from California, that the honorable Senator from Arkansas, who is ill, was making his speech yesterday in opposition to the pending amendment. It seems to me, therefore, to be rather discourteous to take a vote on the amendment, and then ask him to finish his speech upon it after it has been passed upon by the Senate.

Mr. GWIN. Suppose the Senator from Arkansas should be sick for six weeks; are we to postpone action for that length of time? If there could be any surety that the honorable Senator would be here in reasonable time to make his speech, I should not object at all. Nor do I object now. I am perfectly willing to take up other amendments, and I withdraw all objection, provided that, when we get through with them, if we shall get through before the end of the day, the amendment now pending shall come up.

Mr. BERRIEN. Is there any question before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee as amended. There was a proposition made that, by unanimous consent, that amendment should be passed over with the view of offering other amendments, but it was objected to.

Mr. BERRIEN. I should myself have no hesitation in acquiescing in that course if the decision on this question would be a decision by the Senate. But the bill is now in Committee of the Whole, and the question must again be presented when the bill shall be reported to the Senate. Then the argument of the honorable Senator from Arkansas can be heard. It is unnecessary, I presume, to make any other remark, as there is an objection to passing over the amendment.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that when the bill is reported to the Senate, the question will come up on the amendments agreed to in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. If the Senator from New York still objects, I hope that the honorable Senator will allow me to appeal to him in behalf of my colleague. I think I can make an appeal with great confidence to that Senator, inasmuch as the Senate has granted him, with others, the indulgence of offering extended remarks upon this question. Surely it would not be considered very unusual to accord to my colleague a courtesy which it has been usual to extend to other Senators. I hope, therefore, that the Senator from New York will withdraw his objection, and allow the discussion to take that form which has been suggested by the friends of the bill. Let us pass over informally the amendment now the subject of discussion, and proceed to the consideration of other amendments. It will be time enough for the Senator from New York to object when we shall have got through the other amendments. If, then, the illness of my colleague shall still prevent him from speaking on the amendment, it will be time enough to make the objection. I hope, therefore, that the Senator from New York will withdraw his objection.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, I appeal to the honorable Senator from New York to withdraw his objection for another reason. The Senator from Arkansas, while delivering his speech yesterday, was unwell, and from a feeling of illness, was unable to continue his remarks. When he gave way he had not arrived at the specific objections which he entertained against the amendment under consideration. He was forced by illness to give way, and we have not heard from the Senator from Arkansas one single word as to his specific objections against this amendment. Therefore, I hope we shall give him an opportunity of continuing his remarks to-morrow.

Mr. WALKER. In order to make it a test matter, whether this courtesy is to be shown to the Senator from Arkansas, who has been taken sick, I move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow.

Mr. PRATT. I think that is certainly unjust, for to-morrow is Friday, and private bill day. Private bills have been postponed for the last three weeks, for the purpose of passing this bill, under the view, I am sure, sincerely entertained by the chairman of the committee who reported it, that it would pass, if private bills were only postponed. The motion now is to postpone the bill until to-morrow.

Mr. BRIGHT. Let us postpone it until Monday at one o'clock.

Mr. PRATT. I have no objection to that. But it is manifestly unjust that the claims of private individuals against the Government, should be postponed from week to week for the purpose of taking up this bill. This bill at last is only to pay the debts of the Government. The private claimants are the creditors of the Government. They only differ from those who will be paid under the deficiency bill, in the fact that they have been creditors for a long period of time, whereas the others are only creditors of the last year. If, then, there should be a precedence, on principle, given to one over the other, the private claimants who have just claims against the Government of the United States, which have been lying over for years and years, have certainly a stronger claim than those in favor of whom appropriations are to be made in this bill. I shall therefore certainly object to appropriating to-morrow for the consideration of the deficiency bill. If Senators should desire to postpone it until Monday, I shall have no objection; but I certainly must object to its being postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. SEWARD. I hope I may be allowed to say a word in reply to the suggestions that have been made to me by respected Senators on the opposite side of the Chamber. If this was to be a final question, I would not insist upon taking the vote now; but it concludes nothing. The question will be before the Senate to-morrow just as it is to-day. Nothing can change that. I think that it is due to the proper conduct of public business here that we should get on with this bill as far and as fast as we can. After we shall have gone through the amendments in committee, rather than that the question should be taken by surprise, if the honorable Senator from Arkansas should be absent, I should myself object to taking any final question, or disposing of the matter finally, until he should be here; but I see no reason why we should not proceed with the bill to-day, as far as we can, inasmuch as the very same question will come up again to-morrow.

Mr. WALKER. I simply wish to remark to the Senator from Maryland, that the effect of this vote will not be to postpone the private business, but will leave it to us to-morrow to say whether or not we will dispense with the order of private business.

Mr. RUSK. I desire to say a word upon the subject of postponement, and I desire mainly to direct it to the Senator from New York. He sees that courtesy towards the Senator from Arkansas would require the postponement of the bill until Monday. I think it would be better to lay aside the present pending amendment, and dispose of the various other amendments which are to be offered. The Senator's objection is the only thing in the way of taking up the other amendments. I think that by laying aside the pending amendments, and going on with the others, in the absence of the Senator from Arkansas, we may considerably facilitate the final passage of the bill.

Mr. SEWARD. I intended to act in accordance with the friends of the pending amendment, and certainly with the honorable Senator from Texas; but after the remark he has made I shall withdraw my objection.

Mr. WALKER. Then I withdraw my proposition to postpone.

Mr. PRATT. I would suggest to Senators that, if they think proper, they might make this private bill day. We might go on with private bills to-day, and let this bill take the place of private bills to-morrow.

Mr. HUNTER. I think we had better go on with the other amendments to-day.

The PRESIDENT. The pending amendment can be passed over by unanimous consent.

There was no objection, and it was accordingly passed over.

Mr. BADGER. I should be very glad to know, and I think we ought to know it now, whether it is the intention of the Senate to give this bill, to-morrow, the place which would be, under the rule, occupied by private bills? It is a matter of some importance that that should be known, because there are gentlemen here who are desirous to be absent from the city for a day or two, and who would not be here if to-morrow should be devoted to private bills.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope that to-morrow will be given to the deficiency bill. It is very important that we should act on that measure as soon as possible. I have now some amendments to offer, under the instructions of the Committee on Finance. The first is to add at the end of the first section of the bill the following:

For the reconstruction or repair of the steamer Bibb, used in the survey of the Nantucket Shoals, $18,000.

This is in pursuance of estimate. It is necessary, in order to complete the survey, which is a very important one, and in order to use the work in season, that the appropriation should now be made.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTER. I offer the following, under the instructions of the Committee on Finance, to come in after the amendment which has just been adopted:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to investigate the conduct of the Indian agents in California, who, without authority of law, or official instructions, have contracted heavy liabilities for beef and other supplies, alleged to have been furnished to various tribes of Indians while negotiating treaties; and to ascertain whether the Government may properly be held liable to claims on account of such contracts, $10,000.

This is in pursuance of an estimate from the Department. It is designed to enable the Department to investigate the conduct of those Indian agents, of whom we have heard so much, and to ascertain the real state of the facts. I ask that this allowance may be made, in order to have these investigations made.

Mr. RUSK. I shall certainly vote against the amendment. What is the business of the officers who receive regular salaries, but to investigate these accounts, when they are returned? The adoption of this amendment will authorize them to appoint other agents, and when these questions shall come before us again, they will become vastly more complicated than they are at present.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAWSON. I suppose the chairman of the Committee on Finance will propose the amendment again, when the bill shall be reported to the Senate.

Mr. HUNTER. It can be proposed in the Senate.

Mr. DAWSON. I hope the chairman will recollect it.

Mr. HUNTER. I shall try to remember it. Under the instructions of the Finance Committee, I offer the following, to come in after the amendment last adopted:

And he it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to purchase for the United States, a suitable piece of ground, at a central point in the city of San Francisco, California, as a site for the erection of the custom house heretofore authorized to be built: Provided, That said site or ground may be obtained with good and sufficient title to the United States, in exchange for such reasonable portion of the Government reserve in that city, as the said Secretary shall deem just and equitable; or for a sum, in lieu thereof, not exceeding $40,000. And to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to carry into effect this provision, the sum of $40,000 is hereby appropriated: Provided, That if the said Secretary shall fail to obtain ground on satisfactory terms, then the said sum, or such portion thereof as shall be necessary, may be expended in providing the proper foundations for said custom-house, on the site heretofore selected for that purpose.

This is in pursuance of an estimate; and it arises from the fact, that the lot owned by the United States is a water-lot; and the additional cost of embanking and filling it up, in order to construct a custom-house, will be a great deal more than a lot could be bought for. The site which it is proposed to obtain, is a much more convenient one than that already in the possession of the Government. It is hoped that the Department may be able to make an exchange of some of the lots now belonging to the Government, for the one which is desired. This appropriation is earnestly recommended by the Department, and, I believe, the Government will save money by the adoption of the provision. If we build the custom-house on the present lot belonging to the Government, it will be a very expensive undertaking.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTER. I offer the following amendments in pursuance of estimates from the Post Office Department:

For arrears of contingent expenses occasioned in part by insufficient estimates in preceding years, and by a larger quantity of blank books and stationery, office cases, and other furniture made necessary by the late act reducing the rates of postage, and by the great progressive increase of business in the Post Office Department, $7,500.

For compensation to temporary clerks employed conditionally to bring up arrears of business in the dead letter office, $1,000 67.

For fuel for the General Post Office building, from the 20th of February, 1852, to the end of the season, $7 50.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. HUNTER. I have now got through with my amendments from the Committee on Finance. I understand that the Committee on Indian Affairs have some amendments to offer.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. Mr. President, I will offer, under instructions from the Committee on Indian Affairs, several amendments for the purpose of supplying deficiencies in the service of the Indian Department for the current year. They are literally and technically deficiencies, with the exception of one which I will explain at the proper time. These amendments are all based on estimates from the Indian Office, sent regularly to the Senate, copies being furnished both to the Committee on Finance, and to the Committee on Indian Affairs, as is the habit of that office. The first amendment is to insert the following:

For expenses of treating with the Indians and Half-Breeds, for the extinguishment of the title to their lands on the Red river of the North, in the Territory of Minnesota, being in addition to the appropriation for the same object made the 30th of September, 1850, $901 05.

This is to meet an outstanding debt contracted for holding what is called the "Pembina" treaty. In explanation of that, I will read a letter from Governor Ramsay, Superintendent of Indian Affairs of Minnesota, on this subject:

MINNESOTA SUPERINTENDENCY, }
ST. PAUL, February 27, 1852. }

I have the honor to inclose herewith my accounts and vouchers for the quarter ending 31st of December, 1851. You will see that of the funds placed in my hands to defray the expenses of the Pembina treaty, there is a balance in favor of the Government of $6 45, but there are yet unpaid demands against the Government on account of said treaty, of $907 50, so that it will require $901 05 in addition to the small balance in hand, to pay off those claims. I request that the above sum may be remitted to me, and hope it will be convenient for the Department to do so out of some fund on hand, so that it may not be subjected to the delay of a congressional appropriation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. The next amendment is the following:

For the sum first advanced to the Chippewa Indians of the Mississippi under the 3d article of the treaty of 2d of August, 1847, to be expended in opening farms for their benefit, and extending their farming facilities, $5,000.

Mr. President, by the terms of the treaty made with the Chippewa Indians of the Mississippi, the United States have agreed to pay them an annual sum of $1,000 for agricultural purposes. By experience heretofore in the expenditure of that sum, it has been found that that amount is not sufficient to answer the purpose, and they have asked the Government to advance them five annual payments, amounting to $5,000, for the purpose of completing the improvements upon the small tract of country they now inhabit, sufficient to enable the Indians to engage in agricultural purposes. The tribe consists of eight hundred or one thousand persons, living on something like a township, or half a township of land. They have in cultivation sixty acres. It is thought by the Indian agent that they ought to have six hundred acres, and this advance is asked for that purpose. It is recommended, as will be seen by the following letter, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, by the acting Secretary of the Interior, not only by the local agent appointed for the tribe, but by the Superintendent of Indian Affairs of the Northwest:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, April 6, 1852.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, with accompanying estimates, which it was impossible to submit at the commencement of the session for want of the necessary data, and respectfully to recommend that the several items thereof be inserted in the deficiency bill now before the Senate.

J. J. CRITTENDEN,
Acting Secretary.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RUSK. I desire to offer an amendment which should have been attached to the one presented by the Senator from Virginia, under the direction of the Committee on Finance, in relation to special agents of the Post Office Department. I offer it under the direction of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and on the recommendation and estimates of the Postmaster General. It is as follows:

For the payment of the salaries of the special agents of the Post Office Department, to the end of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1852, $11,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I submit the four following amendments, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, all embracing small sums of the same character, and the question can be taken on them all at the same time:

For fulfilling treaties with the Winnabagoes, to wit: purchase of tobacco, per 2d article of the treaty of the 1st of August, 1829, and 5th article of the treaty of the 15th of September, 1832, $375.

For fulfilling treaties with the Ottawas and Chippewas, to wit: purchase of tobacco, per 4th article of the treaty of the 28th March, 1836, $300.

For fulfilling treaties with the Sacs and Foxes of the Mississippi, to wit: purchase of tobacco, per 4th article of the treaty of the 21st September, 1832, $200.

For fulfilling treaties with the Menomonees, to wit: purchase of tobacco, per second article of the treaty of the 28th March, 1836, $100.

Those items all arise under treaties with the four different tribes, under articles which appear to have been a mere transcript of each other, by which the Government is under obligations to furnish so many thousand pounds of tobacco to the Indians, regardless of expense. The appropriations made last year were found, in consequence of a rise in the price of tobacco, to be insufficient for the purchase of the stipulated amount. These are estimates from the Indian Office for the purpose of purchasing the whole number of pounds required by the treaties. They are not for debts contracted by the Department, for the quantity of tobacco corresponding with the amounts here were not given to the Indians, although they ought to have been in the beginning of the present year.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. The last amendment which I am directed to offer by the Committee on Indian Affairs, is as follows:

For payment to the following-named tribes of Indians, of the under-mentioned sums due them, retained by the late sub-Indian agent, William H. Bruce, the same to be reimbursed to the United States when recovered from said sub-agent or his sureties, to wit: for the Menomonees, $9,466 27; for the Chippewas, Menomonees, Winnabagoes, and New York Indians, $321 59; for the Six Nations of New York, $23 50; for the Stockbridge, $1,106; making in the whole, $11,116 36.

In a communication received from the Indian Department, the committee were informed that the bonds of the sub-agent have been placed in suit to recover the amounts specified, and that it is deemed but just that the Government should at once make good the amount withheld from the Indians. In further explanation, I will say, in reference to the amounts asked for in the amendment, that they are moneys due from the Government of the United States to the different Indian tribes, with the disbursement of which the sub-agent was charged. The money was never paid to the Indians. The agents' bonds have been placed in suit for the recovery of the amounts that he ought to have paid over as Government agent; and the only question now is, whether we shall compel the Indians to wait until they are recovered, or do as we are bound by treaty obligations to do—foot up the loss at once, and take the chance of indemnity from the Indian agent ourselves? That is the question presented.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, and in pursuance of a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, which I hold in my hand, recommending the same, to offer the following amendment:

For the purchase of the site on which to erect the custom-house, Bangor, Maine, $15,000.

For the purchase of the site on which to erect the custom-house, Bath, Maine, $11,000.

Mr. BRODHEAD. The honorable Senator from Maine referred to a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury. I should like to hear it read.

Mr. BADGER. We have passed a law authorizing the erection of the custom-houses.

Mr. HAMLIN. I will state, that at the last session of Congress an appropriation was made for the erection of the custom-houses in both places. No appropriation was made in either case to purchase the site. The sites have been purchased, and now the Department wants the money to pay for them.

Mr. CLEMENS. I do not understand that to be a deficiency. It is a provision for a new contract. Is it in order in a deficiency bill?

The PRESIDENT. Any amendment is in order that is in conformity with an estimate furnished by a Department, or reported from a committee, according to the rule, as amended a few days ago.

Mr. HUNTER. I desire to be informed by the Senator from Maine whether the original law limited the amount? And whether this is an attempt to extend the limitation?

Mr. HAMLIN. The letter which I hold in my hand, states that the cost of the buildings was limited to the amount named in the appropriation; but this is for the purpose of the sites. I do not know that it is, strictly speaking, a deficiency. The original law creating the necessity for this contract, was passed last year. It has been made. They have made the purchase of the sites; they have not paid for them, but they ask this appropriation to pay for them. I do not see that it makes much difference whether it comes in here or in the regular bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MALLORY. I submit the following amendment, under the direction of the Committee on Naval Affairs:

For establishing a depot of coal for naval purposes at Key West, in the State of Florida, $20,000.

I hold in my hand an estimate from the Secretary of the Navy, which has been submitted to the Bureau of Yards and Docks, addressed to the committee, recommending this measure.

Mr. BRODHEAD. This is an appropriation of $20,000. If there is a letter from the Department recommending it, and giving the reasons for it, I should like to hear it read.

The Secretary read a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, addressed to Mr. MALLORY, and dated March 5, 1852, as follows:

"I have the honor to transmit a report of the Chiefs of the Bureau of Ordnance, Construction, and Navy-Yards, &c., to whom your letter of the 1st instant, in relation to a naval depot at Key West, was referred, and to inform you of the concurrence of the Department therein."

A letter was inclosed, signed by Commodore Morris, Commodore Shubrick, and Commodore Smith, dated March 4, 1852, and addressed to the Secretary of the Navy, as follows:

"In compliance with your direction in the indorsement upon the letter from Mr. MALLORY, of the 1st instant, we have the honor to state, that, in our opinion, it would be useful and expedient to have a depot of coal at Key West, for the use of the naval steamers, which may be employed in that quarter; and that the sum of $20,000 would be sufficient to provide accommodation for the preservation of as much coal as will probably meet the wants of the service."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BELL. I propose the following amendment:

"For payment to the citizens of Alabama, Georgia, and Florida, for depredations committed by Creek Indians upon their property, and for other property, taken by the troops of the United States, and friendly Creeks, in the year 1836, $355,797."

I offer this by direction of the Committee on Indian Affairs. I would not have presumed to offer it upon my own responsibility. This is a claim which has now been pending against the Government of the United States, I believe, for fourteen years. It has received various examinations in the House of Representatives anterior to this, and in the Senate also. Adverse reports have been made upon it in the House; one elaborate report was made, I think, in 1838; but the parties—the State authorities of Alabama particularly—have never rested satisfied under that decision of the committee. The House itself, I believe, came to no conclusion upon it. The Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate, either the last session of Congress or the session before, reported a bill, and my recollection now is, that it passed this body—extending the Indian intercourse law over the States of Alabama, Georgia, and Florida, with the view of embracing all claims made for depredations committed by the hostile Indians, who were but a portion of the tribe, in the year 1836 and other years, going perhaps beyond that period. The Committee on Indian Affairs, upon further examination into that question, are of opinion, that under the circumstances of the case, it would be very dangerous to adopt any such law, or extend the intercourse law over those States, not only on account of the lapse of time, but on account of the great difficulty of guarding against very extensive frauds in proving up all such claims at any time, particularly after so great a lapse of time.

A commission was appointed, under an act of Congress, during the administration of General Jackson, either in the year 1836 or 1837, I forget which, though I have the official documents all before me, to inquire into and report to the Executive the number and amount of the depredations, the individuals upon whom they were made, and also at what periods, and by what portion of the Creek tribe of Indians they were committed. That commission resulted in a report. After taking proofs, and discharging the commission with as much assiduity and care as the commissioners alleged they were enabled to do, they reported the entire amount claimed and proved by the sufferers to be $1,257,407 30; out of which they allowed $355,797 92. The latter amount they reported was for real and actual losses sustained by the claimants. The Committee on Indian Affairs have taken that report, as the basis of the proposition for the relief of the sufferers by the depredations. The committee of the House of Representatives assumed the principle that these claims for remuneration for depredations committed by parties of hostile Creeks, upon the property of citizens of Georgia, Alabama, and Florida, came within the principle established by the act of Congress in the year 1816, when a question arose with regard to the depredations committed by the British troops upon our northern frontier in the War of 1811, '12, and '13—that principle being that the Government was not responsible for the property destroyed by foreign troops in a state of war against the United States, by an invasion of our territories. That is a principle which is not meant to be contested; but the Committee on Indian Affairs, in recommending this appropriation for the relief of those citizens, proceed upon the principle that the state of things then, did not constitute such a war as comes within it; that, in fact, it is, though not expressly excepted, clearly an implied exception to that principle, so laid down in the act of 1816. The advocates for the claims of these parties—who allege that they suffered to a much larger amount than is provided for in the amendment—allege that they have the same grounds to come before the Government for redress that those who suffered by depredations committed under the general intercourse law upon the frontiers, have. They allege that they were unwarranted depredations committed by robbing parties of Indians; and that if the principle of the general intercourse law had been applied to the Southern States, in which a portion of those tribes still resided, they would have been entitled clearly to the benefit of it.

It is for the purpose of enforcing the principle of the intercourse law, in effect, so far as regards the actual amount of depredations and damages committed by the hostile Creeks, that this amendment is offered. If the principle of that law should be extended, as was proposed to the Senate a session or two ago, and which, I believe, was sanctioned by the Senate, though it did not become a law, the probability is that a much larger amount would be established under it—if I should say a sum double the amount, perhaps I would not be far wrong. Under all the circumstances of the case, considering that it does appear to be a just claim for damages against the Government of the United States, when we look into the facts connected with it, the committee are of the opinion that the smaller sum, reported by the commission to which I have alluded, would be the safest for the Government, while it would do, perhaps, substantial justice to all the bona fide claimants; not that we suppose that all the consequences of the damages to the parties named were traced according to any principle that their claims would not be justly much larger than that proposed to be appropriated.

Mr. President, the whole question of the large appropriation which is proposed for the satisfaction of these claims, grew out of what I considered, at the time, a most unfortunate policy of the Federal Government. By the treaty of 1826, with the Creek Indians, which was not ratified until 1832, the Indians were allowed to sell out their territory, on condition that they should remove westward; but I believe the terms of the treaty were, that whatever head of a family chose to retain a reservation, should be at liberty to do so. How many reservations there were thus retained, I do not remember, for I have not recently looked into the official documents on the subject; they were very large. But the misfortune was, that it became the policy of the Government at that time to coerce the removal of the Indians by every expedient which, as they supposed at the time, was sustained by a sound policy, but which turned out by and by to be a very unwise and unsound policy. It allowed white settlers to go into the Indian country, purchase reservations, and settle in the midst of the Indians, before the first step was taken for the removal of the latter west of the Mississippi. A large population immediately rushed in; the Indian reservations, according to the regulations pointed out by the treaty, were rapidly bought by the white settlers; but there were the Indian vendors, a great mass of the Indian population, still within the Indian territory, forming a confused and promiscuous settlement all over it. It was very early seen by the citizens of Alabama and Georgia, more particularly by the settlers who had gone in, in pursuance of the recommendation and policy, I may say, of the Government, that the Indians, when they once sold their reservations and got their pay, had, while that pay lasted, something upon which they might subsist, but there was no stimulus to industry; they had no lands remaining to cultivate; and it happened between the year 1834, when the reservations were sold, and 1836, when the outrages complained of commenced, that a large portion of the Indian population were in a state of absolute starvation, and by violence, by plundering, by robbery; for charity, however extensive it might be, was not sufficient to supply their wants, operated upon by no hostile feeling towards the whites or towards the Government of the United States, but for bread, for means of subsistence, they commenced depredations on the cattle and other property of the white settlers amongst them. But that is not all. The whole truth requires that I should state that the Government was repeatedly, again and again, admonished, that the destitute condition of the Indians must inevitably lead to hostility on their part; that it must lead to plundering and robberies, and that unless it stationed a sufficient military force within their boundaries, the very consequences which did follow in 1836 must inevitably follow, and they did follow with a most fearful violence not so largely in murdering the white inhabitants, (though murders were committed,) as in plundering property, taking cattle, burning houses, and driving out the white settlers altogether, who, although they had gone there under the sanction of the Government, purchased reservations, and settled down, were absolutely expelled with their families. Those white settlers have thought that they were entitled to some remuneration, after having gone there under the faith of the Government, for the damages sustained in consequence of being expelled from farms which they had purchased under the authority, countenance, and recommendation of the Government. But all that is excepted. We do not propose to pay them one cent on that ground. The whole amount proposed to be paid is for property actually taken, or consumed, or destroyed, by the Indians, and for another large portion included in the same amount of three hundred and odd thousand dollars for stock and cattle taken by the United States troops and friendly Indians, because they had to rush in under circumstances that did not allow proper means to be used for their sustenance.

I believe I have stated all the substantial facts of the case. The honorable Senators who represent the section of the country from which this proposition comes, can state if I have omitted anything material. Under these circumstances, it does appear to me that the Government is under an obligation—the obligation of protection—the obligation of the treaty—which they cannot blink or disregard, to pay at least the amount provided for in the amendment. To show that it was not a state of war, I have only to mention that there was no declaration of war by the authorities, or what were considered the authorities, of the tribe of Indians. It first commenced in licentious depredations on property, dictated and impelled by hunger. What other motives, what feelings of vengeance, if you please, may have entered into the hearts of the warriors who joined the predatory hordes before all was over, no one can tell. Neither did the authorities of the tribes, nor the great body of the Indians, unite with them. It was at last, as I understand, only a fraction of the Indians that became thus hostile and predatory. There is, then, in my judgment, no tenable ground for the position taken by the Committee on Claims in the House of Representatives, in saying that this was a state of public war, which would exclude these claims under the principle laid down in the act of 1816. There was no public war declared. There was no war on the part of the entire tribe. It was but a fraction of the tribe; and even their hostilities were impelled by the strong circumstances I have indicated, and which the Government might have prevented by proper diligence and forecast.

I do not choose to go into the question as to the circumstances under which these irregularities, these hostilities, were allowed to spring up in the Creek nation. I believe I might undertake to state, and might refer to public documents, or, at least, to public speeches, for the purpose of fortifying what I say, that warning was given in due time; that the country was attempted to be notified that this state of things must lead to the very disastrous consequences to which it did lead. I believe it cost the Government $3,000,000 over and above the stipulations of the treaty of 1832, to remove those Indian warriors. I charged it, at the time, to the neglect of the Federal Government. I will not undertake to say, after this lapse of time, after the passions and interests connected with that period have passed away, that I should form the same judgment now. The whole responsibility rested upon the Executive at the time. That expenditure of full $3,000,000, which grew out of the hostilities, was the consequence of that neglect. But I do not wish to review this. I think, however, this is a claim founded in such obligations as this Government cannot disregard.

Mr. HUNTER. These are matters which I do not profess to understand. They have come from other committees; and have doubtless been investigated by them; but I think I have heard enough to convince me at least that this appropriation should not go into the deficiency bill.

This bill as it came from the House of Representatives, appropriates $3,127,000 to supply deficiencies; the Finance Committee of the Senate have added $853,000 more, making in all $3,980,000 appropriated by that bill previous to the amendments which have been offered to-day. It seems to me that there is some danger of our swelling this deficiency bill far too much. If this is a legitimate claim against the Government of the United States, I should conceive that it will be better to postpone the further consideration of it until the Indian appropriation bill comes up. If that is done we shall then have had time to examine the question thoroughly. I confess it is new to me, and I do not understand it. I suggest, therefore, if it will suit the views of the Committee on Indian Affairs, that claims of this nature should be reserved until we have the general Indian appropriation bill before us.

It is impossible, if we should now go into all the affairs connected with all the branches of the appropriations in the deficiency bill, for the Senate to pass them for want of time; as it will consume so much time in their investigation, and we should be compelled to examine the wants of all the Departments. Whereas, if we should confine ourselves to the actual deficiencies, and postpone these questions of claims to the general appropriation bill, we should get on much faster.

In relation to the general merits of this claim, I do not wish to say anything, unless the Senator [Mr. BELL] persists in urging its introduction here. If so, I should have a word or two to say about it.

Mr. CLEMENS. It appears to me that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTER] should have made his objection to admit claims into the deficiency bill long since. It is a little singular that he has permitted all others to pass, and that he should select this particular case for special objection. If he had opposed the admission of other claims, I should now have gone with him; and, however anxious I may be that this one should pass, I would not have complained if others had been rejected. But, when custom-house claims, and light-house claims, and every possible species of appropriation is admitted into the bill, without any objection on the part of the Senator, it is somewhat strange that he should object to this, the most just item of them all.

These depredations were committed in consequence of the faults of the Government. I do not blame the Indians, because, in consequence of the faults of the Government, they were compelled to resort to depredations to procure the means of subsistence. A commissioner, appointed by the Government, reports that it was not the policy of the Administration—although the Indians, in 1834 and 1835, were actually suffering from want of food, and in a starving condition—to supply them with food, because the Government wanted to force them to emigrate. It had failed for years to comply with its obligations to remove them, and finally attempted to starve them into a removal. Under these circumstances, a small portion of the Lower Creeks—for the Upper Creeks did not take any part in the disturbances—a small number of the Lower Creeks, amounting to scarcely a fifth of the tribe, shot down the cattle, and stole the property of the settlers; eventually, these acts led to a state of hostilities, and the settlers were compelled to leave the nation. They come here now, and ask, not for consequential damages arising out of their compulsory removal, but for damages for the actual loss of their property. They ground the claim, not on testimony taken now, but on actual proof taken before the commissioners appointed by Congress at the time, which commissioners report that they were entitled to recover $1,500,000. The commission was appointed on the recommendation of General Jackson.

The payment of this claim has been again and again urged by Presidents of the United States, and again and again reported on by committees of the Senate. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTER] says he does not understand it! Why, we had a full discussion of this very question last Congress; a bill, similar to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL] was introduced by the Committee on Indian Affairs, at my instance; an objection was taken by the Senator from Kentucky, and, after one or two days' debate, we accepted his proposition, to extend the intercourse laws so as to embrace this question. I was willing to accept that proposition then, and I am willing to accept it now, because, as the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] has said, correctly, it would double the amount which we now propose to pay. The Committee on Indian Affairs have reported a bill this session precisely like that reported at the last session. This amendment gives us less than we have a right to claim.

We have been waiting on the justice of Congress for nearly sixteen years, and it is time that something should be done. If the Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTER] had been as anxious to guard the deficiency bill against all other amendments, I should not object to his attempt to exclude this; but when he manifested so much complacency while amendment after amendment was introduced, I think that the objection is made with a very bad grace at this stage of the proceedings.

Mr. HUNTER. I am not aware that I have favored or supported any amendment which did not properly appertain to this deficiency bill. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] reported an amendment which, in my opinion, was for a deficiency. There was a bill passed last year for the erection of a custom-house in the State of Maine, and the sum which it was to cost was limited to a certain amount. By an omission in the bill no appropriation was made for the site. The gentleman from Maine proposed that we should appropriate something for the site. I think that was a deficiency. At any rate, there is a difference of opinion between the Senator from Alabama and myself. I am not aware that any amendment has been offered here to-day to this bill on which a single question has been raised. It is true that amendments have been offered from other committees under the rule as it now stands; but many of these were in relation to matters about which I knew nothing, and, therefore, about which I could say nothing. This amendment proposes to add to this bill a very large amount; and besides, so far as I can understand it, it seems to me to involve a novel principle. What is it? The friends of this amendment say, that by our general policy we were, at a certain period, involved in an Indian war, and that we ought to pay the damages to citizens of the United States who were injured in their property by that war. That is the amount of the principle. For my part, sir, I do not think that we are under any such obligation. Every portion of the country must take its chance in regard to our general legislation or the consequences that may result from it. If any one party or section is injured, they cannot come here and ask us to pay damages on account of our not acting with proper wisdom and caution. The question is, whether this was what could properly be called a war, or whether it was not. I have always understood this to be a war; and if so, I understand the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] to say that the General Government would not be liable. I should like to know from that honorable Senator whether I understand him rightly?

Mr. BELL. I cannot answer categorically. I do not regard this as being a public war in the sense in which that term is used.

Mr. HUNTER. Upon that question I do not pretend to decide. This appears to be a difficult case; and on that account, if on no other, I am inclined to think that it does not properly belong to a deficiency bill. The question, therefore, I think, should be laid over until the general appropriation bill is brought up, when we shall have had time to consider it more fully.

Mr. BELL. I beg leave to say that the objection, as taken by the Senator from Virginia, is taken upon very plausible grounds; but those of us who have had experience in regard to the mode of bringing in general appropriation bills in times past, know very well what the result will be. We know very well, that in a matter of this sort, it would be contended that it should be passed over, in order that more time should be had for deliberation—just the very argument, sir, that is used on the present occasion. When I was up a few minutes ago, I stated that this matter had been under consideration for fourteen years; and I think it is now time that we should come to some conclusion and settle the principle; and whenever it is settled, I think it will be time not misspent, for it appears to me that this question is likely again to arise in this country, and that, perhaps, at no very distant day. Such a war may be brewing at this moment in the Northwest. It is a question to be settled, whether this was such a war as should preclude the satisfaction of these claims by the Government of the United States. If that is so, it should be done seriously, not only because it involves this amount, but because it may involve much larger amounts in time to come. I stated that the Committee on Indian Affairs did not consider this a war in the sense contemplated by the act of 1816, which could indemnify citizens from losses incurred by the ravages of a public enemy. It was no more a public war than are those wild and indiscreet ebullitions of young warriors, who break out every year and commit depredations upon the borders of white settlements. It was a war which had something more in it to justify these claimants in presenting themselves at the door of the public Treasury for indemnification. It was a war which was provoked by the policy of the General Government, not only in leading and inducing white settlers to go and settle among the Indians, but even, when time was taken by the forelock by the citizens of Georgia and Alabama, and the Government was admonished, that if this policy was persisted in, it would result in this description of depredations. These settlers feared for their safety for two years before hostilities broke out. And what was the policy of the Government? I repeat again, sir, that it was to starve these Indians out, and thus to compel their removal.

Mr. CASS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him to inform me where he gets the evidence upon which he makes such an assertion as that?

Mr. BELL. I have the matter in my own recollection, and I think the public documents will be found to contain it.

Mr. CASS. At that time I had a considerable share in the responsibility of this measure; and I venture to say, from my recollection of the matter—though my attention has not been recently called to it—that the Senator will find himself mistaken. I venture to say that the treaty will show express provisions to the contrary.

Mr. BELL. What I stated was in accordance with what the Senator from Alabama [Mr. CLEMENS] had stated in his argument. It was because they permitted these large reservations to be taken, and yet permitted them to be sold, and purchasers to go, and occupy them before the Indians had been removed. That was the cause of the difficulties between the Indians and the white settlers, in the first place. And the Government was warned beforehand in regard to the results of that course. I did not remember that the honorable Senator from Michigan was at the head of the War Department at that period, and I will do him the justice to say that I cannot charge that policy upon him. I will not undertake to state that that honorable gentleman advocated that policy in the Cabinet of which he was a member. I only say it was the policy of the Government at that period, and that policy was to starve the Indians into an emigration.

Mr. CASS. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him? I wish to state that this is a transaction which occurred many years ago, and of course I have an indistinct recollection in regard to it. This I recollect, that I made the treaty, in which I was aided by one of the purest men in the country, the predecessor of the Senator from Tennessee in this House, Judge White, of Tennessee, who from the beginning to the end acted upon it. The Government was disposed to extinguish the Indian title in those States, and they wished the Indians to go; and every man who knows what was the condition of the Indians then, knows that they must have gone. The Indians were unwilling to go. The pressure upon the General Government, however, was immense to have the country opened to the white settlers. We could not sweep them all off at once, we could only remove a portion of them at a time, as we had done in other cases.

Mr. CLEMENS. I wish to state, as the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] has said it was the policy of the Government to starve out the Indians, and as I had said the same thing, what was my authority for saying so.

“Mr. Balch, a Government commissioner, appointed by the President to investigate the causes that led to the Indian hostilities in 1836, reported that, in the latter part of the year 1834, the Creeks suffered for the want of food; that in 1835 they were reduced to a state little short of starvation; but, he said, ‘it was contrary to the policy of the Government to supply them with food, as this act of benevolence would have retarded emigration.’”—Ex. Doc., 2d sess. 24th Cong., No. 154, p. 157.

Mr. CASS. May I inquire when that document was dated?

Mr. CLEMENS. It is a document of the second session of the Twenty-fourth Congress.

Mr. CASS. Allow me to say a single word.

Mr. BELL. Does the Senator wish me to yield the floor?

Mr. CASS. Only for a few moments. I wish to say that Mr. Balch, as a commissioner, says what he had no right to say. It was after my time; but I know that, at no time, had he any authority to say, in giving a reason for these difficulties, that any Government that ever had the authority in the United States, desired to starve the Indians, with a view to compel them to remove.

Mr. BELL. Not to starve them absolutely, but not to give them supplies.

Mr. CASS. Allow me to say that, as I have long lived among the Indians, and have known their habits, there is no portion of this country in which there are Indians where there is not great suffering among them; and, in the northern part of the country, there is no winter passes in which a considerable number of them do not die from starvation. It will never do to think of supplying their wants, by any appropriations we can make. It would actually seem that they do not know or care for what to-morrow may bring forth; and it is no imputation upon the humanity of any Government, that they did not establish depôts throughout the country, with a view to ask our starving Indians to come to them to be fed. There is not a gentleman on this floor who does not know that. It is deeply to be regretted; but the question is, what is the remedy to be applied? Not that remedy, most assuredly. That will do no good, either to them or to us.

But with respect to Mr. Balch, allow me to say that he never had the slightest authority to make such an announcement as to the action of any American Government. But I repeat that it was after my time, and I am not responsible for it; yet, under whatever Administration this occurred, I disavow the sentiment.

Mr. BELL. I think the Senator is trying to escape from the point which is urged with reference to the validity of this claim.

Mr. CASS. I did not say a word on that subject.

Mr. BELL. Well, sir, whatever may have been the policy of the General Government, (and I am willing to admit that it has often been humane and liberal,) it cannot be denied that the Government was warned, that unless these Indians were supplied with provisions, or an adequate military force was stationed in that section of the country, these evils would result. Now, the honorable Senator from Michigan may draw what conclusion he pleases; but one great point on which we rely, is, that the Government was forewarned. I do not know on what authority Commissioner Balch made this statement, but that was the report, and it was not disavowed by the Government at the time. There may be better authority than that of Mr. Balch. I believe there is, and that it will be found in the document referred to. The Government certainly refused either to supply the means of subsistence to these Indians, or to furnish a competent force to suppress these outrages. And what escape is there from it? The honorable Senator from Michigan says, that such a treaty was made, and that they had not reserved the power to coerce the Indians, after they had made their reservations. The policy of the Government was to get the Indians out of the country. They made a treaty—the best one perhaps which they could make, under the circumstances; and one of the provisions of that treaty allowed the Indians to make reservations which were to be sold under regulations to be prescribed by the General Government, and they retained no power to coerce their removal under the conditions of the sale of these reservations.

From the year 1830 to the year 1834—the time when these settlements were taking place, and while these reservations were being made—the settlers perceived what would be the consequences unless the Indians were removed; and when they found that the condition of the Indians was such as to threaten these depredations, they warned the Government, in such a manner as should have received attention, that, unless the Indians were furnished with provisions, their destitute condition would impel them to commit these depredations, or that, if they did not supply them with the means of subsistence, they ought to station a suitable military force in that section to repel the depredations to which they were exposed. The Government then sanctioned the principle of coercing their removal, not by starving them actually to death, but by causing them to feel that their true resources, and their very subsistence depended upon their removal to the west of the Mississippi. Things continued in that condition from 1834 to 1836, when the depredations commenced; and, as the honorable Senator from Alabama has stated, not one fifth of the Creek Indians were engaged in it. It was a matter to be inquired into by the commissioners appointed by the Executive Government, what proportion of these tribes took part in these depredations upon the property of these petitioners. That was one of the purposes for which the commission was instituted, and one on which they reported.

I say, then, Mr. President, that it was not only no public war, in the sense in which that term is used in regard to the laws of nations and the treaties which treat of the laws of war or the laws of nations, with respect to foreign wars in regard to depredations by a foreign enemy upon the property of citizens—not only is it no such war, but I hold that these depredations were provoked by what was the unfortunate policy of the Government in regard to the Creek Indians who held reservations and who refused to remove. They held starvation over them as a rod to compel them to emigrate beyond the Mississippi.

I think that if the General Government had provoked a general war, they would have owed an indemnity to citizens who suffered by it, and that they should pay for these depredations. Individuals were encouraged, and recommended to go in and settle among these Indians, by the Government itself; and what we propose now is, only to pay one fourth part of the entire amount of damages which they claimed, and which they seem to have proved before the commissioners—I mean the consequential damages from being coerced from their farms, and being compelled to fly for their lives, leaving not only their farms, but their cattle and household goods.

I commenced stating some reasons to the Senator from Virginia why this is a proper occasion to act upon this appropriation. If we leave it till the general appropriation bill comes up, it will from necessity be passed over to the next Congress. We know from long experience that the general appropriation bills are the last that are taken up. You may remember that at the last session of Congress it was at the last hour at which Congress, under the Constitution, could sit, that those bills were brought here, and some question was likely to arise whether the acts passed at that time were passed constitutionally. I believe they did not pass until the morning of the fourth, instead of the third of March. So it will be again, and so I think it is destined to be so long as this Government stands.

There must be some intermediate period when Congress has more leisure and more disposition and opportunity to examine claims of this kind, if they are to be settled with due deliberation. This deficiency bill offers the most suitable occasion that can arise for that purpose. I consider that this is fully verified from past experience. The only discussion we are likely to have, is upon this deficiency bill, for if it is put over to the close of the session, it will be all we can do to pass the ordinary appropriations for the maintenance of the General Government. It is for that reason, that unless those who are interested in the proposition, request me to withdraw it, I must continue to press it.

Mr. RUSK. I regard these claims—although part of the facts have escaped me, having investigated it some years ago—as being as just as any that could come before Congress. The intercourse laws of the United States do not extend to the States of Georgia and Alabama; if they had, these claims would have been paid long since. A bill was passed by the Senate, after a full investigation of all the facts, so as to extend the full authority of the intercourse laws of the United States to the time when the depredations were committed by these Indians. It was passed by the Senate, but was lost in the House of Representatives. It was passed by the Senate, after a full investigation of all the facts connected with the case.

The depredations were committed by the Indians, not during a state of war, but in a mere outbreak of a portion of the tribe, and were committed on the citizens of Georgia and Alabama. Most of these people were very poor, and they suffered the loss of their cattle and corn by the spoliation of the Indians, whilst some of their property was taken from them by the troops who were sent out to suppress the disturbances. I do not think any argument can be based on the causes which led to these depredations, in opposition to the claims of these people for remuneration from the Treasury of the United States. It is said that the policy of the Administration may have led the Indians to make these depredations, if so, it makes the claim stronger. But whatever that policy might be, if the intercourse law which was applied everywhere else had applied to the States of Georgia and Alabama, these would have been just claims, and would have been settled by that law. They have, besides, been thoroughly investigated, and estimates have been reported by the Commissioners appointed by the Government. The most of them, I believe, have been made by people in indigent circumstances, who lost their property years ago, without any fault on their part, and claim indemnity on a principle applied to every other State where you have Indians. Under these circumstances, it seems to me a just claim; and, so far from rejecting it from this deficiency bill, so far from there being any reason why it should not be paid, it seems to me eminently worthy of favorable consideration. It has been postponed, and postponed, for fourteen years. It has been investigated by a commission appointed by the Government. It has been several times investigated by the Indian Bureau, and also by the Committee on Indian Affairs, and found to be correct. Under these circumstances, I think, it is the duty of the Government promptly to pay the debt.

Mr. DAWSON. I desire to say a few words for the purpose of presenting the facts as they really exist.

In 1826 and in 1834 treaties were made by the General Government with the Creek Indians, residing within the limits of Alabama. By the terms of those treaties, all the lands of the tribe, save those which they reserved as head-rights, belonged to the Government of the United States. The Government, immediately after the confirmation of the treaties, took possession of the whole of the lands save the reservations. In 1834—and I would be glad if Senators would remark the date—the Government of the United States exposed at public sale, all the lands thus obtained from the Creek Indians within the limits of Alabama; thereby inviting the citizens of the United States, rich and poor, to purchase and settle these lands in the midst of the Indians who occupied the reservations. That was the first attempt on the part of the Government to establish the policy of settling the white man in the neighborhood of the red man. Immediately after this occurred, in accordance with the terms of the same treaty, the Government of the United States authorized the Indians, not the Indians of the nation in their national character, but the Indians who had become head-right reserves, to dispose of their reservations; and appointed an agent, under the treaty, to see that these reservations were sold to the white man, and that no fraud was practiced on the Indians. That was the relation occupied by the Government with respect to these parties at that time.

The Indians accordingly sold the lands under the superintendence of an agent appointed by the Government, and they were left landless. Their plantations being gone, and the game being driven out of the country, in what condition were the Indians left? Without soil to cultivate, or money to purchase the necessities of life. There they were. And whose policy kept them there? That of the Government of the United States. What, then, was the duty of the Government of the United States? It was to encourage emigration, according to the stipulations of the treaty. Lands were provided for the Indians west of the Mississippi river, and the Government was bound to pay for their transportation, and to appoint agents to consummate that transportation. Government failed to do that, and the Lower Creeks were left in Alabama in a state of almost starvation, and they commenced their depredations for the purpose of sustaining life. Upon whom did they commit their depredations? Upon the white emigrants; the poor men who had first settled there; that class of persons who always settle all new countries. These poor people found themselves with their families—not with their negro plantations but—surrounded with Indians; and day after day necessity drove these Lower Creeks to take their stock of every description, and to go into their corn-fields, and destroy their crops; and finally, in 1835, these very Indians attacked the line of stages running from the State of Georgia to Montgomery, and killed the driver and some of the passengers, and took possession of everything they found. Why was this done? Merely to get the means of subsistence. Whose fault kept them there, and rendered this deprivation inevitable on their part? That of the Government of the United States. Well, sir, did the Government of the United States at that day recognize the consequences in which they had thus involved themselves? Have gentlemen looked back to see whether they are about to do justice by voting against this claim, or not?

In the year 1836, President Jackson, in his annual message, recommended to the Congress of the United States the ascertainment of those losses and to make an appropriation for the payment of these claims. Congress, in accordance with this request, passed a bill authorizing the Government of the United States to appoint three commissioners to ascertain the extent and character of those losses. Who appointed those commissioners? General Jackson appointed them; and they were men of high character. They visited that country. And let me say here, that Georgia has very little interest in these claims, although many citizens of Georgia went to Alabama, and settled there. These claims were investigated, and the losses ascertained. And, to what did they amount? Why, sir, losses to the amount of upwards of $1,000,000 were proved. But the commissioners decided, that under the act of 1816, and under the principles which should control the action of Congress in relation to spoiliations of this kind, only three hundred and odd thousand dollars should be paid.

Mr. SEWARD. Will the honorable Senator from Georgia allow me to ask him whether, in this stage of the argument, he can give an account of the principle of the law of 1816? I want to know what that principle is.

Mr. DAWSON. I cannot, at this moment, state it precisely; but I will send for the law, and the honorable Senator can see what it is.

These commissioners made their report, and on the next meeting of Congress, the President laid the whole matter before them, through the report of Mr. Joel R. Poinsett, the then Secretary of War, and asked for an appropriation to pay these claims. That appropriation was made by the Senate of the United States, and the bill making it went to the House of Representatives, and there failed.

Now, I ask, in all justice and humanity to these people who first settled the State of Alabama, on what principle you will deny them compensation? Is there a State in this Union that has been injured in this way that has not had an appropriation granted? Why, sir, this has sometimes been done by the State Legislatures. The State of Georgia paid to her citizens $100,000 for losses sustained by spoiliations of this kind. And yet, sir, you deny to the people of Alabama, and to a small remnant of people once belonging to the State of Georgia, but now located in Alabama and Florida, any remuneration whatever. Shall we deny them compensation according to the principles you have invariably established, and that, too, when the justice and equity of the claim is so strong that the only resort taken, the only objection made is, that it is improper to attach it to this deficiency bill? Sir, you have an application here to pay a large increase of compensation to the Collins line of steamers—an application to increase compensation to those who do not need it; while you would deny it to those who were the first settlers of the State of Alabama. When this application is made, we are restless and uneasy, and not willing to listen to the claims of honest and suffering citizens. In the language of Senators who have spoken on this floor, it is too true that we are ready to vote large amounts for anything of a distinguished character, which will command the attention of the Senate; but when a multitude of small men come and ask you to give them what is justly theirs, you pass them by, and leave them to their poverty and wretchedness.

Mr. President, I have looked into this matter with a great deal of care and attention. I was connected with all these transactions. Talk of its being a war! It did result in a war. A thousand fellow-citizens were there engaged, and many of them lost their lives in consequence of the conduct of this Government. This I saw with my own eyes. I saw crowds of poor families who had to fly to Georgia, leaving all their property in the hands and at the mercy of these Indians, glad enough to escape with their lives; and yet the claims of these people are to be disregarded, when by your own acts you induced them to go and settle in the State of Alabama. Sir, I hope that, before a body like this, with a full feeling to do justice, it is needless to argue if the facts are only known.

In 1838, the State of Alabama, being perhaps a little more involved in internal improvements than the State of Georgia, could not step forward to relieve her distressed citizens; and she made a memorial to Congress, praying Congress to take into consideration the condition of those poor people, who had been brought to that condition, not by any act of the government of Alabama, but in consequence of the inducements held out by the General Government to these people, to go and settle in the midst of the Indians there. Yet it is suggested that this claim is not founded in justice and equity. If it be not, I know of none that is; and it does seem to me, that no Senator who will take time to examine these facts, will deny to these people the sum of a little more than $300,000, when those very distinguished men, the commissioners, stated that they had actually lost more than a million of dollars; but that according to the principle established by the Government, only something over $300,000 could be paid.

But I beg the honorable Senator from Michigan to understand that no imputation should be cast upon the Administration then. They were acting for the good of the country; but the Indians were too ignorant to understand their object and wishes. What more? When a war broke out, General Jackson, for the purpose of inquiring into these things, through the then Secretary of War, to whom the South owes a great deal for his liberality and kindness towards the Indians, appointed one of the cleverest men in this country, Mr. Balch, to go to that country and inquire into the causes that led to this very war. And what did he report? I beg the honorable Senator from Michigan to understand that it was not intended to cast the slightest imputation on that Administration, either upon those who have gone from us, or those who remain. He says the causes were these. He says he has investigated the causes which led to these hostilities; and he says:

"In 1835 they were reduced to a state little short of starvation, but he said it was contrary to the policy of the Government to supply them with food, as this act of benevolence would have retarded emigration."

They would not afford to the Indians the means of subsistence, because that would induce them to remain on the soil after the disposition of their own reservations, and make the Government supply them. They adopted the policy, to keep from them the materials necessary to life, in order that they might induce them to emigrate.

Mr. BADGER. To starve them out.

Mr. DAWSON. I do not use such language.

Mr. BELL. I do. It is only a commentary on my words.

Mr. DAWSON. That was the object; and allow me to state to the Senate, that as soon as these facts were discovered, the Administration established emigration offices there, to induce the Indians to come in, and to feed them, and to prepare their minds for emigration. That was all that they could do, and hence, I say, no imputation can be cast on that Administration. But I wish to waive everything of that nature connected with any member of that Administration; and to bring the justice of this case before the Senate for its action.

What is the result of these proceedings? An appropriation of a little more than $300,000, to be distributed amongst three or four hundred heads of families. Look at the number of applicants on the list, for amounts averaging from $50 to $500—there are few for $1,000. That will show the character of the population, and the necessity thrown on these people, a necessity which was more oppressive than that thrown on the Indians of that day. Why, sir, if this body could have seen those who live on the banks of the Chattahoochee, it would see that it was impossible for those of us who volunteered our services to protect the lives of the women and children from savage fury; to depict the poverty and wretchedness of the people of Georgia, South Carolina, Alabama, and Tennessee, who had settled there, and who looked imploringly to their kindred on the other bank for protection. Is there nothing due to them in consideration of such sufferings? Are we to restrain all our sensibilities when a poor appropriation of $300,000 is asked for? and shall we seek to get around it, because it is not legitimately appropriated in a deficiency bill? Sir, I will say no more.

Mr. HALE. I have a difficulty in my mind, which I hope some of the friends of the amendment may be able to remove. I notice that the honorable Senator from Texas, who advocated the amendment, said that if the laws in regard to Indian intercourse had been extended to the States of Georgia and Alabama, there would have been no difficulty; and the honorable Senator from Georgia, who has just taken his seat, says that the commissioners who were appointed to investigate the matter, reported that damages were actually sustained to the amount of over $1,000,000; but that, in pursuance of the policy which had hitherto governed this Government, they could only pay $355,000. Now, sir, my difficulty is this; to find any principle of public law, which has ever been recognized by this Government, that will authorize you to pay one cent in this case. I understand that the principle assigned in regard to spoiliations committed by a public enemy, since the last war with Great Britain, has been limited to this: that when private property is destroyed by a public enemy, in consequence of its being occupied by the armed forces of the United States, and by that means hostilities are attracted to it, then the Government is bound to make good the damage. So that, if I understand the action of this Government hitherto, it has limited itself to making compensation to the sufferers from the depredations of a public enemy, by that rule. It must be private property occupied by the troops of the United States, and by that means inviting aggression, to call upon the Government for remuneration. This clearly does not come within the rule. There is another general law, (and, if the Senate will excuse me, I will say a higher law, than that by which we have acknowledged ourselves to be governed in our sublimary matters here, by which every Government is bound to protect every citizen in the enjoyment of all his rights; but that law has not been carried into such practical operation,) that if private property is injured by a mob, or injured by a public enemy in open war, an obligation is imposed upon the Government to remunerate for the loss. Well, then, if there be any principle of public policy upon which the Government has ever acted, which would make it liable in this case, it must arise from the Indian intercourse law referred to by the Senator from Texas, or the act of 1816, referred to by the Senator from Georgia. Now, sir, I do not know but that they may be perfectly familiar to the rest of the Senate, but they are not so to me. I have never heard any system of policy avowed here upon the floor of the Senate, that would justify the payment of this damage in any way. I do not say that there is none. I do not know but there may be; but if there be, it must arise either out of the Indian intercourse law, or the law of 1816, which has been spoken of.

Mr. CLEMENS. I hope the honorable Senator from New Hampshire will allow me to state a few facts which do not seem to be understood.

Mr. HALE. I would be glad if the Senator from Alabama would answer my question. I would then give way to him with great pleasure.

Mr. CLEMENS. I will answer it by a mere statement of facts. There are some facts which it is important to understand in this question, and which do not seem to be understood by the Senate. A portion of the opponents of this appropriation go upon the ground that there was a public war. Why, there was no such thing. Although there was a state of actual hostilities, yet there never was a public war. The portion of the Indians who were engaged in these depredations, consisted of less than one fifth of the Creek nation. The Upper Creeks constitute the largest portion of the nation, and never had anything to do with it. They were removed from beyond it almost entirely; and of the Lower Creeks, fifteen hundred warriors were enrolled under General Jesup, to assist the authorities of the United States in suppressing those depredations. There never was any act of the Indian Council which recognized the existence of war. On the contrary, it was denied by the Indian chiefs. They denied that any war existed. They said this was the act of desperadoes, over whom the council had no control, and whom they aided the troops of the United States in arresting and punishing. That is one fact.

This was no public war. If it had been a public war, I admit the principle which was applied in the House of Representatives would have applied in this case, and would have excluded these settlers from any right of compensation.

Again, in the report submitted by Mr. Balch, he goes on to say:

"Under these calamitous circumstances, many of the Creeks wandered off in small parties, and committed aggressions upon the property of the white settlers."

It will be seen that this was not a public war in which hostilities were waged, but that the Creeks, wandering off in small parties, committed aggressions on the property of the whites.

Mr. Balch proceeds:

"Towards the close of this year, and in the beginning of 1835, the condition of the Creeks became deplorable. Corn and meat were exceedingly scarce. The white people, who had moved in, and who possessed means, purchased, at enormous prices, all the provisions that were to be sold. It is said, and no doubt truly, that the Indians often stripped off the inner bark of trees, and after boiling it in water, drank this decoction as a substitute for food. The women and their children asked permission to glean up the small potatoes which were left after removing the main crop, and regarded this permission as an inestimable favor."

"All these views are confirmed by the letters of their Excellencies Governors Schley and Clay."

All these facts were brought to the notice of the Government at that time. The Government was urged, by the Executive officers of Georgia and Alabama and Florida, to take steps for the removal of the Indians, anticipating the existence of the very state of things which finally occurred.

Now, as I understand it, the principle which is established by the intercourse law is, that for depredations committed by the Indians on the frontier settlers when no public war exists, this Government will pay a reasonable amount. We asked for this; and the Senate, at the last session, agreed to grant it. What we asked then was more than we ask now. It would give us double what is now asked. If the intercourse law was applied to the States of Alabama and Georgia, it would give us double the amount now sought to be obtained.

I have been asked how this amount has been arrived at. I will state it. Upon the recommendation of President Jackson, commissioners were appointed, in the year 1836, to go into the Indian territory and ascertain the amount of losses, which had been sustained by the citizens of Alabama almost entirely—a few of them may have been Georgians, and a few Floridians, but most of them were Alabamians—five sixths of the sufferers, I might say, were from the State of Alabama. These commissioners made a laborious investigation into the causes of hostilities in the first place; and they took the whole proof in relation to the losses which had been sustained by the settlers. They rejected all consequential damages. They allowed for corn, fodder, and cattle actually lost. The actual loss only amounted to $355,000. They reported that sum to the Government, and recommended that it should be paid. The amount of consequential damages was $1,500,000. They were rejected. We ask now for payment only for the actual loss, and not for consequential damages. We wish to be paid for the property actually destroyed. The proof was taken at the time, and is now upon the records of the Government.

Mr. RUSK. The Senator from New Hampshire inquired, a little while ago, for the intercourse law. I will read for him the seventeenth section of that law. It was an act passed on the 30th of June, 1834, entitled "An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontier." The seventeenth section of the act provides:

"Sec. 17. And be it further enacted, That if any Indian or Indians, belonging to any tribe in amity with the United States, shall, within the Indian country, take or destroy the property of any person lawfully within such country, or shall pass from the Indian country into any State or Territory inhabited by citizens of the United States, and there take, steal, or destroy, any horse, horses, or other property, belonging to any citizen or inhabitant of the United States, such citizen or inhabitant, his representative, attorney, or agent, may make application to the proper superintendent, agent, or sub agent, who, upon being furnished with the necessary documents and proofs, shall, under the direction of the President, make application to the nation or tribe to which said Indian or Indians shall belong, for satisfaction; and if such nation or tribe shall neglect or refuse to make satisfaction, in a reasonable time, not exceeding twelve months, it shall be the duty of such superintendent, agent, or sub agent, to make return of his doings to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, that such further steps may be taken as shall be proper, in the opinion of the President, to obtain satisfaction for the injury; and, in the mean time, in respect to the property so taken, stolen, or destroyed, the United States guarantee to the party so injured an eventual indemnification: Provided, That if such injured party, his representative, attorney, or agent, shall in any way violate any of the provisions of this act, by seeking or attempting to obtain private satisfaction or revenge, he shall forfeit all claim upon the United States for such indemnification: And provided also, That, unless such claim shall be presented within three years after the commission of the injury, the same shall be barred. And if the nation or tribe to which such Indian may belong receive an annuity from the United States, such claim shall, at the next payment of the annuity, be deducted therefrom, and paid to the party injured; and if no annuity is payable to such nation or tribe, then the amount of the claim shall be paid from the Treasury of the United States: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent the legal apprehension and punishment of any Indians having so offended."

This act does not extend to the States of Alabama, Georgia, and Florida, for the first section of that act declares—

"That all that part of the United States west of the Mississippi, and not within the States of Missouri and Louisiana, or the Territory of Arkansas, and also that part of the United States east of the Mississippi river, and not within any State to which the Indian title has not been extinguished, for the purposes of this act, be taken and deemed to be the Indian country."

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Alabama, if I understand him, and I believe I do, does not put this, then, upon the ground upon which the Senator from Georgia did. The Senator from Georgia said this was eventually a public war.

Mr. DAWSON. I stated that there was never any declaration of war against these tribes. There was some fighting.

Mr. HALE. It resulted in war. You know, sir, as well as I do, that a war can take place between this country and another without any previous declaration, but by a simple resolve that war does exist.

The Senator from Alabama then puts it upon another ground. He does not put it upon the ground that this was the act of a public enemy. Now, I confess I am not conversant with the laws relating to intercourse with the Indian tribes, because I have not had occasion to look into them; but it appears to me, if this case is to be taken out of the general principle, it must be on account of one of these acts—the act regulating Indian intercourse, or the act of 1816, to which the Senator from Georgia referred. It strikes me, from the very cursory reading which the Senator from Texas gave to the act in relation to Indian intercourse, that it does not apply to this case at all, and I will tell him why. It applies evidently to the case of Indians on the frontier with whom we have existing treaties, and to whom we are bound to pay annuities.

Mr. RUSK. These Indians are of that description.

Mr. HALE. This was a measure of precaution, that the Government might hold in its hands the means of coercing them to a faithful performance of treaty obligations. But if they fail to preserve peace—if they commit depredations on the property of citizens within our borders, then the Indian superintendent is to notify the President, and such steps are ultimately to be taken, that those who suffer shall be remunerated out of the annuities to be paid to the Indians.

Mr. RUSK. What does "eventual indemnification" mean?

Mr. HALE. It means that the President, or Congress, will retain out of the annuities to be paid to the Indians the amount of damages requisite to satisfy the depredations which they commit.

Mr. RUSK. That is not the practice.

Mr. HALE. It seems to me that it is not in this case. The advocates of the amendment have failed to show any principle of public law recognized by this Government, or any other, which will justify this amendment. There have been, and always will be, vast sufferings in any civilized or savage community by individuals from the acts of public enemies, and the acts of mobs and lawless individuals. Riots take place in every well-organized community, and in every community that is not well organized, because you cannot organize any community so well but that there will be lawless men, who will not submit to the restraints of law. But no community has acknowledged the obligation to pay damages done by lawless individuals, unless it has been recognized by a pre-existing statute. I might refer to a Commonwealth which considers herself one of the most refined and highly-cultivated within the limits of the whole United States; I might refer to the old Commonwealth of Massachusetts. Within sight of her Capitol stand the black and smoky walls of a Catholic convent which was burnt down by a mob some twenty years ago. Its owners have been petitioning the Legislature of Massachusetts from that day to this for remuneration; but the first cent has not yet been paid, because that Commonwealth does not recognize the obligation to pay it, and does not admit that it is a rule of policy for the government of a State to remunerate for damages thus suffered, unless the obligation has been admitted by a previous statute. In some of the States—in Maryland, in Pennsylvania, and in many others—previous statutes have acknowledged that right.

PUBLISHED AT WASHINGTON, BY JOHN C. RIVES.—TERMS $3 FOR THIS SESSION.

32d CONGRESS, 1st Session.

TUESDAY, MAY 18, 1852.

NEW SERIES....No. 86.

I once made an attempt to introduce a bill into the Senate assuming that obligation upon the Government of the United States, so far as the District of Columbia was concerned; but I could not get leave to introduce the bill; nor could I get the Senate to come to a vote on the question, whether or not they would give me leave, and it stands among the unfinished business of Congress that a vote was never taken upon giving leave to introduce the bill. The Senate was occupied for months in discussing the question whether leave should be granted to introduce the bill. So this Government has not acknowledged that obligation.

I admit that if you go to the higher law of morals and Christian obligation—of doing unto others as you would they should do unto you, we ought to pay this money. But we have never admitted that principle. I think Mr. Jefferson said, a good many years ago, when he was instructing our commissioners to negotiate with one of the Barbary tribes, in order to induce them to lend a favorable ear to our application—and he never told a greater truth in his life—that this Government was in no sense founded upon Christianity. Until we do admit those obligations, I think this is not one of those cases in which we are bound to pay.

Mr. BELL. It was contended that a bill once passed the Senate of the United States in obedience to the suggestions of honorable Senators, compelling these Indians to come within the provisions of the intercourse law—to pay for these depredations out of their annuities. That bill did not become an act of Congress. The delegation from the Creek nation protested in the strongest terms against the passage of the act, alleging, in conformity with facts already stated in this debate, that the tribe of Creek Indians, as a tribe, were never engaged in this war. Mr. President, perhaps you may know of your own knowledge something in regard to that subject. I understand that the fact is stated in these documents, that the Upper Creeks were never engaged in the war. The census which had been taken about the time of that treaty, or a short time afterwards, showed that the whole number of the Creek Indians amounted to twenty-one thousand, exclusive of negroes. There were twenty-one thousand of Creeks proper. The Creeks of the lower towns numbered, all told, only about eight thousand Indians, or a little over one third of the whole tribe. The warriors of those lower towns of the Creek nation were those who were engaged in these outrages. The body of the Creek Indians continued friendly. This was the ground upon which the Creek nation of Indians, through their delegated authorities, have always protested that they should not be called upon to pay for these depredations. They were not authorized by the public Council of the nation; and they say that but a portion of the tribe—not more than one fifth—were ever involved in them. I know it was considered by some—and perhaps some of the commissioners reported, but it is not true—that the warriors of the nation generally became involved in it. The allegation was afterwards satisfactorily disproved.

Upon this showing the Government did not proceed with the matter. Congress did not proceed to pass the bill by which it was proposed to retain one of the annuities due to the Creek Indians, the amount of these claims for indemnity for property taken. It is true that their protest, fortified by the proofs they adduced, shows that the largest portion of the Indians continued friendly all the time, and that a very large number of them enlisted in the service of the United States for the purpose of suppressing the hostile bands of the lower towns.

Now, upon what principle can it be proposed to take from the annuities of the whole tribe—annuities belonging to a nation which numbers twenty-one thousand souls—to pay for depredations which were committed by but a few of the towns, and in which but little more than one third of the whole body of the Indians belonging to the nation were engaged? There is no principle upon which the annuities can be retained to pay for this. That has been thought of heretofore; it has been objected to the claim before. Why did not the Government retain the money out of the annuities due these Indians under the treaty, according to the principle of the intercourse law? The allegation on which that claim was founded was disproved—I mean the claim of the right of the Government to exact a payment of these indemnities out of their annuities—because it was satisfactorily shown that the Indians as a tribe, in their tribal character, never concurred in the hostilities, and never engaged in them.

I do not care to go into the argument of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire. He seems to think that there is nothing new in this case. He must remember that there are two or three considerations which could not possibly arise under the act of 1816. These considerations were, that the Government of the United States was called upon by the executive authorities, as the documents show, again and again—and the honorable Senators from Georgia and Alabama can set me right if I am mistaken—to station a sufficient force to repress these threatened hostilities, and they warned the Government of what the consequence would be. Yet it failed to provide for them. The Government was warned by the authorities of Georgia and Alabama, that if supplies were not furnished to the Indians the inevitable consequence would be that these depredations would ensue. What they foretold the Government of the United States, actually came to pass within two years from the time when they were warned that such would be the consequence. Now, does that constitute no new feature in the obligations of the Government? Is it like the case alluded to by the Senator from New Hampshire? This is an Indian tribe; these people are not foreign to us in the proper sense of the word. This tribe has acknowledged its dependence on the Government of the United States since 1790 down to the present time. Although we pretend to make treaties, and do make treaties, with them in all the forms that belong to treaties made with foreign nations, yet we know that they are not made upon the footing that the Indians are an independent and a free people, but that influences are brought to bear upon them. They are treated, in fact and in substance, as a dependent people; and although we choose to be liberal to them, yet we dictate to them terms. We have been liberal in annuities and in payments of money to them in consideration of their lands. The policy of the Government has generally been liberal and bountiful in the highest degree. But when we look at all the circumstances in which these people were placed, we find the general policy was departed from in relation to the Creek Indians—I mean the policy of protection toward the white settlers after they had been admitted to settle in the territories was departed from. It was a consequence which was foreseen by many at the time the treaty was made as likely to follow.

The Government was premonished that unless supplies were furnished to the Indians for subsistence, or unless an adequate military force were stationed in the country, depredations upon the property of the white citizens would be the consequence. The Government stood by, suffering time to elapse, waiting to see the effect of the starvation policy upon the Indians to coerce their removal, until outbreaks actually commenced. Does that make no alteration in the obligations of the Government to protect its own citizens, whom it had induced to go in and settle among Indians? It had sold these public lands to white settlers, and authorized them to enter the Indian reservations before the removal of the Indians.

I think that none of the general principles applicable to the obligations of the Government to indemnify citizens for losses of property incurred in a war, even if it were a general war of the tribe, are strictly applicable to this case. The war, if war it can be called, did not accrue under ordinary circumstances. There are no such wars treated of in any system of international law, or recognized between civilized nations. We have not treated with them as equals. Our policy towards them has not been, in all respects, similar to that by which we are bound to be governed in treating with independent civilized nations.

Mr. SEWARD. How was the war ended?

Mr. BELL. The war was ended by the flight of the hostile warriors into the Territory of Florida, and by the return of a portion of them afterwards, under the guarantee of protection by the United States Government, and then by a partially coerced removal. They were removed in the presence, and under the threatening of the United States Army.

Mr. DAWSON. They were removed by the Army.

Mr. BELL. It was a coerced removal. The warriors who were guilty of these depredations on property, or the most mischievous of them, fled into Florida. A portion of them were Seminole Indians, in fact, although that is not named in the amendment I have offered. The documents will show that a portion of them were Seminole Indians. But they, by the by, were only a portion of the Creek nation as it was originally constituted.

It seems to me that no general principle known to this Government in regulating our policy in the indemnifying of our citizens for property lost in a war with civilized nations applies to this tribe. Then, if you consider them in their dependent condition—if you come to consider whether we can properly be called upon to pay for depredations committed by an Indian tribe in a state of war, we find that there was no such war by this tribe of Indians as would make the principle operative between the claimants for damages and the Government—I mean the common principle adopted as to property lost in a war with a civilized Power. The other points of view which have been suggested, intervene to take away all pretense for applying the general principle of the act of 1816 to this case. The Government stood with its arms folded, and was warned, again and again, that unless supplies were sent to prevent the Indians from starving, or unless an adequate military force was sent, these depredations would follow.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wish to ask the honorable Senator a question. I want to know what stipulations were entered into in the treaty which the Government made with the Creek Indians on the part of the Government for their removal, and whether the Government took all the steps promptly and readily for the execution of that treaty on its part to secure the removal of the Indians? for if the Government failed in that respect, and these depredations were the result of the conduct of Government, it seems to me we ought to pay for them. I should like to hear the honorable Senator from Tennessee, who is so learned upon these matters, because it has been his duty for many years, as I know, to attend to all these Indian treaties, give us the facts in regard to the treaty with the Creek Indians, if he can.

Mr. BELL. I cannot give all the stipulations in the treaty from memory, because I have only lately looked into such stipulations of it as are applicable to this question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is all I want.

Mr. BELL. In that treaty, unfortunately, the Government retained no power to compel the removal of these Indians. A large portion were permitted to take reservations. A condition of the treaty was, that the body of the Indians who did not take reservations to reside on them, should remove to the West. What was the precise terms used as to their removal, I do not remember. I can undertake to say, that at any time the Indians were ready to remove, the Government would have removed them; for the policy of removal was then in active and vigorous operation with regard to all the tribes of Indians within the borders of the States. I imagine that there was no delinquency on the part of the Government in that respect. The great error of the policy of the Government was to sell out the public lands ceded by the treaty of 1832 to white settlers, and permit them to go upon and settle alongside the Indian reserves, and in the midst of the whole Indian tribe, before they were removed.

Mr. COOPER. In some instances, their reservations were taken possession of.

Mr. BELL. They alleged many causes of grievance. They alleged that one cause of the outbreak was, that the whites took possession of their reservations before they had parted with them; but I saw no satisfactory proof of any such outbreak committed by the whites. You know, Mr. President, that it would be impossible to prevent trespasses of that sort in every individual case. But from the general scope of the evidence adduced in the reports which have been made on the subject, I think there is no reason to believe that the white settlers treated the Indians in any other than an amicable and friendly manner. It was the policy of the Government to remove the Indians in due time, and to sell out their reserves. It was expected that the reservees would remove with the great body of the tribe, but it turned out differently. From the moment that the policy of the Government was known, when it was known that in order to obtain the removal of the Indians, the Government intended to make them dependent on it for subsistence, and to compel them to remove, the Government must hold that that policy would lead to depredations and hostilities. It did lead to those depredations and hostilities. I think that this presents a new aspect of the case; and if there is any case in which the Government is under an obligation to indemnify the citizens on principles of justice, this is one.

On motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 13, 1852.

The House met at eight o'clock, a. m. Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to dispense with the reading of the Journal.

Mr. FOWLER. I suppose the Journal is a short one. I wish to hear it read.

The SPEAKER. It is a very long one, but it will be read if the gentleman desires it.

Mr. FOWLER. Can it be read when we meet again?

The SPEAKER. It can be read, but cannot be amended.

Mr. FOWLER. I am willing to dispense with its reading if it can be read when we meet again. But there are some important votes recorded there, and I desire to hear it read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk must read the Journal if the gentleman insists upon it.

Mr. JONES, of Pennsylvania. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will not insist upon having the Journal read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts must be aware that under the circumstances, no amendment could be made to the Journal, there being not a quorum present.

Mr. FOWLER. I am very willing to dispense with its reading if we can hear it upon another day. But I think it is important that it should be read at some time to the House.

Mr. MEACHAM. I desire to ask if the Journal may not be amended by the House at any time?

The SPEAKER. Not unless the motion be made to-day. The gentleman from Massachusetts, however, insists upon the reading of the Journal, and the Clerk will proceed to read it.

The Journal was then read and approved.

Mr. BUELL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was put, and the motion was agreed to, and

The House adjourned till Monday next, at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, May 14, 1852.

Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

Mr. SMITH presented the credentials of the Hon. ISAAC TOWCEY, elected a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Connecticut, for the unexpired term of six years, commencing on the 4th day of March, 1851; which were read; and the oath prescribed by law having been administered, Mr. Towcey took his seat in the Senate.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

On motion by Mr. HUNTER, it was Ordered, That the execution of the order of the Senate, assigning Friday for the consideration of private bills, be suspended for one hour.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, made in compliance with a resolution of the 24th March last, transmitting copies of the proceedings of a Naval Court of Inquiry in relation to the loss of the United States steamer Edith, in 1849, with the correspondence and other papers in relation thereto; charges against Commodore Jones, while in command of the Pacific squadron; together with charges and specifications against Lieutenant Tunis M. Craven, and the correspondence between the Secretary of the Navy, the commandant of the Boston navy-yard, the commander of the sloop-of-war Falmouth, and Lieutenant R. W. Meade, between the 1st of March and 1st of July, 1849; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A motion to print the above communication was referred to the Committee on Printing.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. BRODHEAD presented the memorial of William Richardson, praying a reexamination of his claim against Mexico; which was referred to the select committee appointed on the subject.

Mr. WADE presented a petition of citizens of Union county, Ohio, remonstrating against an extension of the time for locating Virginia military land warrants; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MALLORY presented the memorial of Richard H. L. Chipley, praying a grant of a section of land, with the public building thereon, on Pease Creek, in Florida, for the purpose of establishing a place of public worship and manual labor school; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. GEYER presented a petition of citizens of Missouri, praying the establishment of a land office at Salem, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

COAL FIELDS IN MARYLAND.

Mr. PRATT. I hold in my hand certain resolutions of the State Legislature of Maryland, on a subject of very deep interest to the people of that State.

The Senate are aware that the State of Maryland, in completing the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, and the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, principally designed to develop the mineral resources of the western part of the State, has expended between twenty and twenty-five millions of dollars. The Senate are also aware that it has been ascertained that the area of the bituminous coal region of Maryland, located in the western part of that State, contains about five hundred and fifty or six hundred square miles. It contains a bed of coal which would suffice for the consumption on the Atlantic sea-board for centuries to come; and it was with a view to develop these great mineral resources that the State commenced and has prosecuted these gigantic works.

Recently, a gentleman named C. B. Stewart, has been appointed Chief Engineer of the Navy—I believe that is his rank—and he has made a report to the Navy Department, predicated on an experiment made during a voyage of some eight hours in a steamer from New York, in which he has alleged that anthracite coal is better adapted to the generation of steam, than bituminous coal. He contradicts, if I understand him aright, in this report all the experiments made under the auspices of this Government, and also under the auspices of the Government of England. Now, the object of presenting these resolutions is, to procure a reference to the appropriate committee, with directions to the committee to have in some way a fair experiment by gentlemen of known integrity, and known experience as to the relative merits of these kinds of coal for the generation of steam. I may say that I understand that the Naval Department have given instructions, predicated on this report, to the Navy agents to use anthracite coal for all naval purposes. It is, therefore, very important to the people of my State that a fair test of the accuracy of the estimate which was made by the chief engineer should be effected. I move, therefore, a reference of the resolutions to the Committee on Naval Affairs, with a request that the committee will take them into consideration, and to adopt some plan by which a fair and proper experiment can be made to ascertain the relative merits of these coals.

The reference was agreed to.

Mr. BRODHEAD. This is a question in which my colleague, now absent, feels considerable interest. On his motion, I believe, the report of Mr. Stewart, and which I think is very correct, was sent into the Senate, and has been printed. I have no objection to the reference of the resolutions to the Committee on Naval Affairs, provided no instructions are given by the Senate. I understand that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. PRATT] asks that the committee be instructed to make an experiment.

The PRESIDENT. There are no instructions given. The motion of the Senator was a simple motion of reference.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Then I have no objection, sir.

REPORTS FROM A STANDING COMMITTEE.

Mr. JONES, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of George Cassidy, reported back the same without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the petition of John Williams, asking an increase of pension, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. BADGER, by unanimous consent, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill for the relief of the sureties of Robert S. Moore, deceased, late a purser in the Navy of the United States; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

DISTRIBUTION OF MAPS.

Mr. DOUGLAS submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary cause the maps of the district of Columbia and city of Washington, and the plats of the squares and lots in the city of Washington, heretofore printed under an order of the Senate, to be bound and distributed as follows: To the President of the United States, members of the House of Representatives, State and Territorial governments, and heads of Departments, each one copy; to the Committees on the District of Columbia, and on the Public Buildings of both Houses of Congress, each two copies; to the office of the Secretary of the Senate, the Library of the House of Representatives, the Library of Congress, the office of the Commissioner of Public Buildings, and the Washington City Library, five copies each; to the offices of the Supreme Court, and the District or Orphans' Courts of the District of Columbia, the Marshal of that District, and to the Smithsonian Institution, one copy each; to the corporate authorities of the city of Washington, for the use of the city, one hundred copies; and the remaining copies to the members of the Senate.

LETTER OF MR. HULSEMAN.

Mr. SEWARD submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, if consistent with the public interests, a copy of a communication made by Mr. Hülsemann, now or late Chargé d'Affaires of the Emperor of Austria, on or about the 29th of April, 1852, to the Secretary of State of the United States, on the occasion of the withdrawal of Mr. Hülsemann from his place as such chargé; and also a copy of the reply thereto made by the Secretary of State; and also copies of all other correspondence touching the matters which are the subjects of the said communication of Mr. Hülsemann.

ALTERATION OF THE THIRTIETH RULE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the thirtieth rule of the Senate be amended, by adding thereto the following:

On motion, any amendment offered to a bill or resolution may be laid on the table, without carrying the bill or resolution with it.

RAILROAD IN INDIANA, ILLINOIS, AND IOWA.

On the motion of Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill granting the right of way and making a grant of land to the States of Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa, in aid of the construction of a railroad from the Wabash to the Missouri river; and, having been amended, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

MEMOIR OF THE LANDING AT VERA CRUZ.

Mr. HALE. There is a resolution on the table which was introduced a morning or two since by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL.] On my motion that resolution was laid upon the table. I wish, in justice to that Senator, that it may be taken up and disposed of. I was not in my seat yesterday during the time when it should have been called up.

Mr. BELL. It was postponed until yesterday morning, and is the first thing in order.

The PRESIDENT. It is among the resolutions lying on the table, and will come up in its order.

Mr. HALE. I move that the resolution be taken up now.

The resolution was accordingly taken up and read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to furnish the Senate with a copy of the memoir of the landing of the United States troops at Vera Cruz in 1847, by Lieutenant William Grenville Temple, with an appendix, containing the written orders of General Scott to Commodore Connor, on file in the Navy Department.

Mr. BRADBURY. I move to lay that resolution on the table.

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senator from Maine will withdraw that motion for a few moments.

Mr. BRADBURY. I withdraw it.

Mr. HALE. I did not want to say a single word upon that subject. I would not occupy the attention of the Senate a moment in regard to it, but I want to say that I think I have uniformly voted against every motion of this sort. I have occasionally—very rarely—made a few suggestions about it; but I have uniformly been voted down. Gentlemen have had spasmodic fits of economy, and have agreed that economy is a wise rule to apply to our legislation; but in particular instances in which it was sought to be applied, it was unwise; and the result has been that we have printed anything and everything which has been offered, and an indefinite number of copies at that—just as many as the party chose to have ordered. Since this matter was under consideration, I have had some light thrown upon my mind in regard to this report, from a source worthy of regard. My friend on the right suggested that we were sometimes liable to receive erroneous impressions; but I have been told by a highly respectable, and intelligent, and not bad-looking lady, [a laugh,] that this is a report drawn up by a young and highly meritorious officer of the Navy; that it is the only report of the details of one of the most splendid military movements which ever occurred in the country, and the only danger is, that it will furnish grist to go into the political hopper at the approaching presidential election; and it was owing to that fact that suggestions were thrown out by my friend, the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MANGUM,] and I believe, also, the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. CLEMENS,] that there was some allusion to this as evidently having that bearing. And it is also brought to my mind that some suggestions were made on a former occasion in reference to this same matter of the approaching presidential election; and it was in reference to that view of the case, rather than the particular aspect of the case in regard to printing this memoir—that I was about to address myself. I do not know whether these remarks will be strictly in order; but if they are, they will be out of the general order. [A laugh.] But, sir, I will proceed. In some discussion which occurred between my friend on the left, [Mr. MANGUM,] and the Senator from California, [Mr. GWIN,] some catechising and cross-questioning took place in regard to the position which distinguished gentlemen occupied in reference to a question heretofore agitated, and being agitated, but not yet settled; and the question was, how these gentlemen stood on those issues; and the Senator from California, whose remarks I have not now before me, suggested that the views of the candidate supported by the Senator from North Carolina, were sound and national views on the subject of the compromise; and then the honorable Senator went on to say, as I understood him, that the party with which he was associated would present to the nation a candidate pledged to maintain these issues inviolate, and that nobody else could receive their sanction—

The PRESIDENT. The Chair must arrest the Senator in his remarks. The Senators from California and North Carolina spoke with the unanimous consent of the Senate, without which their remarks would have been out of order.

Mr. HALE. Very well. Perhaps at some other time I will ask the unanimous consent of the Senate; but I see that the honorable Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTER] is impatient to get up the deficiency bill.

Mr. STOCKTON. I move that the Senator have the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed.

Mr. BADGER. Let him go on.

Mr. HALE. I have got nearly through, for I do not make long speeches, as you know, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator knows that the Chair is bound to preserve order.

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir; but I am going on now in order by the unanimous consent of the Senate.

I was about to say that the remarks of the Senator from California called up some impressions to my mind, which I feel it due to lay before the Senate and the country, that they may have the advantage of them. They were with reference to the policy, the propriety, and the expediency of putting a candidate before the country at the approaching presidential election, bound, and pledged, and sworn to maintain and support inviolate what are called the great measures of compromise and peace to the country.

Now, sir, I wish to say, and to say it with the best wishes for some folks, that if the Democratic party, at the approaching presidential election, should undertake—and you know that the Democratic party now has a good many characteristic features and elements in it that may not be characterized as General Jackson wanted to have his Cabinet characterized, as a unit; and it is impossible it should be so, and perhaps it is not desirable that it should—but should they undertake to put a candidate into the field upon the compromise platform, they will experience a defeat, compared with which they had a victory in 1848, unless the candidate of the honorable Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MANGUM] should suffer himself to be coaxed into the same trap. But if he should, and if the Democratic party, forgetting the forlorn situation of their Free-Soil friends in the Northern States, should undertake to lay down that platform, and make adherence to the fugitive slave law, and commendation and approval of the compromise acts, as a part of their platform—if it should be put on and tacked on to the Baltimore platform, the scattered planks of the Buffalo platform will be reunited, and there will be a scene of "confusion," unless they have the sagacity to coax General Scott on to the same platform.

A great deal of credit has been taken by some gentlemen for having saved the Union. I wish to set history right on that subject. The truth is, that if the Union is safe—and some gentlemen think there is some doubt about that now—it was the Buffalo Convention that saved it, and not the compromise acts. And why, sir? Because the Buffalo Convention, by the manifestation of that rebellious spirit which the Northern Democracy had against submitting to the new platform, demonstrated to you, and demonstrated to those who wielded, and would wield, if they could, the force and energy of this Government to one direction, that it would not be safe to go in that direction any further. That is a fixed fact. They showed that; and they showed by this rebellious demonstration, that if they put themselves in a very small minority, they took their neighbors along with them, and that made two minorities. That being a fact of history, it is well, as the history is written, that we should improve by it. And the only way in which the Democracy, we, can recover our lost power, is to give up the idle pretense that we must bring all our members up to swear to the support of the finality of the compromises as a part of our creed. The only way in which it can be done, is to "let by-gones be by-gones," and if we mean to endeavor successfully to retain or regain power and place, we may as well understand at once that the compromise, as an efficient political measure, is just as dead as the Buffalo Convention. They must both be content to lie together; and their friends, if they have friends, can go and weep together in sympathy over them both, because you cannot elect your candidate—it is a settled fact that you cannot do it—without the support of the Buffalo Democrats. And these Buffalo Convention Democrats have screwed their consciences up to the last extremity, when they consent to stand by the old, Baltimore platform. They do not feel comfortable there; but for the sake of party, and of regaining power, and place, and plunder, they will go there, although they do not feel very comfortable. They will go there and stand on the Baltimore platform, if you will let it be Baltimore, and nothing else. But the moment you undertake to tie one fugitive slave to one of its uprights; the moment you undertake to make a single indorsement of one of these measures as a necessary certificate of qualification, you will drive the whole of them off. Is it not best, therefore, to take counsel and learn wisdom from experience? We have a resolution lying on the table—if it is not now under the table—proposing the indorsement of the Senate to these measures. Possibly that may be enough. If it lies there, it will do no harm; but the moment you undertake to take it from the table, and resuscitate and reanimate it and make it a party political platform, that very moment the friends of that measure will look to the Presidency through that enchantment which distance gives to the view—a distance four years long. Now, as we consider, and conceive, and admit, that it is highly important that there should be honest, upright, right-thinking men in office—and this is no impeachment of a man's patriotism—as that is one of the first things to be sought after, and looked to, and cared for, it seems to me that the part of wisdom requires that, in laying out our platform and building it up and selecting candidates, the first object should be to obtain votes. You cannot get your candidate elected without them; and it appears to be admitted now as a fact, that you cannot have both votes and platforms. Take your old platform and elect your man.

A SENATOR. Touch lightly on that.

Mr. HALE. My friend says, touch lightly on that!

Now for General Scott. I have nothing to say against General Scott. I think if he is nominated as he stands, he will make a pretty fair race; but General Scott—and every person knows it, who knows anything about that gentleman—is much better at fighting battles, than at writing letters; and I hope his friends will impress that fact very strongly on him, if he is nominated. Besides, the Democratic Convention will meet first, and if they commit fatal errors, you will have the benefit of experience, and can avoid them. But if General Scott, in an authoritative manner, undertakes to put himself on that platform, the defeat that he will experience will be more overwhelming and severe than any he inflicted on any of the Mexican generals with whom he came in contact. I do not believe his chance is very good; at the best not more than middling. To be sure, he has a good deal of military renown which may help him along; but give him everything—give him all his prestige—he is tall without his feather; but put that on him, and his chance is not great; and if, with all that, he undertakes to step on this platform, that moment he seals his defeat; it will be hopeless, irremediable.

These views I entertained, and thought there was some instruction contained in them; and think so now; and as the conventions are near at hand, and as I despaired of getting an opportunity of ever making these remarks in order, I thank the Senate for the indulgence with which it has listened to me, and beg pardon of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] for having tacked them on to his motion to print this memoir.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President, I do not rise to enter upon the debate which has been introduced by the Senator from New Hampshire. My object is solely to do justice to one who was associated with us at one time, but who is not here to speak for himself—I mean the President of the United States. It has been circulated that Mr. Fillmore, whilst the Presiding Officer of this body—

The PRESIDENT. It will require the unanimous consent of the Senate for the Senator to proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. PRATT. This is the only occasion which has occurred on which it seemed to me to be suitable to offer such an explanation as I was about to make. A rumor has been circulated that Mr. Fillmore, while he was the Presiding Officer of this body, under the expectation that the casting vote in reference to the compromise measures might be thrown upon him, had determined to vote against them. Rumor has, further, descended to particulars. It has been asserted that he had prepared a paper, in which he assigned the reasons for that vote. I thought these rumors very surprising, because I well recollected that, at the time when it was supposed to be possible that the fate of those measures might depend upon the casting vote of the Presiding Officer of this body, I had an interview with Mr. Fillmore; and believing, as I did, that the peace of the country depended upon something being done; believing that it would be entirely proper, connected with the Government as he was; elected upon the same ticket with General Taylor, I advised him to go to General Taylor and make a personal appeal to him to withdraw his opposition to those measures, and suffer them to pass. He then stated to me that his relations with General Taylor were not of that character which would permit him to do so; but that he was himself in favor of those measures. I therefore did not, for a moment, believe in the truth of these rumors; and so soon as I heard them, I went to the President himself, stated their existence, and asked him whether there was any foundation for them. He authorized me to say here, in my place, whenever an opportunity occurred, or to say anywhere, that the rumor was utterly unfounded in fact; that he was in favor of those measures during the whole period that they were being discussed here, and that there was no period of time, if they had been left to his vote, that he would not have voted for them.

Mr. HUNTER. I now move to postpone the prior order of business for the purpose of taking up the deficiency bill.

The PRESIDENT. The resolution of the Senator from Tennessee is under consideration.

Mr. HUNTER. I move to postpone the further consideration of that resolution until Monday.

The motion was agreed to.

THE DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. HUNTER. I now move to postpone the prior orders of business, for the purpose of taking up the deficiency bill.

Mr. PRATT. I move to lay that motion on the table; and on that, I ask the yeas and nays.

Mr. CLEMENS. Is not the order of the day private bills?

The PRESIDENT. The regular order for to-day is the consideration of private bills.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I desire to know whether this is the Friday on which we consider private bills without debate?

The PRESIDENT. Next Friday will be that day.

Mr. ATCHISON. I wish to say a word, if the motion to lay on the table shall be withdrawn.

Mr. PRATT. I do not care on which motion the question is taken. I am willing to withdraw my motion, and ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to postpone. It is time to get up private bills.

The PRESIDENT. It would not be in order to make a motion to lay on the table a proposition to postpone.

Mr. ATCHISON. I trust that the motion made by the Senator from Virginia will not prevail; and I hope so for the reason that this is the second or third time that this motion has been made at the expense of the Private Calendar. We have gratified the Senator from Virginia on two or three Fridays already. I know that it is his duty to press this bill; and I think he deserves credit for endeavoring to press it to a final vote. But we have considered it time after time, at the expense of almost all other business. We have given the Senator three weeks for the purpose of considering this bill. It is no fault of his, that it is not disposed of. I charge no fault upon him; but it is the fault of those who advocate this steam proposition; it is the fault of the friends of the Administration. They have called upon us to pass the bill; they have urged it, as they urged the House of Representatives to pass this bill, and to do it promptly, in order that funds might be appropriated to carry on the Government. I have been ready, and I believe we on this side of the House have generally been ready, to take the vote on the deficiency bill. I have opposed the offering of any amendments, even from the Committee on Indian Affairs: as I have deemed it inexpedient to embarrass this bill by any proposition outside of it. Although I believe the amendment now pending, offered by the direction of the Committee on Indian Affairs, is just; although I believe the appropriation for that purpose ought to be made, yet I am unwilling to embarrass this bill by adding it to it. Now, since the friends of the Administration; since the friends of the steam proposition have been urging it, day after day, to the great delay of the bill, and probably its defeat, I am unwilling, for one, to grant another day, or another hour, out of the ordinary course of business.

Mr. GWIN. I hope the motion of the Senator from Virginia will prevail. We have spent, I believe, one Friday in debating a bill for the remission of duties on articles imported for a Catholic nunnery, and the duties, I believe, only amounted to forty-five or fifty dollars. I perceive now that the first business on the Private Calendar is a motion to reconsider the vote rejecting that bill. I suppose, if we take up the Private Calendar, that subject will occupy all day. I think we had better employ the day in getting clear of the deficiency bill.

The question was then taken on the motion to postpone, and the President announced that it was carried—thirty having voted in the affirmative.

Mr. PRATT. I ask for the yeas and nays on the proposition.

The PRESIDENT. It is too late.

Mr. PRATT. I moved to lay the proposition on the table, and asked for the yeas and nays on that.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair stated that that proposition was not in order.

Mr. PRATT. There were thirty votes in favor of the proposition. The affirmative side only was counted. Those in the negative were not asked to rise.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair announced that there were thirty votes in favor of the proposition; and he announced that the motion was agreed to.

Mr. PRATT. Thirty does not constitute a majority of the body.

The PRESIDENT. It is evident, from the condition of the Chamber, that thirty is a majority of those present.

Mr. PRATT. That may be; but those in the negative were not asked to rise, and, until they were asked to rise, I think the question could not be decided.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair stated that there were thirty who voted in favor of the motion to postpone, which constituted, in his opinion, a majority, and he decided the question. There was no division asked for before he decided the question.

Mr. SEWARD. I hope we shall give the Senator from Maryland the yeas and nays.

Mr. MANGUM. The Chair is undoubtedly correct, that, after the announcement of the result of the vote, it is too late to call for the yeas and nays. But, for one, I am perfectly willing to take the question over again.

Mr. HALE. Let us take the question again by yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT. If such is the pleasure of the Senate the Chair will conform to it, and will take the question again.

Mr. PRATT. I shall not insist on that course being pursued; but I shall get at the subject as soon as we proceed to the consideration of the deficiency bill.

The PRESIDENT. That bill is now up for consideration as in Committee of the Whole, the motion of the Senator from Virginia having been agreed to.

Mr. PRATT. I move to lay the bill on the table, for the purpose of now proceeding to the consideration of the Private Calendar; and on that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 15, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Badger, Borland, Clarke, Clemens, Felch, Fish, Hamlin, James, Mallory, Pratt, Sebastian, Sumner, and Walker—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Berrien, Bradbury, Bright, Brodhead, Brooke, Butler, Chase, Cooper, Dawson, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Geyer, Gwin, Hale, Houston, Hunter, Jones of Iowa, Jones of Tennessee, Mangum, Mason, Norris, Rusk, Seward, Smith, Stockton, Toucey, Underwood, Upham, Wade, and Weller—33.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL.] to insert the following:

“For payment to the citizens of Alabama, Georgia, and Florida, for depredations committed by Creek Indians upon their property, and for other property taken by the troops of the United States and friendly Creeks, in the year 1836, $365,797.”

Mr. CLEMENS. I wish to amend the amendment in one particular. I believe a portion of these depredations were committed in the month of January, 1837. I therefore move to strike out “the year 1836,” and insert “the years 1836 and 1837.”

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MALLORY. I move further to amend the amendment, by striking out the word “Florida.”

Mr. BELL. I have no objection to that. Florida was inserted, in conformity with the object for which the commissioners were appointed, in 1837, to inquire into these depredations. The terms of the commission included Florida; though I believe none of the claimants are designated as being from Florida, in the schedule returned by the commissioners.

Mr. BRADBURY. I would like to inquire of the honorable Senator from Florida the object of this amendment. I wish to know if it is designed, by the adoption of this amendment, to open the door to claims on the part of Florida that shall not be covered by the appropriations in this bill?

Mr. MALLORY. I do not recognize the right of the honorable Senator from Maine to question what object the Senator from Florida may have in view hereafter. But the object now is evident. Florida is included in the amendment, when she makes no claim for spoiliations of this character. I do not know of any injury that the citizens of Florida suffered from the Creek Indians at the time mentioned in the amendment. She is accused sufficiently of getting money from the Treasury when she gets none. When an opportunity does arise, perhaps she may present a claim for herself for spoiliations.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The question then recurred upon the amendment of Mr. BELL, as amended.

Mr. CASS. Mr. President, if nothing had been brought into this debate but the question immediately connected with the proposition, I should not have said a word about it, but should have satisfied myself with a silent vote upon the amendment. But the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, in proposing it, has thought proper to go back into the history of the Creek war, and if he has not assailed, he has at any rate reproached the then existing Administration, with respect to the conduct and the cause of that war. I have come here to-day very much unprepared to recur to, or review a subject which has passed away for nearly twenty years. I have but a very indistinct recollection of the circumstances as they occurred. I have enough knowledge of them, and a sufficiently distinct recollection of them, however, to know that the honorable Senator from Tennessee has made a very great mistake on this whole subject, and I trust that before I sit down I shall convince even him of that.

Mr. President, you, yourself, know—no one better knows—and there are gentlemen here who also know what was the condition of the Southern country in relation to the Creek Indians. You know that after the extinction of the Indian title in Georgia, in consequence of the compact with that State, by which we acquired possession of Alabama and Mississippi, there were about five millions of acres of lands remaining in the State of Alabama. You well recollect that in 1832 the State of Alabama passed a law extending her jurisdiction over the Indian country. That law was communicated to the War Department by Governor Gayle, of Alabama, on the 26th of February, 1834. It destroyed the Indians as a community. It extended the laws of Alabama over them, and it prohibited, under a penalty, the exercise, by themselves, of any jurisdiction whatever. In fact it took from the Indians the protection afforded to them by the intercourse law of the United States. Sir, as you are well aware, the pressure upon the President of the United States was very great, in order to have the Indian title extinguished in Alabama. A delegation from the tribe of Indians came on here, and a treaty was made by them, of which you, yourself, were a witness. A correspondence took place between yourself and the other members of the Alabama delegation, among whom, I recollect, were Governor Clay and Mr. Mardis, calling upon the Government to exert its authority to get the Indians out of the State of Alabama. A treaty was made, of which you, yourself, were one of the witnesses. That treaty provided that the Indian title in Alabama should be extinguished, but that certain reservations should be made. It allowed to each chief—naming as many as ninety of them, I think—six hundred and forty acres, or a full section of land. It allowed to each head of a family, I believe, half a section, if they were determined on remaining, providing, however, for those who were disposed to emigrate, a number of articles, such as a rifle, gunpowder, and other things, and their transportation, at the expense of the United States, to the Creek country given to them by the Government, west of the Mississippi.

As you are well aware, sir, it was impossible to procure the extinction of the Indian title without making these reservations. The honorable Senator from Tennessee is under a great mistake in that respect. *He supposes that the system of reservation was then introduced for the first time.

Mr. BELL. I beg pardon of the honorable Senator; I said no such thing.

Mr. CASS. The honorable Senator did not say so; but he intimated that the state of things existing necessarily led to that result.

Mr. BELL. I said that the policy of permitting the whites to go in and settle among the Indians before they had removed had no precedent before that treaty.

Mr. CASS. I have not the slightest disposition to misrepresent the Senator; and if he did not say so, of course I have nothing more to say on that point.

Mr. BELL. Reservations were commonly made, and I could not therefore say that they were unusual.

Mr. CASS. I was going on to remark, that reservations were made to the Indian chiefs and heads of families, and provision was made that they might retain them for five years, if they remained, and at the end of that time they might receive a patent, and become like any other citizens of Alabama. But in the mean time, with the consent of the President of the United States, they were allowed to convey their land to any one, and then remove to the West at the expense of the United States. The reservations of land to the Indians were the consideration given for the cession; and without which no cession, no extinction of the Indian title in Alabama could have been effected. The reservations were made. Those Indians who were disposed to remain did remain. They had the right, under the direction of the President, and with his approbation, to sell their lands. As soon as the treaty was made, there was an immense pressure upon the Indian country. The Government did everything it could to prevent the irruption; but it could not prevent it. People went in there and purchased the titles of the Indians, and the greatest species of fraud was committed. You know it, Mr. President; we all know it.

When Governor Clay was asked the cause of this Indian war, he said expressly that it was on account of the frauds that had been committed upon the Indians. When Governor Lumpkin was asked the same question, he said that he knew nothing about it, but he thought that was the probable cause. It is no credit to us; but it is proper that the Senate and the country should know the facts, even at this day. The Senate will bear with me in patience, I hope, for I have had but a moment to refresh my memory. The facts had passed from my recollection for some years; and I have not been able to look into all the documents that I desired.

Now, allow me to say, that a number of gentlemen were sent by the Government during the pendency of that very difficulty, in order to ascertain the true state of the facts, in order to apply a proper and efficient remedy. Among them was a gentleman of this District, of high character, Mr. Key, since dead. Another was Mr. Crawford, now a judge in this District. Another was Mr. Balch, whose high character is known to every one here. Their reports are in the book which I have before me; but they are almost two voluminous to be referred to. It will be seen that these commissioners reported, among other things, that the Indians were personated. Many were hired to say that they were such and such Indians, and to sell tracts of land. The Indians were cheated out of their money by all possible means, and the greatest corruptions ever known in any country in the world, were practiced. I shall read a few words from some of these reports to put the Senate in full possession of the facts. Mr. Balch says:

"The practice of 'personation' was not unusual. Indians were bribed to appear before the agents, and declare that they were the owners of reserves belonging to others, and they were permitted to acknowledge contracts for the same."

"Although many frauds were perpetrated throughout the year 1824, of the existence of which the agents were apprised, still it was difficult to detect and defeat them. Those who were engaged in plundering these unlettered savages were emboldened by success, and early in 1835 a plan was concocted to sweep off from them all the reserves that remained uncertified, amounting to more than fifteen hundred. In the letter of the late Eli S. Shorter, a copy whereof is hereto annexed, marked C, this purpose is darkly hinted at."

Here is one of the disclosures to which the commissioner refers. Mr. Shorter, one of the men who had heavy operations among the Indians, says, in a letter to some of his associates:

"Your messenger must reach us on Sunday night. Camp your Indians out of sight of the road. You need give yourself no trouble about the value of the land; I will arrange all that. Stealing is the order of the day; and out of the host of Indians at the agency, I don't think there were ten true holders of land."

These are but specimens of what took place during that time. I suppose there is hardly a gentleman from the South who does not recollect the whole nature of the transaction.

If the honorable gentleman from Tennessee puts this application for an appropriation on the ground of a state of war, there was no necessity of advertising to the causes of that war. It was a gratuitous attack upon another Administration, because it did not alter the nature of the claim in any manner whatever. Whatever may have been the cause of the origin of that war, it has nothing to do with the merits of the claim, if it is sought to be pressed on the ground that war did actually exist. I repeat, that at different times during the progress of this war, commissioners were sent out to investigate and look into the condition of the Indians, and make such reports as would enable the Government to act promptly, efficiently, wisely, and in the best manner for the interests of the country.

One of the principal objections that the honorable gentleman makes upon this subject is, that the Government did not prevent people from going there. How could the Government prevent them? I should like the honorable gentleman to tell me how. Why, Governor Gayle, of Alabama, remonstrated against the right of the United States to send troops there. He said we had no right to bring forces into that country at all. His letter is explicit. He says, under date of February 22d, 1834:

"Alabama having rightfully acquired exclusive jurisdiction previous to the ratification of the treaty over the subjects embraced by the fifth article thereof, cannot be deprived of it without her consent. But, however this may be, whatever the power of the General Government, or the right of the State in this matter, it appears to me that the novelty of the spectacle of keeping upon the borders of a State a standing army to awe its citizens into submission to the laws, and the obvious departure which it indicates from the customary modes provided by the Constitution for conducting the operations of the Government, are considerations of themselves sufficient to induce a resort to milder means."

From the termination of the treaty through the whole of these transactions, there was always force on the frontier—sometimes under the command of General Jesup, sometimes under the command of General Twiggs, sometimes under one man, and sometimes under another. This letter came from Governor Gayle, remonstrating with the Government against the introduction of troops into the Territory. It was met by an answer written by direction of General Jackson, which I suppose many gentlemen here will recollect, in which this Government took the ground that so long as the land belonged to the United States, the Government had a right to prevent intrusion. But allow me to say, in a country like that, how could you keep troops with the State authorities against you—with the State authorities denying that you had any power whatever? Why nothing short of an armed force surrounding the Territory could do it. There was every disposition on the part of the Government to do so; but it did not want an armed contest with the State of Alabama, and therefore turned its attention to the removal of the Indians by all the inducements that could possibly be held out to them.

The honorable gentleman assumes, in the first place, that an armed force was not there; and in the next place that the Indians were in a state of starvation; and, also, that it was the duty of the Government to apply a remedy for each. One of these propositions brings up the whole question in regard to intercourse with the Indians: how far it is the policy, how far it is the duty of the Government, when the Indians are in a state of starvation, to provide for their support. I do not mean as a matter of passing charity, but as a system upon which they could, and upon which they would rely. This whole business of the emigration of the Indians to the country west of the Mississippi is a very difficult question, and has always proved so under this Government. The great wave of civilization has borne them onwards from the borders of the Atlantic almost to the Pacific. They have melted away before the access and the approach of civilization, as the snow melts before the warm sun of spring. Wherever they have remained in contact with a civilized frontier, they have entirely faded away. I now aver here that I know of no instance in which a permanent reformation has been effected in the moral or political condition of the Indians so long as they have remained in contact with the white settlements. The relative condition of the two races who occupy this continent is a great moral problem. There are physical causes to account for the diminution and deterioration of the Indians. But why were those causes not counteracted? Has civilization shed no light upon them? For two centuries they have been in contact with civilized people, but they have resisted successfully every effort to ameliorate their condition. Their moral as well as their intellectual condition has remained stationary. All the circumstances connected with them present a case unparalleled in the history of the world.

Now, under what circumstances is the Government placed here at Washington, the central point of authority? The Government is pressed from every portion of the Union to remove the Indians. They see that the Indians are fading away—that reservation after reservation goes—that philanthropic men after philanthropic men are devoting themselves to their improvement, and that failure is apparent everywhere. It is owing, among other causes, to the fixed condition of Indian manners and the introduction of whiskey among them. An Indian is as unchangeable in his manners as is an Arab. The Arab maintains a certain species of civilization, and remains now just as he was in the days of Abraham. The Indian has not advanced in intellect, in physical condition, in anything that gives elevation to character since the first white man put his foot upon the shores of this continent. Now, why keep them stationary? The experiment may fail, but we are sure that their condition will be poor without it. The only hope we have is to put them in the western regions of country, where they will have a chance to live in their own way. They are hunters and warriors, and you cannot make them work. It is a disgrace to an Indian to work. There are but two operations in life that they can perform. One is to go to war, and the other to hunt. You have in them not only an unconquerable aversion to labor, which is common with all savages, but there is a feeling of dishonor among them attached to labor, which is as strong with them as it is with any people in the world. Your expectation to elevate them to any higher station in civilization by teaching them to labor, by putting them in contact with your people, by exposing them to the irruption of every man who chooses to go there and sell them whiskey, and deprave them, is utterly impossible. It should have been known before. It is now known by experience.

In this, as in other cases, the Government made the attempt to send these Indians west of the Mississippi, and after some time, in consequence of the difficulties which I have before stated, hostilities ensued. But let me tell the honorable Senator from Tennessee, that until May, 1836, the Governor of Georgia had not the slightest idea of a war. He says himself, in a letter accompanying the reports upon this subject, that it was only in May, 1836, that he became aware of the dangerous state of things existing. He did not believe there was to be a war; and allow me still further to tell the honorable Senator, as he speaks of issuing provisions to the Indians, that provisions were issued to the full amount of the power of the Executive authority. At one period during that time, the Indians were found to be in such great distress that it was necessary to issue provisions; but the continuance of their issue would have been compelling the Government to adopt that as a system, and they would have thrown themselves upon the Government, so that all attempts to ameliorate their condition, or remove them west of the Mississippi, would have been utter failures. There is a note appended to the report of Judge Crawford, in which he says:

"Not a doubt is entertained, that many of the Indians now in Alabama would die for want of food, in the course of the winter, if the Government supplies issued by United States officers on stated days did not sustain them."

So you will see, that during the utmost extremity, when there was actual danger, provisions were issued to the extent of the power of the Executive Government. But this is nothing new in the course of Indian history. There is not a winter passes by but the Indians are reduced to actual starvation for want of food. Distress does not teach them providence, nor does want teach them industry. Why, they will consume their seed corn. They have little more providence in taking care of themselves than have the animals which are their cotenants of the forest. It is the characteristic of their nature. If you are now about to adopt a system of protecting the Indians upon the frontiers, and feeding them on the ground of humanity, very well; but you have the consequences before you. I never knew it to be done but once, and then it was from a proper and just motive. It was during the time of the war with England, when she adopted the system of throwing the Indians upon our frontier and subsidizing them. Her object was to get them over to her interests, and get them to make war upon us. Then we collected them together in masses, and kept them together, and fed them. We thought it better to feed them than to fight them. This was good policy. The motive in this case was justifiable. But such a motive passes away with the necessities which gave rise to it. I suppose there is no gentleman here who would insist that we should be eternally feeding the Indians.

In the book that I have before me there is an account of an interview between Governor Gayle and Ho-poe-thle-Yoholo, who was then the chief of the Creek nation, and a deputation who waited upon him; but I will not weary the patience of the Senate by reading it. Gentlemen will find it a most interesting account, if they choose to examine it, given by the Indians, of the troubles into which they were led by an incursion of the white people who wanted to purchase their lands into their country, and the frauds that were practiced upon them by land-stealers. It shows most distinctly that they were led into these troubles by the frauds that were practiced in consequence of their power to sell their lands; but without that power to sell and dispose of their lands being reserved to them, no treaty could have been made. Nor was it in the power of the Government entirely to prevent people going there. The Indians had a right to sell their reservations there within the first five years, and they had a right to sell their patents at the end of that time, if they did not choose to go West. The commissioners were appointed to certify to the contracts, to examine into them, and to see that all was fair. Under these very circumstances, I have already said to the Senate, if an Indian, A B, owned land, and there was another man who wanted it, he would obtain another Indian, C D, to represent himself as A B. Thus one individual would perhaps personate twenty Indians at different times; and thus the most fraudulent contracts were made. All this shows, as the honorable Senator from Tennessee said, a frightful condition among the Indians. I do not deny that I appreciate it as fully as he does. My only ground is, that the Government had nothing to do with this—that, in the first place, it could not prevent it; and, in the next place, it was told by the State authorities of Alabama not to send troops there. Governor Gayle said so expressly, and you know it, Mr. President. Such an effort would be a contest of arms between us and the authorities of the State of Alabama.

I wish I could find the answer written to Governor Gayle by direction of General Jackson. You, Mr. President, do not need it for your own instruction; but it would show the Senate the difficulties which the Government had to encounter. In that letter the proposition which I have stated is laid down, that the Government had a right to interfere. It would place the Government of the United States in a very delicate condition in respect to the matter, if it should attempt to interfere. The Government had no wish to come in contact with the State authorities of Alabama. Public feeling in Alabama was very much excited in reference to the matter. It was with extreme difficulty, and only by the most persevering efforts, that finally the object was accomplished without a contest with the State of Alabama. Why, in this very report there is a warning given by General Jackson to the Indians, that if they did not emigrate they would be in a state of starvation. One of the inducements held out to them to go West was, that there they would become comfortable, that they would be removed at the expense of the United States, that they would have possession of a country where they might recur to their primitive habits of supporting themselves by the chase. But you know, Mr. President, that attachment to the land of their forefathers is stronger, perhaps, among uncivilized than civilized people. There is no man who has more reverence for the spot where the bones of his forefathers rest than the Indian; and there is nothing that grates more harshly upon him than the fact that we have burnt down his council house and plowed up the bones of his forefathers. They will never go willingly. I do not mean to say that they will never go, except when they are compelled to yield to physical force; but that they always prefer to remain in their old habitations, if they could be dealt justly by. They yield to the pressure of external circumstances, to contact with the white settlements, and to all the evils which have involved them in the condition in which they are placed, and which threaten, at no distant day, to blot them out from the face of the earth.

In relation to the specific appropriation before the Senate, I would say a few words. I suppose no man in the Senate will contend that, in a state of war with a civilized or uncivilized foe, any Government is compelled, by any just principle, to pay for injuries that may happen to its citizens. No Government can do it. It would break down any Government in the world. Besides, there are other obvious considerations connected with it which would prevent such a system. If a war breaks out with an Indian tribe, and the Indians make irruptions into our country during the pendency of the war, I take it for granted nobody would vote payment to those who suffered. Why, from the time of the landing of our forefathers on the beach of Jamestown, and on the Rock of Plymouth, there has not been an Indian war but where immense injuries have been inflicted. My own State suffered more, I presume, during the war of 1812, from Indian irruptions, than any other portion of the Union. There were circumstances connected with it which committed almost the faith of this nation, and which has never yet been redeemed. There were circumstances which gave the citizens of my State a better claim than any portion of this Union to compensation for Indian damages; and yet my constituents have never been able to get a dollar on account of the damages they suffered. When Detroit was surrendered, there was a stipulation made by the British Government in which the British solemnly promised to protect the people of that Territory from the Indians. The ink was not dry with which that provision was written; the paper upon which it was written was not put away, before the Indians began to attack the people and seize their property, burn their buildings, and take their children into captivity! From that time to this, not one dollar has been paid for those damages; nor has the British Government ever been called upon to redeem its solemn obligations thus given. These are circumstances which make this case, aside from the general principle, and yet compensation has not been made. But here is the case of a war.

The honorable gentleman, as I before observed, has gone into the causes of that war. Except he did so to vindicate the truth of history, I do not know why it was. Although we have high authority for the position, that to vindicate the truth of history is the province of the Senate, I do not admit it. It will be admitted that if in this case there was a state of war, unless there were peculiar circumstances, there could be no claim for this appropriation. I understand the honorable Senator from Georgia [Mr. Dawson] to admit that it was a case of public war. It was so. There is no doubt about that. What Indian was ever punished by a court for engaging in it? If it was not a war, the Indians engaged were responsible to the authorities of Alabama for murder. But no such prosecution was ever instituted. No man ever thought of it. The honorable Senator from Tennessee has said that a portion of the tribe only were engaged in the war. Why, sir, we have repeatedly treated with portions of tribes. We have recognized portions of the same tribe as enemies, and others as friends. We have recognized parts of tribes. The authority of the chiefs hangs loosely on the Indians. They have but little more than a moral influence. If a band of Indians choose to locate themselves in another portion of the country, the chiefs cannot prevent them. Bands of tribes go off and separate from the main body. We have repeatedly made treaties with different portions of tribes. We have treated with portions of the Wyandots, portions of the Pottawatomies, of the Ouawas, and of the Chippewas. We have frequently treated with portions of tribes. Although they do not divide property as we do, into individual possessions, except so far as concerns land; although they did not divide their property into severalty, yet the bands divide their property into severalty. The bands occupy particular portions of the country, and have particular hunting grounds very frequently, to trespass upon which would be doing a very great injury to them. You will find on the statute-book treaty after treaty, made with different bands of the same tribe. We have recognized portions of tribes as enemies, and portions as friends. During the last war a portion of the Wyandots sided with England, and a portion were our friends. So of the Pottawatomies, and the other tribes I have enumerated.

With respect to the Creeks, they went on and made war. There was a state of open hostility, and it was so considered by the Government. I repeat, you can find no single instance in which an Indian was ever prosecuted for being engaged in these hostilities; and for the evident reason, that every Indian so engaged was considered as a public enemy, and to be treated as such. Now, that being the state of the case, the honorable Senator from Tennessee has said that the spirit of the intercourse law requires the payment of these claims. What is meant by that? In order to prevent difficulties between the Indians and the white settlements; or rather, in order to prevent those difficulties ending in war, the Government long ago adopted the policy, that, if there were irruptions of Indians into the white settlements, and property was taken, if the white settler would not pursue the Indians, but would wait the operation of the Government, the Government would guarantee the final payment of what was due. The Government did not do it because it was obliged to do so, but as a matter of policy arising out of our peculiar relations with the Indians, and their peculiar character. In the first instance, the guarantee only extended to payment from such annuities as were due the Indians. The United States were to reserve the amount to be paid from the annuities. But subsequently, in 1834, that was changed, and the United States guaranteed the payment without any reference to whether the tribe had an annuity or not, or whether it had annuity enough to meet the payment required. I know this, because I was in daily communication with the committee who prepared the bill of 1834, and was familiar at the time with its provisions and their effect. That was the policy of the Government; and it was a very just and a very proper policy. It was, that, if the settler would remain still, the Government would put him in the position in which he was before his property had been taken.

The line within which this act was confined, was defined by the law. It began at the north-east, and went round all over the country, according to the old law. But the new law which was passed in 1834, excluded the country east of the Mississippi from its provisions. What, then, is meant by the spirit of that law being applied to this case? Congress did not choose to extend its policy to the States east of the Mississippi. That is all that can be said about the matter. There was no spirit of the law in regard to this case, and for a very obvious reason; there were the Indians in the very midst of the white settlers, and the State authorities were extending their power over them. The State authorities had taken possession of the country. So far as was possible, they had extended their jurisdiction over the Indians, and made them responsible to the courts of Alabama. Then how could you extend the Indian intercourse law there? The State of Alabama took the subject into her own hands. She took it from the United States. She extended her jurisdiction over the whole Indian country there. Then you had not the right—it was no part of your duty—to undertake to extend the principles of your act, where the State authorities said they should not be extended. It must be recollected that this is not a question of right; this is a question of policy as to how far it is politic and necessary for the United States to extend their guarantee; to what cases it shall extend. The intercourse law provided that the guarantee should extend only to such and such cases, in such and such places. Alabama was not within these places. Who, then, has a right to say that the spirit of the law includes this case? It is a question of the plain words of the law. It is a question for the Congress who made it. If they chose to extend the law there, they would have said so. Nothing more would have been necessary. But to say that the spirit of the law includes this case, and that therefore the appropriation should be made, is to put it on ground which Congress have denied. There can be no question as to the spirit of the law. This is simply a question as to the extent of the law.

Again, it is a question the difficulties of which are made by the legislation of the State of Alabama, which says that we have no right to go into that State, and which held out very distinctly the threat, during all these proceedings, that if we did go into the State of Alabama, we would be met by the armed forces of that State. No man knows it better than the honorable President of this body. He was then a Representative of Alabama on this floor, and well recollects the feeling which existed in the State at that time. This was the ground which was taken, when Governor Gayle wrote that extraordinary letter, to which I have alluded, to the War Department.

I have not looked particularly at this claim. Allow me, however, to say to the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, that this claim, so far as respects the certificate and decision of the commissioners, does not rest on any guarantee of the Government at all. The appropriation formerly passed by Congress, expressly provided that the ascertainment of these expenses by the commissioners, should not be considered as any pledge on the part of the United States to pay the amount. There was the express exclusion of such a conclusion. It is very evident that Congress was willing to look into the matter and see what should be done—to investigate the causes of disturbance, and ascertain what was proper to be allowed, if anything; but that in the mean time the faith of the Government should not be in the least degree committed. Therefore, you are not at all to draw the conclusion, that because these damages were estimated under the direction of the Government, the Government is therefore under the slightest obligation of moral faith to carry them into effect.

The second section of the act of March 3, 1837, authorized the appointment of agents to inquire into what depredations were committed. The information was obtained, and was reported to Congress. The amount reported as proper to be allowed, was nearly $356,000; of which only $270,000 was for depredations prior to the commencement of hostilities. Three hundred and forty-nine thousand dollars were for damages during the hostilities. The whole amount claimed for the whole period, was $1,269,000; but the commissioners rejected consequential damages. For my own part, I have not looked very critically into the nature of this claim. Whether there are not equitable circumstances which require it to be paid I cannot say, for I have not seen sufficient proof to judge of that. But certainly the grounds stated by the honorable Senator from Tennessee, and repeated by the honorable Senator from Georgia, whether there was a state of war or no war, do not furnish, in my opinion, any reason for the payment of these claims. I repeat again, sir, that if there was war, it is a principle that no sane man can adopt; and if peace prevailed, and there was no war, no question connected with the intercourse law can apply, especially in the State of Alabama, which had taken the jurisdiction of the whole subject into her own hands with the intent to prevent the United States from having any control over the subject.

Mr. President, I shall not further fatigue the Senate, yet I owed it to myself to say thus much. But the subject came upon me very hastily. I know there are facts connected with it that might be easily collected, which would give the case a much stronger aspect. I was in hopes at one time that the Senate might postpone the matter until Monday, with the view of giving an opportunity to look more fully into the facts; but as that has not been done, I found it necessary to state the facts that were known as well as I could. Under the circumstances I shall say no more at present; but if the honorable Senator from Tennessee should make any remarks on the subject which may render it necessary for me to reply, I trust that the Senate will give me the privilege of speaking again on the subject.

Mr. CLEMENS. I can have no objection to any explanation which the honorable Senator from Michigan may have thought it necessary to make of the acts of the War Department when he was at its head; although he will allow me to say that he has sometimes given his enemies advantages over him by unnecessary explanations of by-gone things, which had much better be left to take care of themselves. If, however, he had confined himself to an explanation of the motives which had actuated the War Department—if he had attempted simply to justify the action of that Department, and had not left false impressions upon the minds of the Senate, I should not have felt it necessary to say anything more in relation to this matter. He has recapitulated the frauds practiced upon the Indians as one of the causes which led to the hostilities, and he has left the impression that these frauds were practiced by the settlers who come here to ask for compensation.

Mr. CASS. Such was not my intention.

Mr. CLEMENS. I am sure there is not a Senator here who did not receive that impression from the Senator's remarks.

Mr. CASS. I spoke of frauds committed by the Indians, and not by the settlers. I spoke of the condition of the Indians, and the frauds which led to it, not of the subsequent conduct of the Indians. My object was to defend the course of the Administration from what the honorable Senator from Tennessee stated, that the state of things to which he alluded, resulted from the conduct of the Government.

Mr. CLEMENS. I am glad to hear the explanation, because I am sure that the Senate must have understood the Senator as I did. In the very documents which he had before him, there was conclusive evidence, in the certificate from the Government commissioners, that the settlers, the parties now claiming compensation—not merely for the losses sustained, because that is not the whole amount claimed, but for provisions furnished to the United States troops—did not practice the frauds. They were practiced by speculators, whose object was to obtain possession of the land, and then to speculate upon the settlers. They lost nothing by the Indian depredations, for they had nothing in the midst of the Indians. The settlers were the sufferers, and it would be hard indeed if they were to be denied justice here, because others had seen proper to practice frauds upon the Indians.

But, sir, that was not the only thing which led to the hostilities in the Creek territory at that period. One prominent cause—and it was contained in the document I read yesterday—was absolute starvation, and their total inability to procure food without committing depredations on the property of the citizens. The Senator from Michigan has read an abstract, which he says was prepared by one who was with him in the War Department, which shows conclusively that the depredations were not committed after hostilities commenced, but that $270,000 of the $350,000 due to the claimants are for depredations committed prior to the commencement of hostilities, and that the portion of the claim arising subsequent to that time, is for meal, and corn, and forage furnished to the United States troops in the territory. He has alluded to a letter from Mr. Shorter, in relation to these frauds. Mr. Shorter was a settler, and that of itself is conclusive proof that the settlers were wholly unconnected with any of the frauds practiced on the Indians. On the contrary, they furnished them with food to the utmost extent of their means.

But the Senator, in endeavoring to justify himself in one particular, it seems to me has inculpated himself in another. He was Secretary of War at the time General Jackson recommended the appointment of the commissioners, for the purpose of paying the claims, and of course concurred in the act of the Administration, of which he constituted a part.

Mr. CASS. I was absent from the city at the time.

Mr. CLEMENS. He says he was absent. At all events the then existing Government, of which he constituted a part, recommended the appointment of the commission for the purpose of paying these claims; and I take it that every part of that Government is bound by its action. I do not care what Governor Gayle may have said. I do not care whether Governor Gayle denied the right of the Executive to send troops into that territory or not. He was not sustained by the constituted authorities of the State of Alabama. The Legislature repudiated his action, and the consequence has been, that from that time to this, he has been acting with the Whig, instead of the Democratic party to which he belonged anterior to that time. Now, sir, we did extend our laws over that Territory, and for the express purpose of preventing the frauds which were practiced upon the Indians. One of the chief reasons for extending the laws of Alabama over the Indians was to give them protection; and if we had been left alone, we would have protected them. But this Government thought proper to interfere, and take the matter into their own hands. They made a treaty, and by the terms of that treaty, settled the whites among the Indians, rendering it absolutely certain that within a short period, the Indians, being landless, without means of raising crops, must resort to depredations upon the property of the whites for a bare subsistence. This was foreseen by the authorities of Alabama. The Government were warned against it, but notwithstanding the warnings they persisted in this course of conduct.

But the Senator has undertaken to prove that this was a case of public war. The head of the Administration, of which he composed a part, did not think so. The facts do not justify the assertion that there was a public war. The very paper which the Senator has read, as I have before remarked, proves conclusively that much the larger portion of the depredations were committed anterior to the time when any hostilities whatever existed. But the fact is, that the state of hostilities which did subsequently arise, was confined always to scattering parties of the Indians, and was never concurred in by the nation. The chief of the nation, Ho-poe-thle-Yoholo was one of the most active agents in suppressing it, and Jim Boyd, another chief, was also engaged in suppressing it. The Council of the Nation never recognized it. The Senator asks why we did not try the depredators for murder. Why, Mr. President, it would have been just about as easy to have identified them as to go to the moon. We could not identify them. We could not tell who had committed murder. And, moreover, it would not have been politic, under the circumstances, and it was not judged necessary to resort to that process when the Government had commenced to coerce their removal. We were willing to get rid of them. We knew the impossibility of identifying them, if we attempted to try them for murder; and we let them go when the Government troops removed them. The number of warriors of the Creek nation at that period was about 5,000; and there never were 700 of them engaged in these hostile depredations. There never were, at any period, 500 of them assembled in one body, except those who were assembled under the friendly chiefs, for the purpose of suppressing the insurrection. The acts of the depredators were repudiated by the Council of the Nation. There was nothing to justify anything like the assumption that there was a state of public war. By that, I do not mean that there should have been a declaration of war; because we all know that we never make such a declaration with Indian tribes. But what I mean is, that the tribe, or a majority of the tribe, should have concurred in it; that the Council of the Nation should have acted upon it, and should have sanctioned these hostilities. I deny that a state of war can exist, when the executive authorities of the nation deny that any such war did exist, and when much the larger portion of the tribe were engaged in suppressing the insurrection. The depredators were a few bands of half-starved Indians, some of them driven so far to desperation, that the woods were actually filled with them, hung to grape vines, committing suicide to avoid the pangs of starvation. They were depredators in every sense of the term, and nothing but depredators. We ask now that you shall do to us what has been done to every State in the Union that has made application to you—pay us for the property so destroyed.

I have no wish to prolong this discussion. I regretted yesterday that so much was said about it. I think all of us have understood it; and unless it becomes necessary, I shall say nothing more about it.

Mr. CASS. I have here a letter of Governor Clay on this subject, from which I will read the following extract:

"I must say, in reply, I have no personal knowledge of facts on which to found an opinion on the subject to which you allude. I am not aware that I have had any communication, personally or by letter, with any individual who may have been implicated in the excitement of hostilities. So far as I am able to judge from the communications of individuals, or from indications of public sentiment, as expressed at public meetings and otherwise, it seems to me the opinion prevails extensively, if not almost universally, that the frauds and forgeries practiced upon the Indians to deprive them of their lands, were amongst the principal causes which excited them to hostilities."

Mr. BELL. Who is that letter from?

Mr. CASS. That is from Governor Clay, then Governor of Alabama, who says expressly that the opinion of the whole country was that the frauds practiced upon the Indians, were amongst the principal causes which excited them to hostilities. Mr. President, the period when these things occurred has so long passed away, that it is hardly known to what extent the excitement prevailed. The great body of the State of Alabama were as much excited, and as much opposed to this, as any could be. There was a most healthful public sentiment there; and as Governor Gayle says, there was indignation felt throughout the whole country against the state of things. The War Department was overloaded with remonstrances from Alabama against that monstrous state of things; and I assure the honorable Senator that I had not the most remote idea of saying a word about these claimants as being concerned in the frauds. All that I spoke of, were those persons who had gone into the Territory, not only from Alabama and Georgia, but from other neighboring States, to make a system of defrauding the Indians. I alluded to those persons who made a system of cheating the Indians. A spirit of indignation was excited against them in the State of Alabama, and I do not believe they could have made their appearance there at all. No sentiment could have been more healthful than that of the State of Alabama on the subject. I repeat, it would be exceedingly difficult for any man now to convey to this Senate an adequate idea of the true state of things which existed then. I think the honorable Senator from Georgia [Mr. BARNES] must be aware of the condition in which the Government was placed. I think he must know the tremendous frauds which were attempted to be practiced on this country; that is my impression.

With respect to this specific application, if it is based on peculiar circumstances, I have never looked into it. It is only when it is put on untenable grounds, to wit: that it must be considered as arising from a state of things which did not constitute a war, or that it should come within the spirit of the intercourse law—that I have objections to it. If, in the course of General Jackson's administration, after I left it, the slightest paper can be found showing that, in his opinion, the Government should meet any portion of these expenditures, I will vote for it as cheerfully as any Senator, I have that unlimited confidence in General Jackson's knowledge of the subject. My own knowledge in respect to it would not entitle me to vote for it. But I should like those who are interested in it to show precisely the bearing of this specific portion of the appropriation upon the facts.

Mr. RUSK. We are losing sight of the real questions at issue, and going off to collateral ones. It is true, as the Senator from Michigan says, that great frauds were perpetrated. Under one of the articles of the treaty, the Indians were authorized to sell out their reservations, and speculators went in and perpetrated frauds upon them; and the Indians perpetrated frauds upon one another to a great extent. I suppose there was about as much swindling carried on there as generally happens in such a case. But that has nothing to do with this claim. The parties here were no parties to those transactions—they were no parties to the bargain. By the treaty the Indians were authorized to sell out their lands; and settlers were authorized to go in and settle, and commence the cultivation of the soil, which numbers did. Whatever may have been the difficulties, it is not necessary to inquire into them—whether it was these frauds that were perpetrated—whether it was a state of starvation, makes no kind of difference. When the settlers had gone there by the sanction of the Government, as they had a right to do—they were mostly poor persons, and the land was fine and yielded well to labor—the Indians commenced a system of stealing and depredation upon them, which went on from one step to another until it finally broke out in hostilities with a small portion, and but a small portion, of the tribe. The Government afterwards, to ascertain the damages sustained by the settlers, sent down a commission, who reported the amount that is now asked to be placed upon the deficiency bill for the purpose of paying them for the losses sustained.

I said yesterday, that if the intercourse law had extended to Alabama and Georgia, these claims would have been paid long ago, and the principle—I will not call it the "spirit," as the honorable Senator from Michigan seems to object to that—of that law should extend everywhere, and should be applied, if you are going to administer justice, as well to a person in Georgia or Alabama, as to one who lives in Missouri or Michigan. It is the principle upon which you pay for depredations committed by Indians. If it is good in one section of the Union, it is as good over the whole extent of it.

A SENATOR. What is the principle of that law?

Mr. RUSK. The principle is this: that, if any portions of Indian tribes in amity with the United States shall, in their territory, commit depredations upon any of the people of the United States, or pass beyond their own lands, and commit depredations, upon application made for remuneration for damages sustained, the Government shall guarantee their payment; and it is the principle, and such is the provision of the intercourse law, that, if the Indians are entitled to receive annuities, the claims are to be taken and paid out of those annuities; but if they have not sufficient annuities to pay them, then they are guaranteed out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. HUNTER. If the Senator will permit me, I desire to make an inquiry of him. Does not the intercourse law extend only to Indian territories outside the boundaries of the United States, and did it not extend only to that territory over which the United States had exclusive jurisdiction?

Mr. RUSK. I have just said that it did not extend to Alabama and Georgia.

Mr. ATCHISON. I will answer the question of the Senator from Virginia. If an Indian, living within that territory, comes into a State of the Union, and commits depredations upon a citizen, the intercourse law indemnifies that citizen for damages sustained, whether it be within the territory or in the States.

Mr. RUSK. Yes, sir; and if the Senator will look to the fourth volume of the Laws of the United States, he will see the intercourse law, to the 17th article of which, particularly, I refer him. Then, if an Indian within the Territory should pass over his line, and go into the State of Missouri, or any other State of the Union, and commit depredations, steal the property of a white man, and the white man should make application, he would be entitled to receive pay. That is the principle, and, I say, if it is good in Missouri or Michigan, it should be good in Alabama or Georgia.

A SENATOR. Whence is the money to be obtained to pay for the damages?

Mr. RUSK. In the first place, if the Indians have annuities, it is the business of the Government of the United States to deduct them out of those annuities; but if they have not sufficient annuities, they must be paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. BADGER. The Government is to see that payment is made to the sufferers.

Mr. RUSK. The Government "guaranties"—that is the expression of the law—the payment. Now, let us apply this principle to this case. Here are these individuals, not responsible for the policy of the Government, whether it be good or bad, not responsible for the speculators—peaceable, quiet citizens, industriously pursuing their avocations for a livelihood, that are for a long time depredated upon by these Indians stealing their cattle and corn to live upon. It is unnecessary to go into a history of it. The Indians were about to leave their property. It is regarded generally among the tribes of Indians as a high qualification, and one that recommends them, if they can steal well. They commenced depredations. There were none in Georgia; they passed over the line, and came among the unprotected settlers on the Alabama line, to steal their corn, and things of that description. Georgia turned out men to defend her citizens, and so did Alabama. From these individuals they received supplies to live upon; and part of the claim now before the Senate arises from that. It may be answered that we should have paid for these claims out of the annuities due to the Creeks. A question would arise there, which might, to some extent, involve the policy of the Government. One thing is certain: the law had not been extended, and the people in Georgia and Alabama did not receive the same protection which they would have received if they had lived in some other States of the Union. Was there equity or justice in that?

There were various classes of these claims. Some of them were for consequential damages. A great many persons were driven off their farms, and they claimed damages for that. Those now reported are for actual property taken away from the citizens, the most of whom were poor; and they have been kept out of the remuneration for their losses for fourteen or fifteen years. The determination of this case does not involve the question whether the policy of the Government was a wise or foolish one, whether it was just or unjust. These people had nothing to do with it. They had no control over Governor Gayle, or over this Government. They suffered the loss of their property; and now they ask that the same principle may be extended over them as the intercourse law extends over other States. They ask you to pay them for what they have lost; and I think you are honestly bound to do it.

Mr. BELL. I believe it seems to be thought both by the honorable Senator from Michigan and the honorable Senator from Alabama that the allusion which I made yesterday to the subject of the policy of the Government was rather unfortunate for the purpose for which this amendment was offered. The honorable Senator from Michigan has stated once, and repeated again, in the course of his argument, that the Senator from Tennessee had made what he considered a gratuitous attack upon the policy of a late Administration. I regret it very much if I have said anything calculated to prejudice this claim in the opinion of any member of the Senate; or if it was an unnecessary allusion I regret it equally. The honorable Senator will bear me out, by his own recollection, when I state now and repeat what I stated yesterday, that I do not mean to charge anything upon the policy of that honorable Senator when he was a member of the Executive Department of the Government, as to his intention of carrying out any policy which might not, under the circumstances, have been justifiable as an experiment. I furthermore alluded to what I considered might be the controlling influence in the Executive Department of the Government at that time—the necessity under which they considered themselves, or considered the country, of removing the Indians at all hazards, by every course of policy which it was in their power to adopt. I did not then, nor do I now, wish to rake up those ancient charges against the policy of the Administration of 1834, '35, '36, and '37, when these transactions occurred; but I now maintain that my allusion was strictly legitimate to a proper exposition to this Senate of the grounds upon which this claim is brought forward; and I now repeat it, without desiring to go into any further charges than those already alluded to as to the impolicy of the course of the Administration at that period, although I am free to admit that there could have been no sinister or improper motives on the part of the Administration, much less of the honorable Senator who was at the head of the War Department. The fundamental principle upon which these claims are brought forward is the policy which the Government pursued in making the treaty of 1832, and in the carrying of it into execution.

I said that it was a most unfortunate policy, and I repeat it. It not only resulted in these disastrous conflicts between the whites and the Indians, in which blood was shed, but it resulted in the expenditure of $3,000,000. That was an estimate I made from recollection, having some remembrance of the transactions connected with the Creek Indians in the period of 1836-'37. It led to an additional expenditure of $3,000,000. That is not material, however. That became necessary by the first-fruits of the false policy of the Government. What was that policy? It is the ground upon which these claims have to be sustained, if they are sustained at all; for I beg leave here, in the outset of my reply, to state what I stated in substance yesterday, that the intercourse law does not embrace such claims, although the spirit of it, as has been argued by the Senator from Texas, [Mr. Rusk,] may well be said to apply to them. But they do not rest on that exclusively. I said there was no principle of obligation resting on the Government to protect the property of its citizens in time of war, as a general principle, against a public enemy. Whether this Indian outbreak be considered as a war, properly speaking, or not, there were still behind that the circumstances in the nature of the policy of the Government adopted in this particular Indian treaty, and in the policy pursued in attempting its execution and the removal of the Indians west, which take it out of all those principles, I mean such principles as would exclude the inhabitants of Alabama from coming to the Government and claiming indemnity upon the new principles growing out of that anomalous policy, a policy unknown in the former history of the country. I said there were these new facts and circumstances, and principles founded upon them, upon which they could come here, and that they had created an obligation on the part of the Government that could not be disregarded when we look into the history and origin of the depredations. What is that extraordinary policy? I stated that this was the first treaty in which the Government had permitted—expressly in the terms of the treaty itself—and sustained, also, because they could not prevent it, perhaps, after the treaty had been executed, so far as the people of Alabama were concerned—the white settlers to enter within the limits of the Indian Territory before they removed them. What is that treaty? The honorable Senator from Michigan did not allude to the clause of it under which these difficulties arose. It is in the fifth article, and is in these words:

"All intruders upon the territory hereby ceded shall be removed therefrom in the same manner as intruders may be removed by law from other public lands, until the country is surveyed and the selection is made."

That is, by the Indian reservations, of which there were about six thousand.

"Excepting, however, from this provision those white persons who have made their own improvements and not expelled the Creeks from theirs. Such persons may remain until their crops are gathered. After the country is surveyed and the selections made, this article shall not operate upon that part of it not included in such selections."

I call the attention of the honorable Senator from Michigan to that fact. He stated yesterday, that the treaty was well considered. "After the country is surveyed and the selections made, this article shall not operate upon that part of it not included in the selections." What is the meaning and purport of that article? A body of the Indian country which had been ceded by the treaty of 1832, as soon as it was surveyed, and before it was even sold, was laid open to the population of the surrounding States, and of the citizens of the United States generally, by the express provisions of the treaty itself. Now, if the honorable Senator from Michigan chooses to interpose an explanation, I shall be happy to hear it. I call upon him to state what the policy of the Government was in introducing this new feature to coerce by that means the removal of the Indians and drive them out of the territory by letting in the whites, and showing the Indians that, from the necessity of their condition, they were obliged to go.

Mr. CASS. Will the Senator refer me to the section of the treaty to which he alludes?

Mr. BELL. It is the fifth article of the treaty. I will go on, and the Senator can answer at any time. I reaffirm that all these disasters, these depredations, this destruction of the property of the citizens of Alabama, followed naturally, and by a sort of inevitable necessity, from the policy adopted by the Government, which was the ground-work of a new principle for indemnity for losses sustained by the citizens. Either the obligation rests upon Alabama or upon the Government of the United States to indemnify these citizens. If it rests fairly upon the State of Alabama, the application ought to be made to the Legislature of that State. If it rests fairly upon the United States, the application is well made and the question is well here. There is nothing in the preceding policy of this Government—there is no principle established on regular principles recognized by this Government heretofore—that applies to such a case as this.

Mr. CASS. I have been reading the article to which the Senator refers, and will ask him what is precisely the point he makes?

Mr. BELL. I mean to say that a new principle and a new obligation were incurred by the Government by a new feature adopted in this treaty. In the first place, it ought to be premised that it was not provided in the treaty itself that the Indians should remove before the white settlers were admitted to occupy their territory. The article to which I referred is, that as soon as the lands are surveyed, and without reference to the removal of the Indians, of course implying while they remained there, the white population was free to go in and cover their territory.

Mr. CASS. The country was purchased by the United States. There were five millions of acres; and had there been no Indian reservations there, the settlers would have gone there next day. There were reservations allowed. The treaty said to the settlers that they should not go there until the country was surveyed, and the Indians had made their selections. They could go on it, because the rest of the land was the land of the United States. They had the same right to go there as on any of the public lands. That is the provision of the treaty. The same system prevailed in relation to every other portion of the public land. The moment it was opened up, everybody could go there; but to protect the Indians, the treaty said, you shall not go in until the land is surveyed and selected for the Indians.

Mr. BELL. I beg pardon of the honorable Senator, but I think that is an evasion. Has it been the policy of the Government, or was it the intention of the Government, in this treaty, when there were twenty-one thousand Indian souls within the limits of the territory ceded, besides some two or three thousand negroes, to buy out the land, and still let them remain permanent residents of the country? Was there nothing contemplated as to their removal westward? Was there no provision in the treaty which showed that the Government had in view their removal west of the Mississippi? The policy of the Government had been that the Indians shall remove within a given time.

Mr. CASS. You knew, Mr. President, that the treaty could not have been made unless the reservations had been granted to the Indians, and a right to go or remain, as they pleased. The Government provided for the removal of every Indian who would go; but those who would not go had a right to remain and sell the land, or hold it, as they pleased. Not one foot of country could have been obtained without that provision.

Mr. BELL. I was showing, by the provisions of the treaty, that the Government had contracted an obligation which is not usually contracted in such cases, in regard to Indian depredations. I repeat again, that twenty-one thousand Indians are said to have been occupying the territory of only five millions of acres; and that there was no provision made for their removal prior to the filling up of the country by white settlers all round them. What is the answer of the honorable Senator to that? Why, that it was a political necessity; and you, Mr. President, are appealed to to confirm the truth of what he stated—that the fact was that no treaty could be made unless on these anomalous terms. That does not touch my argument. It is only affirmative of what I laid down yesterday, that the Government has pursued a policy which made it liable for all the consequences.

Mr. CASS. I hope the Senator will pardon me for interrupting him a moment.

Mr. BELL. Certainly, as often as the Senator chooses.

Mr. CASS. I say again, as I have already said, the Senator is perfectly right in stating that the Government wanted to remove the Indians. The terms of the treaty are express upon that point. Government did want to remove them; but they expressly stipulated that they would not force them to go.

Mr. BELL. Of course. I was coming to that, and to prove by the treaty, everything that I had said, if the Senator had waited a moment.

Mr. CASS. I will wait with pleasure.

Mr. BELL. I must be very unfortunate if I cannot be understood by the Senator nor the Senate generally, when I say, I care not what may have been the political necessities of the country of any sort, which appeared to them to be of such a nature as to require that a treaty should be made on some terms or other. That is not the question. But those necessities having existed, they felt themselves under obligations to make a treaty such as was unknown in our Government before; and there has been none like it since. They felt themselves authorized to make it on account of the stress of public sentiment in particular quarters of the country, and their having made it, I say, is the foundation of this claim. Whether they made it with an ill or a good motive is not the question. I have no doubt it was a good motive; and I only stated the facts, that they, in consequence of it, opened a country containing five millions of acres of land, and occupied by twenty-five thousand Indians, and allowed the white population to flow in and occupy the country promiscuously, and contemporaneously with the Indians.

It is scarcely necessary to allude to the clause of the treaty to which the Senator has referred, that they might go or stay as they chose, that the Government would use no coercion and use no means except that they would provide subsistence for one year to those who would go west of the Mississippi, and aid them in removing when they thought proper to go.

This was a most extraordinary treaty, though it was one which the Government might have felt themselves justified in making as an experiment. But I think there was a neglect to apply past experience with reference to the treatment of the Indians, or to bring it to bear in making this treaty; but still perhaps the public necessities of the country were such that they felt themselves justified in making the experiment. It is the result of that experiment which lays the foundation for these claims.

This country was thrown open in the way I have shown as soon as the lands were surveyed and selections made, and the whole country was immediately filled with white people as settlers. The sales of the reservations proceeded as rapidly as possible from the time the surveys were completed, and the country was soon swarming with settlers. The consequence was, it is alleged in argument here, and in some of the reports, that there was another fact or element of mischief intervening; and that it was not starvation or the necessitous condition of the Indians which drove them to commit hostilities, but the enormous frauds which were practiced upon the Indian titles. The Senator from Michigan has charged that I made a gratuitous attack upon a late Administration in my argument upon this question. In his explanation he has attempted to fasten the cause of these Indian disturbances mainly upon these frauds. I would not have thought it important to press this argument on this occasion, because I thought that all which it was necessary to show was, that the policy of that Administration laid the ground-work, in that extraordinary treaty, for the indemnification of the white settlers, if their property was destroyed by the Indians, under circumstances which, according to the usage of Government and the obligations which attach to it, to protect the citizens from losses from any quarter, would apply to them. Yet, as the Senator has touched upon these frauds, although I have not looked at the documents nor the debates with regard to them, since they occurred in 1837, '38, '39, they are still so fresh in my recollection, that I think I cannot be mistaken in regard to them. The Senator will himself call to mind that there were serious charges imputed to the commissioners appointed to investigate these transactions; and the opponents of the Administration, of whom I was one, urged strongly upon the public that the Government was grossly in default in the appointment of unfaithful and dishonest agents, who, at that time, it was believed and urged—although they may be found to have been honest men, if an investigation shall ever take place—connived at the frauds committed by persons who went in to purchase from the Indians. It was not the speculators alone who produced this bad feeling among the Indians. It will be found stated, in more than one official report made to the Government, that the practices which operated upon the minds of the Indians, greatly to sour their temper and dispositions, were not only the frauds themselves, but that in a great measure the connivance of the agents themselves who were sent to guard the rights of the Indians and certify to the frauds committed, produced the excited and hostile feeling on the part of the Indians.

These were charges made at the time—in 1837, '38, '39—against the Administration, for gross negligence and want of foresight, in not sending out firm, decided, and honest men to see that justice was done to the Indians, and to prevent the frauds which were practiced to a large extent by these men; and they were made on very strong and plausible grounds. You must recollect, Mr. President, that the parties interested in the purchase of these lands, were actually supposed to be active and energetic in diffusing dissatisfaction and discontent, and in seeking to occasion hostility between the white people and the Indians, for the purpose of driving them out of the country, and also to prevent an investigation as to these frauds. These are facts which can never be fully disclosed; but it must be recollected that the country was full of charges of that nature at the time; that the speculators, when they found that their frauds had been detected, and that the Government was disposed to do justice to the Indians, that those very speculators were concerned in exciting that state of feeling which subsequently resulted in these depredations.

There is another fact which should not be forgotten, and that is, that Mr. John B. Hogan, who was selected because he was a man of character, honesty, and firmness, and not likely to be intimidated by the machinations of speculators, or any terrors which they could hold over him, was sent out to investigate the acts of former agents. I will not speak positively as to the results of that investigation, but I believe that Mr. Hogan was withdrawn, on some pretext or other, from the final investigation. It may have been on account of the breaking out of hostilities. I do not recollect whether he was sent there prior to, or subsequent to the commencement of hostilities; but I know, that on making an investigation into some of these frauds, he found, from the nature of the task, that it was one he did not wish to commence or persevere in; and he was withdrawn; but whether antecedent to the breaking out of hostilities, or subsequently, I do not know. All these circumstances were made grounds of charges against the Administration, as the Senator from Michigan [Mr. Cass] must remember.

It would occupy days and days to go fully into the truth of these charges; but I do not wish to go fully into them, and merely refer to them now in reply to the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. Cass,] who has stated that the frauds practiced on the Indians were the cause of hostilities. He will find, by the reports of the commissioners appointed, I believe, by himself, that mention is made of one remarkable fact. I believe he will find it stated in the report of Mr. Crawford, that in those towns where the Indians suffered most by these frauds, they were peaceable; and that, although he was satisfied that the frauds on the reservations tended to augment the discontent among the Indians, and to incite them to hostility against the whites; still there was the remarkable fact, that in those towns where the frauds had been perpetrated to the most enormous extent, they were friendly to the United States; and the Senator will find in the same report, as was stated yesterday, that the hostilities were confined to the lower towns, where the frauds were less in degree.

I will not say that all that was charged against the Administration for neglect or improper conduct in sending out agents of such a character, or such principles, that they would dare to connive at the frauds, was true; but such charges existed at the time, and I do not wish, now, to enter into an investigation of their truth or falsity. If the Senator will look into the report of Mr. Crawford—I do not know who was associated with him, whether it was Mr. Chambers or Mr. Balch—

Mr. CASS. It was Mr. Balch.

Mr. BELL. But it was a commission appointed for the purpose of putting the best face on this whole transaction, and it may well be presumed in reference to the attitude in which the Administration was placed—because this was not the first time, it was at the very period when these charges occurred, and which were made against the administration—that these gentlemen, who were not considered gentlemen who would whitewash the Administration, particularly Mr. Crawford, were sent with the view, no doubt, of putting the very best face on the policy of the Government in relation to these Creek Indian hostilities, that could be put upon it. And every sentence of their report, if interpreted fairly, must be taken in connection with the presumed desire of the Government, not that they should assume the facts, but that they should state the case as fully and fairly, and as favorably to the Administration as possible, consistently with the transactions which had taken place in the Indian Territory. And even with all that, you will find that these commissioners were obliged to admit, that the other circumstances which were urged yesterday, contributed to the fanning of this flame on the part of the Creeks who took part in these hostilities. From the report of Mr. Crawford himself, you will find that there was but a portion of these Creek Indians engaged in these hostilities, and that not one fifth of their whole number.

Now, what are these claims? The white population of Alabama, and Georgia, and Florida, and Tennessee, and Mississippi, and all other States of the Union who thought proper to go and settle in the Indian country, were at liberty to do so, whether it was agreeable to the Indian or not, or without regard to whether the Indians had been removed or not; and they did so. We have the census of the Indians to show that there were at least twenty thousand Indians there before any removals took place. The whites went in and planted themselves in their territory, and purchased of the reserves and others; for there was a large portion of the country left for sale even after the reservations were selected. Well, a treaty was made with the Indians whereby it was expressly stipulated that the country ceded to the United States, which should remain after the selections of the reserves were made, should be open for settlement, not as soon as the Indians were removed, but as soon as the surveys were made. Then the balance of the country was thrown open, and even the reservations themselves, as rapidly as the whites chose to come in. The treaty by its provisions supposed that the Government should in some measure superintend these purchases. I beg the honorable Senator from Michigan to remember, that in the treaty made in 1832, it was the intention of the Government to provide against fraud upon the Indians in the sale of their reservations; and they did so most unfortunately by sending men into the country who were incompetent, or who did not possess firmness or integrity—I do not care which, for a want of firmness is in such a case equivalent to the want of integrity—who suffered the Indians to be defrauded; for, if they had integrity in their hearts, they had not the moral courage requisite to certify and report the contracts purporting to be made by the Indian reserves. I know that the Government saw these frauds, and attempted to remedy them; but they never did remedy them to any great extent. Now, these people, being invited not only by the invitation of the Government, but by the fifth article of the treaty itself, did rush in and take possession of these lands. These lands were sold in 1834. If the honorable Senator from Michigan thinks that there is any charge meant to be made gratuitously, or without reference to the true principles connected with the investigation of this question, I should like him to state whether or not there would be any other distinct ground on which to make these claims but that which exists in the policy thus adopted, and of having this country settled before these Indians were removed? Not only was there no provision made that the Indians should be removed, but contrary to what was expressly stipulated they should not remove unless they thought proper to do so—that no coercion should be used on the part of the Government; that the Government would provide the means for their removal, whenever they might choose to go.

Now, I said yesterday that the policy of the Government was to starve them to go west. Of course, when I used that language, no one would suppose that I meant to charge the Administration with the design that the Indians should actually perish; but that the prospect of starvation should be held up to them, unless they chose voluntarily to go. That was the substitute adopted in the place of arms. And not only was this starvation policy a substitute in the place of arms, but it was a substitute for the stipulations in the treaty itself that they should remove. I remark that there is no stipulation in this treaty that they should remove, and I should like the honorable Senator from Michigan to explain it, if I am not right. I should like to ask him if that was not the new principle, the new policy—the policy of starvation which was adopted in that treaty? They omitted to insert the usual provisions in such cases, namely: that the Indians should remove within a given time. That provision was omitted. And why was it omitted? I know that the answer will be: "We could not make any other treaty." There was no stipulation that they should remove. There was, in point of fact, a stipulation that they should not be compelled to remove. And how did the Government expect them to remove? I have said that they intended to let in the white settlers upon them to be substituted for a stipulation for their removal, or for a military force to effect their removal. Now, I would like the Senator to tell me why was not the usual stipulation for their removal made?

Mr. CASS. Does the Senator desire me to answer his question now?

Mr. BELL. Yes, sir; if the Senator pleases to do so.

Mr. CASS. The Senator talks about there being a want of stipulations to remove the Indians, as though it was a very strange omission in the treaty. Does he suppose they were held there?

Mr. BELL. The Senator answers my inquiry by putting another. I want to know why there was no stipulation in the treaty to remove the Indians?

Mr. CASS. The gentleman has answered that question himself. We provided that all who were willing to go should be aided, and should have land to cultivate until they chose to remove. We said to those who were willing to go, You shall have a country of your own, and we will provide for you in getting located upon it. I repeat, that the gentleman has answered his own question. We could not make the treaty on any other terms.

Mr. BELL. I know that is the answer to that question. Then, again, the honorable gentleman stipulated in the fourth article of the treaty, that the whites might go in and settle on the lands before the time for the sale of the reservations had expired, as soon as the surveys were completed.

Mr. CASS. I will merely state in answer to that, that the land became the property of the United States as all other public lands were, and that settlers went in there as they did to any other portion of the lands of the United States. We did not attempt to restrain people from going in as settlers if they chose, and the Indians were secured in their rights while they chose to remain. I do not doubt that bad men went there as well as to other places. I think it probable that the Senator knows himself what were the facts in the case, and if he does I have no doubt that he knows that some bad men went there to make certificates. It is, however, a very complicated business, and it can be easily seen that it is difficult for a white man to know one Indian from another, or to distinguish A B from C D; and even though an agent were a man of probity, it would be quite possible to deceive him.

Mr. BELL. I will now excuse the honorable

Senator. I have not taken any indirect method to ascertain his views, or to obtain an answer to my inquiries. I have tried to have the Senator answer whether these extraordinary provisions introduced into this treaty—such as were never known before, and never will be again I think, if we learn anything by experience—whether that policy was not his own conclusion at the time, that letting in the settlers among the Indians, would speedily drive them west of the Mississippi.

Mr. CASS. I do not suppose that anybody thought of such a thing. I take it that every one supposes, that as soon as the Indians chose to occupy the lands we gave them, the whites would come in, of course. I do not suppose it was the result of policy at all. They were settling there, as on any other public lands.

Mr. BELL. It is most extraordinary. I do not dispute that the Senator states what he considers as a matter of fact, as to his own conclusions; but it is extraordinary that twenty-three thousand Indians with their slaves would be permitted to remain permanent citizens of Alabama.

Mr. CASS. They did not remain. They were going all the time.

Mr. BELL. It is most extraordinary that he should have considered for a moment that such would be the consequence. And on the face of the treaty itself I have as strong proof as I desire, that they had no such thing in contemplation; for, it was expressly provided that the reservations might be sold within five years; and the stipulation was, that Government should appoint agents to certify the sales, and to see that the Indians were not wronged in the transfers. And, in the same treaty a provision was made, that the Government would remove them, if they chose to go, and give them subsistence for twelve months after their removal. Sir, was there a moment of time in which it was contemplated by the people of the State of Alabama that the Indians would remain in that territory? Would Georgia have consented? They expected a fulfillment of the guarantee given to the State of Georgia, that the Indians should be removed, and that they should not be permitted to settle down among the whites, to become a nuisance in society, and commit such scenes of depredation as had occurred in Alabama.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. Cass] has not given the fact in the terms of the treaty itself. It was a treaty intended to effect their removal, and the whole basis of my argument on this claim stands, and the main ground on which I put it is, that the white settlers were tempted, invited, induced, and recommended by the Government to go and buy lands in the Indian country, and settle down among the Indians before they were removed, and even before they had time to remove, because they could not make their selections till the surveys were made; and I believe they were not made until 1834, two years after the treaty was entered into. At that moment the rush of all the population from the surrounding States was the consequence of the result of the treaty. They were invited to go. It was an experiment on the part of the Government, I repeat again. I impute no bad motives. I think I might impute want of foresight in not calculating the probable consequences of this influx of white settlers previous to the removal of the Indians. The whites got in among them, and purchased the reservations as fast as the surveys could be made. They filled the whole country, and occupied the remaining territory not taken up by the reservations; and where was the foothold—where was the homestead for the Indian? What provision was made for them whilst remaining in the country? I ask the Senator from Michigan [Mr. Cass] whether there was a single acre, not taken up by the reservations, retained for temporary cultivation by the Indians until they removed? I ask him if the whole country was not taken up, sold, and occupied in 1834?

Mr. CASS. Every head of an Indian family had property to settle on if he did not choose to go west.

Mr. BELL. I ask if, excepting the reservations, there was one single acre of territory retained? If the sales of the reservations were not only encouraged, but expected? The agents who were to superintend the sales were immediately sent into the country, and where was a foot of territory reserved for the Indians until they thought proper to remove? What was an Indian head of a family when he had sold his reservation? That is the question.

Mr. CASS. Will the Senator permit me to answer by saying that he would have to go west. It was the condition to which he was inevitably reduced by the disposal of his property. Is the Government bound to support every poor Indian, or every poor white man?

Mr. BELL. Of course; that is perfectly consistent with my argument. The honorable Senator says the policy of the Government was, that they should go or stay, as they pleased. Reservations were made for the purpose of allowing them to stay. But they were permitted to sell those reservations, without any condition requiring them to go. There was no stipulation that they should go west; and even after they sold their reservations, they were at liberty to go or stay, as they pleased.

Mr. CASS. They had a right to go west, if they chose.

Mr. BELL. They had; but they were encouraged to sell their reservations, and remain. One of the grounds alleged for the destitution of the lower country of the Creeks was, that they sold out their reservations speedily, and consumed the proceeds of their sales, and then had nothing to subsist upon. Not only had they parted with their money; not only had they consumed the proceeds of the sales of their reservations; but when they once sold their reservations, they had not a foot of land which they could cultivate. I ask the honorable Senator again, whether, after such an execution of such a treaty as this, the Government ought not to have foreseen the results, or ought not to have calculated, almost inevitably, that the state of things which did arise would arise? So much for that.

I base this upon the ground of the anomalous policy pursued by the Government. It invited the citizens of Alabama and Georgia, and every other State of the Union, to go into the country and settle promiscuously with the Indians, on a space of no greater extent than five millions of acres of land, and among twenty thousand Indians. These Indians had permission to sell their reservations, and the white settlers had all the balance of the territory. Yet a treaty was made with no stipulation for the removal of the Indians, and the Government did not undertake to remove them. They were left as free to stay or to go, as the white man of this country is free to change his residence or keep his own homestead. Not one foot of the land reserved was intended to be permanently reserved to the Indians. I do not mean by this to be in any manner offensive, and I repeat again that I admit there were necessities which may have presented themselves to the minds of the members of the Administration at the time the treaty was made. The question is not now whether it was bad or good policy—whether it was wise or unwise. I do not raise the question whether it was wise or unwise, for them to act in the way in which they did act. I do not insist upon that. It is no part of my argument. I happened to throw out yesterday a suggestion that it was a most unfortunate policy for the Government. I said it was unfortunate that the Government should have allowed white settlers to go in and settle among the Indians. The consequence of their going in under the circumstances in which they did go, was the loss of the property and the lives of a good many of them. The question is, whether this anomalous policy, this singular policy, this experiment, if you please so to call it, made under the stress of extraordinary political necessity, having produced among the Indians, by a multiplication of the causes of discontent, a gradual blowing up of the flame of hostile feeling on their part, which actually broke out against the property and lives of the citizens—the question is, who are chargeable with these results? Who are responsible for them? The question is, whether these circumstances did not take the case out of that rule of public law which discards any obligation on the part of Government to protect its citizens against the outbreaks of their neighbors—against mobs, against civil disturbances of every description, against burnings, plunderings, and robberies.

This is the ground of this claim. It grew out of a policy of the Government which was peculiar to this case. It was not like any case which had ever arisen before, and there will, probably, be no case identical with it in all its circumstances again. I stated yesterday, and I called the attention of Senators to it, that we have had some experience from this treaty, and the execution of it, which may hereafter be useful in forming other treaties in California and Oregon, and with Indians on the western frontier this side of the Rocky Mountains.

I urge further, that the Government was advised that, unless supplies were furnished, and continued to be furnished—and it may be fairly implied, too, from these admonitions that they were expected to be of sufficient quantities—the starving condition of the Indians would necessarily lead to depredations upon the property of the white settlers. That is not denied by the honorable Senator from Michigan. The honorable Senator, I believe, stated that some supplies were furnished.

Mr. CASS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BELL. But they were furnished to a very limited extent, and were not sufficient. The honorable Senator is bound to admit that one of the very gentlemen, sent by him to that country to investigate the ground of the hostilities, reported that the admonition was not heeded, and for what reason? Because it was the policy of the Government to coerce the removal of the Indians west of the Mississippi. It was supposed that I was using a very harsh term when I said that the policy was starvation. Now, the trusty commissioner of the Government admitted the very same thing. The honorable Senator said, in a portion of his remarks yesterday, that the then Administration could not be held responsible for any statement made by the commissioners or agents sent by the Government. Why, sir, they were sent with full instructions. They were confidential agents of the Government. They received confidential instructions. It was not expected, of course, that their reports were to be confidential, because it was intended to spread them before the public. One of the commissioners was a devoted partisan. I knew him well. He reports that it was not the policy of the Government to subsist the Indians, but that the policy of the Government required their removal westward. If he does not say that in terms, it is necessarily implied from what he does say. It is the commissioner sent out by the honorable Senator himself who makes this declaration. It was the trusted agent of the Government who avowed what had always been disavowed before.

The honorable Senator said, yesterday, that he could not be made responsible for the vague statements of the commissioners, or agents, or whoever they might be. I stated that the Government had been advised, during this period, either that supplies should be furnished to the Indians, or that an adequate military force should be sent into the country. The honorable Senator to-day, makes two answers to that charge. He says there was a military force on the borders. I do not know that there was. If he means to say that there was a military force on the borders of the Creek country, I think he is mistaken. There may have been a military force in Florida, and there may have been a very small force at some point on the borders of the Indian country. But whence did the complaint come? From Alabama and Georgia. The Government was admonished by the authorities of those States, that unless a military force was sent to the Indian country, hostilities might be apprehended. The Government was informed that the condition of the country was such that an outbreak might be looked for at any moment, unless there was an adequate military force there. I take it, that the honorable Senator is mistaken when he says there was a military force there. True, it was not the policy of the Government to supply provisions; but the policy on which the articles of this treaty were founded was still adhered to. And what was that policy? The persuasion of hunger and destitution to lead the Indians west of the Mississippi. The Government omitted, in this treaty, compelling their removal. The Government agreed that they might remain as long as they chose. The great body of the Indians were reluctant to go. Discontents were allowed to swell up to such a volume that they at last burst forth in a general conflagration in the low towns, constituting one fourth or one fifth of the tribe.

The honorable Senator has answered the charge that the then Administration did not take heed; and he asks me what right the Government had to send a military force there, or to interfere with the Indians at all? He referred to the act of the State of Alabama, extending the laws of that State over the Indian tribes, thereby destroying their tribal character, destroying their existence as a community. He asks what right the Government had to interfere?

Mr. CASS. Will the honorable gentleman allow me to say that he is speaking of intrusions upon their lands, and of persons going into the Indian country? It ceased to be Indian country under the terms of the treaty, and under the Alabama law of 1832. The Senator is speaking of intrusions upon Indian lands. They would come within the intrusion law, and that was the very subject of dispute between this Government and the government of Alabama. I did not say that we had not the right; I maintain that we had the right to send troops there. What I said was, that we might have been brought into conflict with the government of Alabama, and that that was a consequence to be avoided; but troops were there under General Jesup.

Mr. BELL. The honorable Senator asked me what right, after the community of the Indians was destroyed, the Government had to send troops there? Why, the Government had the right, on the call of the Executive of Alabama or of Georgia, to send troops there at all times; but I suppose that the honorable Senator meant, by the interrogatory which he put to me, to question the power of this Government, under the Constitution, to assume the control of regulating the Indian tribes in the States—a question which was settled as early as the first administration of General Washington.

Mr. CASS. When the title of the Indians was extinguished to the country, the intercourse law could not apply, and the United States had no authority to exercise any power over them within the jurisdiction of the State. The moment the land was sold, the moment the Indian title was extinguished, the moment the land ceased to be Indian country, it came within the jurisdiction of the State of Alabama.

Mr. BELL. Then I would refer the honorable Senator back to the provisions of the treaty. The Senator, I understand, now contends that by selling their lands these Indians had lost their tribal character; that they were not longer a separate community, but under the jurisdiction of the State of Alabama; and that, therefore, the Government of the United States had lost all control over them after the execution of that treaty. I understand it to be his argument that the Government lost all control over these Indians from the moment the treaty was executed and their title to the land was extinguished, except as to those who were permitted or who chose to take reservations. I understand him to maintain that the Creek Indians, as a nation, became extinct, on the east side of the Mississippi at least, and that this Government, therefore, had no longer any controlling power over them—to make treaties with them, to regulate trade and intercourse with them, or to extend the common principles of the intercourse law to them. That is what I now understand to be the argument of the honorable Senator.

Mr. CASS. I wish the honorable Senator to understand me. I will repeat my position, in order that I may not be misunderstood. Suppose, that in the State of Tennessee there are a body of Indians owning land, over whom the Government by law has full control. If they cede their land to the Government of the United States; if the Indian title is extinguished, the Government has no longer the full control over the Indians, but the regulation of their concerns devolves upon the State.

Mr. BELL. Then I understood the Senator aright. The inference to be drawn from his statement is, that from the moment of the execution of that treaty, or from the time its stipulations were fulfilled, and the land was surveyed, and the white population permitted to flow in upon them, there was no Creek nation of Indians of which the Government could take charge under the Constitution of the United States and according to the principles established by Washington. The reason I refer to that is, to call the attention of the honorable Senator again to the fact, that in the very mode in which this treaty was executed, there was no stipulation requiring the removal of the Indians westward, because they were permitted to remain on reservations. At the same time, provision was made for the appointment of agents to examine and superintend the transfers of their reservations. I refer to it to prove that the fundamental policy of the Government in regard to these Indians was, that they were to be coerced, not by arms, but by starvation and the necessity of their condition, by their destitution. They were encouraged to sell their reservations, although there was no other land provided for them, unless they went westward. The experiment turned out to be unfortunate. The Indians rose in resistance; they refused either to starve, or to go, and commenced plundering the property of the whites.

I wish to place the fact strongly before the Senate, that this claim arises from a state of things which never existed before, and which will never, probably, exist again. The Government, by inviting the white population into this territory, entered into new obligations as to indemnity for the losses which should arise, and which did arise, and which I think might have been foreseen as almost inevitable under the stipulations of the treaty. The Indians refused to starve while they had arms in their hands. They determined to get some means of supporting life. They took cattle first, and, as the population on both sides became exasperated, they took life. The honorable Senator says it was a state of war. If it was war, it was a war produced by the anomalous and singular policy of the Government. The whites may be said to have been entrapped into it. They were made the instruments of removing these Indians by exposing their lives and property by going and settling among them. It was a most natural and a most inevitable thing, considering the Indian character. They were not compelled to remove by the terms of the treaty. They refused either to starve or to go. We know their disposition to remain in their old homesteads, and their native country. There was no stipulation obliging them to remove. The consequence of this might have been foreseen by a wise Government. But still I impute no bad motives to the then Administration. I admit the necessity under which that treaty was executed. But does it therefore follow, that because these political necessities existed—because the Government found itself under the necessity of making a novel experiment as to the mode of removing a tribe of Indians from one of the States of the Union—although these facts existed in full force, that the white population who had a right to suppose that they would be protected against any natural or probable consequence of their going into the territory, should not be indemnified? Admitting these necessities in the strongest point of view; admitting the danger of a collision between one of the States of the Union and the United States, does it follow that this Government is not under obligation to indemnify the instruments it employed to coerce the removal of the Indians? Is the Government not to indemnify the white people who were invited to go in and buy the public lands, and buy the Indian reservations? I ask honorable Senators, does it not follow clearly, as a necessary logical deduction from having made such an experiment on the white people of the United States, from having invited them to go into this country under such circumstances, that when they have lost their property, and many of them their lives, they shall be indemnified at least for their property? Those who have lost their lives can never again be restored to earth; but I think it right to indemnify the living for the property they have lost.

I will only say in conclusion, that a portion of this claim is for property taken by the United States troops, and applied to their own use. Of course, the honorable Senator cannot oppose that.

Mr. BERRIEN. Mr. President, I have a few brief observations to make upon this subject, and I am impelled to do so by the fact that, being one of the Representatives of the State of Georgia in this Chamber, I am not authorized, as I believe, to remain silent when a question is discussed concerning the right of a portion of my constituents; and am the more especially impelled to do so, because the issue which has been made between the Senators from Tennessee and Michigan, and the spirit in which that discussion has been conducted is, in my view, calculated to divert the attention of the Senate from the real question on which the allowance of this claim depends.

The honorable Senator gave way, and the Senate adjourned until Monday.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, May 17, 1852.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

Mr. MANGUM. I desire to make a motion, which I hope will receive the assent of the Senate. I learn that the late Mrs. Adams, relict of the late President John Quincy Adams, departed this life on Saturday, in this city; and, to enable the Senate to attend her funeral, I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day, it be to meet to-morrow at two o'clock. The funeral, I understand, takes place to-morrow. A gentleman suggests that we should adjourn until Wednesday. I am perfectly indifferent as to that; but I think it is a mark of respect which is due from you, Mr. President, from me, and from all the Senators, that we should be enabled to attend the funeral.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Move to adjourn until Wednesday.

Mr. MANGUM. I modify my motion, that when the Senate adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Wednesday.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS, ETC

Mr. COOPER presented the petition of the administrator of Michael Everly, praying that a pension may be granted to the children of said Everly, for services during the war of the Revolution; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GWIN presented the memorial of D. M. Wilson & Co., praying the payment of an interest held by them in a claim against Mexico; which was referred to the select committee appointed on the subject.

Mr. SUMNER presented a petition of citizens of Chicopee, Massachusetts, praying that the bill now pending before the Senate, called the homestead bill, granting to every man who is the head of a family, one hundred and sixty acres of land, may become a law; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, a petition of citizens of Salem, Massachusetts, praying that the law regulating the spirit ration in the Navy may be repealed; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WALKER presented two petitions of citizens of New York, praying that the homestead bill now pending before the Senate, may become a law; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BROOKE presented the memorial of John R. Jefferson and James H. Jenkins, for themselves and others, praying compensation for six months' service in carrying the mail in 1838 and 1839, withheld from them by Mr. Postmaster General Kendall; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, the memorial of John R. Jefferson, of Mississippi, praying compensation for carrying the mails, and damages for the annulment of his contract by the Postmaster General, in route No. 5,616; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, presented the petition of Orson Young, praying a pension on account of an injury received while in the military service; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SOULE presented a petition of citizens of Louisiana, praying an alteration in the mode of transporting the mails on the route between Donaldsonville and Washington in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, the memorial of Henry M. Hyams, and others, praying that the act of January 27, 1851, granting the right of preemption to certain purchasers and settlers under the Maison Rouge Grant, be so amended as to secure the same right to all purchasers holding bona fide under the said grant, irrespectively of any improvement or cultivation; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Also, the memorial of Joseph Mitchell, praying to have refunded certain duties illegally exacted and paid on American casks and barrels; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, a memorial of citizens of Louisiana residing on the Mississippi river, opposite New Orleans, praying that the port of New Orleans be extended to their side of the river bank; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, resolutions of the Common Council of New Orleans in relation to the establishment of a navy-yard and naval depôt at New Orleans; which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SEBASTIAN presented documents in relation to the claim of Billy Send Factor, for services and loss of property during the Florida war; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MALLORY presented a petition of citizens of Alachua county, Florida, praying a grant of land in lieu of the 16th section, which are included within certain Spanish grants; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, additional documents relative to the claim of Kennedy and Darling; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Also, additional documents in the case of Otway H. Berryman; which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. RUSK presented the petition of Anna Norton and Louis Faskit, heirs of Zephaniah Ross, praying to be allowed a pension for the services of their father during the war of the Revolution; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SMITH presented a petition of legal voters of Litchfield, Connecticut, praying that the homestead bill now pending before Congress, granting to every man who is the head of a family one hundred and sixty acres of land, may become a law; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BUTLER. I have in my hand a memorial and resolutions of the American Medical Society, which was recently in session at Richmond, Virginia, which I have been requested to present to the Senate. This memorial addresses itself to a subject of a good deal of importance, I presume, setting forth the deplorable condition of emigrant passengers coming to our shores. The resolutions are to the purport, that a medical officer or surgeon should by law be required to be on board of every emigrant vessel for the purpose of affording relief to passengers. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

It was so referred.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, presented the petition of Thomas Flanagan, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. JAMES, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to which was referred the petition of the heirs of Henry Miller, praying compensation for services rendered in the revolutionary war, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for their relief; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of the heirs of William C. McFarland, reported it back without amendment.

QUESTION AS TO THE RULES.

Mr. ATCHISON. I am instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to ask to be discharged from the further consideration of several petitions. Before doing so, I would inquire whether a motion to discharge a committee from the further consideration of a memorial will operate, under our rules, prejudicially to the memorial hereafter?

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator that it is not an adverse report, and the discharge does not prevent the individual from again presenting his case to the Senate.

Mr. ATCHISON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which were referred the following petitions, reported, and then asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to:

Petition of residents of Stockbridge, Wisconsin, praying the appointment of a commissioner to examine and settle all questions of controversy relating to lands in the Stockbridge reservation;

Report of the Secretary of the Interior, relative to an amount due the St. Regis Indians;

Memorial of John D. Stell in behalf of the family of Thomas J. Stell, praying remuneration for losses during the Creek war in 1836;

Petition of Samuel Stone and Isaac H. Marks, praying compensation for loss of property under an Indian treaty; and Petition of residents on the Menomonee purchase, praying the removal of the Indians therefrom.

Mr. CLEMENS. The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the petition of Colonel John C. Hays, praying compensation for services in raising and organizing a regiment of mounted volunteers in Texas, have instructed me to make an adverse report. I move that the report be laid on the table and printed.

The PRESIDENT. Does the Senator wish the report acted on at this time?

Mr. CLEMENS. No, sir; I wish it laid on the table, for the purpose of accommodating the Senator from California.

The PRESIDENT. If merely presented, it will come up in the regular order of adverse reports; but if it is laid on the table, it will have to be called up.

Mr. CLEMENS. I want it in such a condition that it can be called up at any time, if desired.

The motion to lay the report on the table, and print it, was agreed to.

RESOLUTION AND BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SEBASTIAN, by unanimous consent, asked and obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution respecting revolutionary pensions; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MALLORY, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to establish a land district in the State of Florida, to be called the district of Tampa; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

COMMITTEE ON ENROLLED BILLS.

On motion of Mr. JONES, of Iowa, it was Ordered, That an additional member be added to the Committee on Enrolled Bills, and that the appointment be made by the President pro tempore; and Mr. BROOKE was appointed.

BILLS PASSED.

The following engrossed bills were severally read a third time and passed:

An act declaring the assent of Congress to the State of Missouri to impose a tax upon all lands hereafter sold by the United States therein from and after the day of sale;

An act directing a survey and estimate of the cost of constructing a canal and basin at the terminus of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal at Georgetown; and

An act granting the right of way and making a grant of land to the States of Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa, in aid of the construction of a railroad from the Wabash to the Missouri river.

TESTS OF COAL.

Mr. COOPER. A resolution was adopted by the Senate some two weeks ago, calling upon the Secretary of the Navy for information in relation to certain tests that had been made as to the quality of coal in use by the Navy. The report of the engineer-in-chief was not communicated along with the information, being in a bureau different from that in which reports of that kind are usually filed. The resolution which I hold in my hand calls for that report. It contains very important information as to the quality of coal. I hope the resolution may be considered at this time.

No objection was made to the consideration of the resolution, and it was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be and he is hereby directed to communicate to the Senate the report of the Engineer-in-Chief of the Navy of the result of an experiment or experiments lately made by him to test the quality of the various kinds of coal now in use in the Navy of the United States, together with any information in possession of the Department on the subject not communicated in answer to the late call of the Senate.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, before putting the resolution to vote, I beg leave to communicate, for the benefit of the Administration and the country, certain information which, I am sure, will be useful to both. A few years ago, American coal was one of the articles calling most loudly for the protection of the Government; but, by a concurrence of fortunate circumstances, the coal trade has reached a point that puts it comparatively beyond the reach of destructive competition—that is, if the Government would extend to it such incidental encouragement as it has it in its power to do.

I understand that offers have been made to the Navy Department to supply the squadron lately ordered to the Chinese seas with American anthracite coal, at the rate of $15 per ton. These offers propose to deliver it, at this price, at any port in those seas which the Government may designate. The superiority of American coal, especially of anthracite, over English, and every other species, is well known to those who have given attention to the subject. I have before me an extract from the log of the Princeton, during a cruise in the Mediterranean, in the years 1848-'9, which exhibits the result of a test made with Scotch bituminous, Cumberland bituminous, and anthracite coal. It is as follows: Cumberland bituminous superior to Scotch, twenty-four per cent.; anthracite to Cumberland, sixteen and seven-tenths per cent. More recently still, I have been informed that a test has taken place in New York, under the direction of the Engineer-in-Chief of the Navy, an officer of great scientific attainments and intelligence, the result of which he has communicated to the Navy Department, in the shape of a report. This report exhibits a superiority of anthracite over bituminous of sixty-six per cent. The test was several times repeated with the same result. One of the experiments was made on board the Fulton, and was eminently successful; as was another, made on board one of the Government ships.

The superiority of anthracite over bituminous coal in producing steam, independent of these most satisfactory tests, has become abundantly manifest. Every vessel engaged in our internal trade north and east of Philadelphia, have used anthracite coal alone for several years past; and it is well known that the people engaged in that trade are keenly alive to their own interests, and would not be likely to do this were it not that those interests were promoted by doing it. But it is not only in producing a greater quantity of steam that the superiority of the anthracite coal is manifest. It is not, like the bituminous, either English or American, liable to spontaneous combustion. In long voyages, the bituminous coal is always liable to this danger. During the year 1850, the Noman-tum, Fanchou, and Waldron, laden with bituminous coal, cleared from Baltimore, destined for the Pacific, all took fire and were consumed—the two first wholly, and the last was only partially saved by running her aground. During the present year, the English steam-packet Amazon, only two days out, took fire from the spontaneous combustion of the coal in her bunkers, or hulks, and was consumed, together with a large portion of her crew. Were there no other superiority than that of security, it would be a great and decisive one.

There are, however, other advantages in its use, to which I have not adverted. On foreign stations, and in distant seas, we are without places to store it. The anthracite may be thrown out anywhere, and is liable to no damage from exposure to the weather. The bituminous must be housed in order to be preserved, and on several occasions the Government has been charged more for demurrage, or storage, than for freight from the port from whence it was shipped to the place of destination and use. It is necessary to retain the ships which transported it, and for such detention the Government must pay.

The cheapness of the anthracite is also an inducement to its use. Lately, anthracite was offered to the Government, to be delivered at any port which it might indicate in the Chinese seas, at $15 per ton. English coal, at the same ports, is now selling, as I am informed, for $20 per ton. Taking into account the superiority of the anthracite over the English bituminous, which is, at least, sixty per cent., makes the cost of the English, in comparison with the anthracite, $32 per ton, or over double the price of the former.

I throw out these suggestions for the benefit of the Government in purchasing its supplies, being assured that it only needs information on the subject, to induce it to use that which will be most economical. There is one other advantage, to which I desire to refer, that the anthracite possesses over the bituminous. Insurance upon the anthracite can be procured at one and three quarters per cent. to ports in the most distant seas—at any rate, to all the ports which our vessels have been in the habit of frequenting in the Chinese seas. Insurance upon the bituminous cannot be effected at all. This is another and decisive testimony in favor of the superior character of anthracite coal; and to it I invite the attention of the Government and the country.

The resolution was adopted.

COMPENSATION OF MEMBERS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I now ask leave, in pursuance of notice, to introduce a bill to change the mode of compensating members of Congress. In submitting this proposition, I beg leave to make a brief statement to the Senate as to the motives which have influenced me in drawing this bill. I shall soon retire from public office, and probably forever. In going out of public employment, I present this bill to provide that the agents and officers of the Government shall receive a reasonable compensation for their services. I do not think the present rate of compensation is just. It is very unequal. Tested by past experience, some of us have received our pay at the rate of eight dollars a day, while others have received from one hundred to four hundred dollars. That is altogether unjust. I propose to equalize the compensation, and to increase it. The first section of this bill, therefore, proposes to repeal all laws now in force, compensating members of Congress, from and after the 3d of March next. I make it prospective in its operations, because I propose to give an annual salary. When the old compensation bill passed, it was very much objected to by the people; in fact, it was odious to them, because the members of Congress received the money into their own pockets. They voted it to themselves. I believe the people would have had no objection to it, provided it had been prospective. I therefore make this bill entirely prospective. My object in that is, to allow the people, through their representatives, to pass upon it during the next Congress.

The second section of this bill proposes to allow members of Congress $2,000 per annum. The old compensation bill allowed them only $1,500 per annum. That was passed in 1816. Since that time there has been a great change in prices and in the currency. I therefore have increased the compensation $500. I do more. The old compensation bill did away with mileage. I retain the present mileage that is allowed to members of Congress, in consideration of the greater distance which some live from the capital than others. But I have made one change in the rule by which it is to be allowed. Instead of allowing it according to the distance which is usually traveled, which has produced a very different mode of assessing mileage—some charging by roads, some by rivers, some one way and some another, I have made it uniform, by directing that the Secretary of the Treasury shall compute it by a straight line, and thus ascertain it by latitude and longitude. That will pay an ample sum for bringing us here and taking us home, and something besides; and that, added to the salary of $2,000, will, it seems to me, be a reasonable compensation. I have then provided that the half of the $2,000 shall be paid when we assemble, and the other half when we go home, thus furnishing an inducement for the speedy transaction of the public business.

The last section provides that there shall be a deduction for absenteeism. We are sometimes left here without a quorum. When I first came to Congress, the practice of pairing off and going home was not known. It has all grown up within my memory, and within my service. The consequence is, that while, with a particular measure you may balance accounts, you often leave the two Houses of Congress without a quorum, to attend to other public business of our constituents. I therefore propose that such member, at the end of the session, shall give an account of his absent days; and that there shall be deducted $10 for each day, unless he shall have the excuse of sickness, either on his own part or that of a member of his family—which I think is a reasonable excuse.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator is aware that, under the bill of 1816, mileage was paid as usual.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I know; but that bill was repealed in 1818. I alluded to the law of 1818, which is the law under which we are now compensated.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair merely mentioned it for the Senator, so that, if it should be necessary to change his bill, he could do so.

Leave was given to introduce the bill, and it was read the first time and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would refer it to a committee, but I do not know any to which it belongs. I presume that it may take its chance among the general orders. I will ask, however, for its printing, if it does not take place as a matter of course.

The PRESIDENT. It will not be printed as a matter of course, unless it is read a second time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I hope it will now be read a second time.

The PRESIDENT. It will then come up immediately for consideration, as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will, then, move to lay it on the table, after it shall have been read the second time, so that I can get it printed.

The bill was then read the second time. It enacts, that, from and after the third day of March, 1853, all laws now in force for the compensation of members of Congress and Delegates from Territories shall be repealed, and that there shall be paid to each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress, a salary for his services of $2,000 per annum, one half thereof to be paid upon his attendance at the first session of Congress, in any year, and the other half at the end of the same session; and in addition, each Senator, Representative, and Delegate shall, for traveling, be paid at the beginning and end of each session of Congress, twenty cents for each mile of distance between his residence and the capital, upon a straight line—to be ascertained by the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, however, That no payment shall be made to any Senator for attending a called session of the Senate to act upon Executive business, at a time when the House of Representatives is not in session. The Secretary of the Treasury shall deduct from the compensation to be paid aforesaid at the end of each session, ten dollars for each day a member or Delegate may have been absent from his seat during the sitting of the House of which he is a member, unless such absence may have been occasioned by his sickness, or the sickness of his wife or child. Each Senator, Representative, and Delegate shall state at the end of each session how many days he so absented himself, and verify his statement on oath; and, if any Senator, Representative, or Delegate shall refuse to furnish such statement, no payment shall then be made to him.

The bill was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

THE DEFICIENCY BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1852," the pending question being upon the amendment of Mr. BELL, as amended, to insert the following:

For payment to the citizens of Alabama and Georgia, for depredations committed by Creek Indians upon their property, and for other property taken by the troops of the United States, and friendly Creeks, in the years 1836 and 1837, $353,797.

Mr. BERRIEN. It is not my purpose to detain the Senate by an elaborate discussion of the claim which this amendment presents to our consideration. If it had been agreeable to the Senate at its last sitting to have heard the brief remarks which I then proposed to submit, it would have been perfectly acceptable to me, as it was to acquiesce in what appeared to be the wish of the majority, to postpone its further consideration at that time, by an adjournment. Indeed, sir, it was not my purpose to have entered into this discussion at all. I felt that the claim of these memorialists was entirely safe in the hands of the Senators from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] Alabama, [Mr. CLEMENS,] and Texas, [Mr. Rusk,] aided by the elucidation which has been given to it by my colleague, who was part and parcel of these transactions, and therefore perfectly familiar with the occurrences on which the claim was founded. I have been induced to change that purpose, from an apprehension that the incidental discussion which occurred between the Senators from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] and Michigan, [Mr. Cass,] originating, as I think, in a misapprehension on the part of the Senator from Michigan of the position taken by the Senator from Tennessee—from an apprehension that that incidental discussion involving a subject of much more interest, one much more exciting than the consideration of the claim of these very humble memorialists, might result in diverting the attention of the Senate from the merits of the claim, and that the individual claimants might be made to suffer under the diversion occasioned by the discussion of the policy of a bygone Administration, under which their claims have arisen, and in which they had comparatively little interest.

Mr. President, my simple purpose is to endeavor to recall the attention of the Senate to the merits of the claim, to the preceding action of Congress on this subject, and to the obligation which they imposed upon us as their successors, to redeem in good faith the pledge which they have given. I desire first to say that I consider totally alien to the present question the inquiry, how far the rule which restrains the liability of a Government to indemnify its citizens for property destroyed by a public enemy, as that rule is understood among civilized nations, can be applied to the predatory and murderous incursions of savages upon the peaceable inhabitants residing in their vicinity? I do not think that the question arises under the consideration of this claim. I think it is a violation of all propriety, and a total inattention to the facts and circumstances of this case, to allege that the aggressions which were made, and which form the foundation of the present claim, were made in a public war. I submit to the Senate that the circumstances of this case do not show the existence of anything like a public war. A public war is defined to be "a state of things which exists between nations or sovereigns when the war is carried on in the name of the public power and by its order." The facts of this case show undeniably that the great majority of the Creek tribe were associated with the troops of the United States, in their efforts to repress these aggressions; that unquestionably, therefore, hostilities were not waged by the tribe, or under its authority, but by a band of free-booters separated from the great body of the tribe, and pressed by considerations, to which I will presently advert, to commit these aggressions upon the peaceable and unoffending inhabitants of Alabama and Georgia. I exclude, therefore, this question from consideration. It is not an inquiry how far you are bound to indemnify those who sustained losses in a public war. Here was no public war.

In the same manner I exclude from consideration the question which has produced the incidental and very animated discussion between the Senators from Tennessee, Alabama, and Michigan, namely, the question how far a Government is bound to indemnify individual losses which are sustained under the operation of an experimental policy adopted by that Government, without a consideration of the question whether that policy be wise or unwise. It seems to me that the Senator from Michigan would have been relieved from the necessity of vindicating the Administration of which he formed a part, if he had attended to the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee, and to the express disclaimer which accompanied that Senator's statement. That proposition, as I understood it, was, that the project of associating the whites with Indians in the close proximity in which they were left under the operation of the treaty of 1832, was an experimental policy; and the Senator from Tennessee pressed upon the consideration of the Senate the suggestion, that if individual losses had resulted from this action of the Government, without entering into the question, whether its policy had been wise or unwise, the Government was justly responsible to the individuals who had sustained the losses resulting from that policy. The Senator from Tennessee expressly disclaimed all idea of making any charge of improper conduct against the Administration by whom that treaty was negotiated, and during whose existence these aggressions took place. He was prepared to admit, as I understood from his repeated declaration, that the course of policy adopted by that Administration was dictated by necessity—was, perhaps, all which in the state of things that then existed, they could accomplish—that it may not have been within their power to attempt what they might have desired, and what they did unquestionably desire—the emigration of the Indians contemporaneously with the cession of their lands, and thus to have averted those aggressions of which the memorialists complain. Whether that were or were not the admission of the Senator from Tennessee, although not, as the Senator from Michigan supposes, connected with that Administration, I have a sufficient knowledge of the earnest efforts which were made by successive Administrations to obtain the cession of those Indian lands, and especially to fulfill the compact which had been entered into between the United States and Georgia for the removal of that portion of the Indians who were within the limits of that State, and subsequently of those within the limits of Alabama, to know that it was, in all human probability, beyond the power of the Government by any efforts they could make, less than that of physical force, to have accomplished the removal, and, therefore, that nothing in the claim which is now presented involves any charge against the Administration by whom the treaty was negotiated, or who directed the affairs which necessarily resulted from it.

Mr. President, I omit from my consideration of this question, another thing, which might of itself afford a safe foundation on which to rest this claim. I mean the spirit of that constitutional provision which requires the Government of the United States to secure the people of each State from domestic violence. Most emphatically this was a case of domestic violence—neither more nor less. In my judgment, it is an absurdity to speak of it as a public war, when it was not carried on under the authority of the tribe—when the majority of that tribe was associated with the troops of the United States in the effort to repress it. I say, it unquestionably assumed the character of domestic violence—neither more nor less—from the consequences of which the United States were bound to protect the peaceable inhabitants of those States who were injured by it. I know the answer to this, for it has been already given by the Senator from Michigan. He has told us of the opposition of Governor Gayle, of Alabama, to the introduction of the troops of the United States within the limits of that State; but the Senator is aware of the truth of the statement afforded in the answer given by the Senator from Alabama, that in so doing Governor Gayle did not follow the wishes of the great majority of the people of the State, and that repeated representations were made to this Government, as will appear by reference to the Executive documents, of the alarming condition of that country—of the pressing wants of the Indians, commencing in the fall of 1834, and amounting to almost absolute starvation in the year 1835. All these facts were made known to this Government, not merely by the representation of the official personages of Georgia and Alabama, but by the report of their own agent, sent out for the purpose of ascertaining the facts.

Still, sir, this consideration may be dismissed from this discussion, upon the same ground which has excluded all the others, and which I desire now very briefly to present to the consideration of the Senate. Sir, this is no longer an open question. If we redeem the pledge which has been given by our predecessors, if we do not violate the engagements into which they have entered, this question has been decided for us. The claim of these people, unless its amount shall be called in question, is no longer open. The principle which binds us for its payment has been recognized by the Executive and Legislative Departments, both of whom have taken steps to carry into effect the pledge which they gave by the act of 1837, that claims of this description should be paid by the Government of the United States.

Mr. President, I ask the attention of the Senate for a moment, to the consideration of the facts as they existed under the operation of the treaty, of the subsequent legislation of Congress, and the action of the commissioners who were appointed under the authority of that legislation. The treaty of 1832 had divested the Creeks of all their territory. The great body of it had been ceded to the United States, and certain reservations were made which they had permission to sell, under the approval of the President of the United States; and these sales were effected in 1834. I am inviting the attention of the Senate to the consideration of the circumstances of this case, as they existed under the operation of the treaty of 1832, as the foundation of the subsequent legislation of Congress with regard to these claims.

By the treaty of 1832, the Indians were stripped of their tribal character, they were divested of their territory, and were left as unassociated individuals within the limits of the State of Alabama. The great body of their lands were ceded to the United States; and Government proceeded as early as 1834, to survey and expose them to public sale. The occupants of these lands did not, as the honorable Senator from Michigan supposes, rush upon them immediately after the execution of the treaty; but they were the legitimate proprietors of those which they occupied by purchase from the United States.

The Indians, on whose behalf reservations were made, were permitted to sell them with the approbation of the President of the United States, and they were mostly sold in the year 1834; at the termination of that year, then, what was the condition, or state of affairs? Here was a body of peaceable citizens occupying these lands, of which they had become the proprietors by purchase from the United States. The Indians had lost all claims to territory within the State of Alabama; first, by their cession to the Government, and secondly, by the sale of their reservations. There were upwards of twenty thousand savages, unassociated by any bond which could control their individual conduct, who were left within the limits of the State of Alabama, stimulated by the love of rapine which is incident to the savage character, and impelled by the cravings of hunger, resulting from their destitute condition. Having sold their lands in 1834, at the end of that year they had no provisions on which to subsist. This landless, homeless horde of starving savages were in the midst of the peaceable population of Alabama, subjected to the temptations necessarily resulting from their lawless habits and pressing necessities. Now, the proposition is, that in a state of things so unprecedented, under a Government professing to afford protection to its citizens, if no rule of public law had provided for such an exigency, the circumstances of such a case would have established a rule for themselves. It cannot be that, under a Government like this—the peaceable occupants of lands purchased from the United States, quietly pursuing their agricultural occupations under the protection of the laws of the United States—it cannot be that such a body of people can be beyond the pale of the protection of the Government, or that they are liable to the predatory and murderous incursions of a savage tribe, who, by the policy of that Government, whether it was wise or unwise, were left in their midst.

Mr. President, this was the view which was taken of this subject by the Administration in 1836-'7. I believe that the Senator from Michigan had probably left the country on a foreign mission before the event to which I refer occurred—I mean in the years 1836-'7. President Jackson took the view which I have presented. He thought that people in the condition of these claimants were entitled to the protection of the Government; and in the fulfillment of his constitutional duty to give information to Congress of the state of the Union, and to recommend to them such measures as he deemed proper and expedient, he submitted to their consideration the inquiry, whether an indemnity could not be made for these claimants whose case is now presented before you. In the annual message of President Jackson in 1836 he says:

"On the unexpected breaking out of hostilities in Florida, Alabama, and Georgia, it became necessary, in some cases, to take the property of individuals for public use. Provision should be made by law for indemnifying the owners; and I would respectfully suggest whether some provision should not be made, consistently with the principles of our Government, for the relief of the sufferers by Indian depredations, or by the operations of our troops."

This, then, is the recommendation of the President of the United States in 1836, founded upon the state of facts which I have endeavored thus imperfectly to present to the notice of the Senate. Upon this message Congress passed a law appropriating the sum of $5,000 for the appointment of commissioners, whose duty it should be to ascertain the amount of these losses, and to report them to the President, by whom they were to be laid before Congress. These commissioners, acting under this authority thus conferred upon them, examined into these losses, and made a report of their amount—confining themselves to the allowance of the amount of actual loss, and excluding all consequential damages, they stated to Congress the amount which is sought to be obtained by the present amendment.

And now, Mr. President, I desire to ask from the Senate—and I especially desire respectfully to submit to the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. Cass]

—whether, under these circumstances, the Congress of the United States is not bound to redeem the pledge which that act of 1837 gave to these claimants? The act of 1837 provides for the appointment of commissioners to ascertain the amount of these losses, and requires that they should be reported by the President to Congress. Suppose the act had stopped there; would there not have been a direct and obvious implication that Congress meant to pay the amount of losses which should, by these commissioners, be thus ascertained to have existed? If not, why was the commission instituted? Here was a memorial before Congress; here was a recommendation from the President of the United States, to Congress, to consider whether indemnity to these people for the losses they had sustained should not be provided. Acting upon this memorial, and in consequence of this recommendation, they passed a law requiring the ascertainment of the amount of these losses. And thus the inference is inevitable, that the faith of the Government, by that mere act, was pledged to pay any loss which, upon competent evidence, could be shown to exist. Surely the Congress of the United States did not mean to trifle with these claimants; they did not mean to subject them to the inconvenience of attending before these commissioners, with their witnesses, for the purpose of ascertaining their losses, and then to turn round to them and say, "We have ascertained that you have sustained such an amount of loss, but we do not hold ourselves liable to indemnify you for it." Under such circumstances, how would the Government have met the rebuke of the claimants, when they said so them, "Why did you subject us to the useless trouble of ascertaining the amount of our claims, if, when ascertained to your satisfaction, and beyond the possibility of their accuracy being denied, you did not intend to pay them?"

Mr. President, an examination of the act of 1837 will distinctly prove that this liability of the Government does not rest upon implication alone. Acting upon the recommendation of President Jackson, in March, 1837, Congress passed an appropriation law, the second section of which is in these words:

"That the sum of $5,000 be and the same is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to enable the President of the United States, by suitable agents, to inquire what depredations were committed by the Seminole and Creek Indians on the property of citizens of Florida, Georgia, and Alabama, immediately before the commencement of actual hostilities on the part of said respective tribe of Indians; what portion of the Creek tribe were engaged in such hostilities, and what depredations have been committed by a remnant of said tribe supposed to be friendly, and a part of whom were actually employed against the Seminoles, since the removal of the main body of them west of the Mississippi, and that the President report the information so acquired to Congress at its next session."

Now, sir, I maintain that, upon the state of facts existing at the date of this law, its passage, and the mere act of authorizing the appointment of commissioners to inquire into these claims and to report their amount, was a pledge on the part of the Government of the United States that they would pay such claims as might fairly be ascertained to be due. But the law does not stop there. It proceeds by way of exclusion to specify the cases in which it will pay:

"Provided, Nothing hereinbefore contained shall be so construed as to subject the United States to pay for depredations not provided for by the act of April 8th, 1816, and the acts amendatory thereto, nor by acts regulating the intercourse between the Indian tribes and the United States."

By limiting the obligation of the Government to the payment of these two classes of claims, the Congress of the United States, in this act, expressly stipulates that they would pay all claims which could be brought within the provisions of the act of 1816, or within the principle of the intercourse act.

Now, what we have to do is to ascertain the true character of the pledge given in the act of 1837 on the part of Congress, as it referred to the intercourse act. The 17th section of that act provides—

"That if any Indian or Indians belonging to any tribe in amity with the United States shall, within the Indian country, take or destroy the property of any person lawfully within such country, or shall pass from the Indian country into any State or Territory inhabited by citizens of the United States?"

(The first part of this provision applying to the property of citizens of Alabama, and the second to the citizens of Georgia.)— —“and there take, steal, or destroy, any horse, horses, or other property, belonging to any citizen or inhabitant of the United States, such citizen make application to the proper superintendent, agent, or sub-agent, who, upon being furnished with the necessary documents and proofs, shall, under the direction of the President, make application to the nation or tribe to which said Indian or Indians shall belong for satisfaction.”

And it proceeds to provide that, on these facts being ascertained, the amount of such losses shall be withheld from the amount of any annuity to which such tribe of Indians shall be entitled; and that if there be no annuity, they shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States. Now, the “Indian country” is defined in the act of 1834: The country in which these aggressions were committed was not within those limits, but the act of 1837 has applied to these claims the principle of the act of 1834, by the appointment of commissioners to ascertain the amount of losses, and by the stipulation that they would pay such claims as came within the act of 1816, or within the provisions of the intercourse act.

I submit to the Senator from Michigan whether resistance to these claims is longer consistent with justice; certainly, it can be no longer dictated by feeling, when all imputations against the conduct of the Administration by which this treaty was negotiated, are disavowed, and when the claims are based on the action of the President and Congress composing that Administration, which I have thus briefly exposed to the Senate. If the depredations have been committed within the Indian country, no one doubts that, under the provisions of the intercourse law of 1834, they would have been chargeable on the Treasury of the United States, unless there had been an Indian annuity from which they could have been deducted. But the act of 1837 limited the obligation of the United States to pay for such losses as were provided for in the two cases of the act of 1816, and the act of 1834; and Congress, by limiting their obligation to these two cases, expressly bound themselves to pay such losses as came within the provisions of these cases.

I submit to the candor and sense of justice of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. Cass] whether these claims of these poor sufferers, which have now, for fourteen years, been presented to the Congress of the United States, sustained as they are, by the pledge which was given by Congress in the act of 1838, ought to be further resisted? I ask that they may meet with a favorable consideration from the Senate of the United States. Nay, I should hope that they would no longer meet with opposition from the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. Cass,] or from the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. Hunter;] and that the objection raised on the technical ground that this amendment was not properly placed in the appropriation bill, which has been already overruled by the Senate, will not prevent that honorable Senator from sustaining this amendment. But, sir, I have no intention to occupy the time of the Senate by an elaborate discussion of this claim, or to do anything more than to present a simple statement of the facts on which it is founded; and will, therefore, submit the question without further remark.

Mr. BELL. It may be necessary to modify the amendment I have proposed, in order to give certainty to the effect of its provisions, should it be adopted. I will send to the Chair what I propose to be added to the amendment.

“To be distributed according to the schedule returned by the commissioners, appointed under the act of Congress approved March 3, 1837.”

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the honorable Senator from Tennessee allow me to ask him, whether these Indian reservations had all been sold, or whether they were retained by the Indians, at the time the depredations were committed.

Mr. BERRIEN. It is stated in the memorial that they were all sold.

Mr. HUNTER. As the honorable Senator from Michigan [Mr. Cass] desires to say something in reply to the arguments of other gentlemen, and as it is now nearly two o'clock, I propose that by general consent we pass over the consideration of this amendment, and take up some others which are to be proposed.

A SENATOR. Oh, no; go on with this.

Mr. CASS. I would prefer that the consideration of this amendment should be postponed, if there are other amendments which can be acted upon as well as to proceed with this. But if the Senate prefer it, I will go on now, though from the state of the Senate, and the rain, which renders speaking so difficult, I would prefer not to speak to-day.

Mr. BERRIEN. The Senator from Michigan will recollect, that I have spoken under the same embarrassments.

Mr. CASS. I am aware of that; I knew at the time that it was embarrassing.

Mr. HALE. I would ask from some Senator who can give me the information, who favors this amendment—and I presume the Senator from Alabama [Mr. CLEMENS] can answer my inquiry—whether the policy of the General Government, in extinguishing the titles to the Indian reservations, was not a policy which was urged by the Governor of Alabama?

Mr. CLEMENS. I do not believe the Governor of Alabama had anything to do with it; but I know some members of Congress had.

Mr. BERRIEN. I can answer the inquiry of the Senator from New Hampshire, so far as regarded the first treaty. That which extinguished the Indian title within the limits of Georgia, was the result of an obligation entered into by the General Government as long ago as 1802, by which they bound themselves to extinguish the Indian title to those lands, in part consideration of the cession made by the State of Georgia to the United States territory lying between the Chatahoochee and Mississippi rivers.

Mr. HUNTER. I would suggest, as the honorable Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BORLAND] has not finished his speech upon the amendment relating to the Collins line of steamers, that he would probably be willing to do so now.

Mr. BORLAND. I am not anxious to go on; but I am willing to do so to accommodate the Senate, as the Senate was kind enough, the other day, to postpone its consideration in courtesy to me. I am, perhaps, as well prepared to go on as I shall be at any time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Foor in the chair.) The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. HUNTER. I ask the general consent of the Senate to lay it aside for the purpose of allowing the honorable Senator from Arkansas to go on with his remarks.

There being no objection, the pending amendment was laid aside, and the Senate resumed the consideration of the amendment in relation to the Collins line of steamers.

Mr. BORLAND continued, and concluded the speech upon this amendment, which he commenced on Wednesday last against the increased appropriation. He spoke until a late hour, and when he concluded the Senate adjourned.

[Mr. B.'s speech will be found in the Appendix.]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, May 17, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m.

The Journal of Thursday last was read and approved.

TERRITORIAL BUSINESS.

Mr. CLARK. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer a resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks general consent to offer a resolution, which will be read for the information of the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I rise to a question of order. By a resolution of this House, this week was set apart for the transaction of territorial business—the entire week, without regard to what that business was, or what other question might be before the House. The point of order I make is this: that unless the special order is deferred, no other business except that can, under the order previously made, be transacted. I desire also to state, that it is important we should have the opportunity of making reports from the committees first; that we should then have an opportunity to go to the business on the Speaker's table, in order that we may place that business in a shape that it can be reached, and disposed of. If that be done, I hope and believe we shall be enabled to dispose of it all during this day and to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The order of the House upon this subject is as follows: “That the third week in April”—afterwards changed to May—“or so much thereof as may be necessary for that purpose, is set apart for the consideration of territorial business; and that during that time such business shall take precedence, and be regarded as the special order.” The Clerk informed me that, within his recollection, it has been the practice of this body to receive reports from standing committees on the Territories. I must confess, I could not decide in favor of the right, under the rule, of that committee to report, believing that the special order, in regard to territorial business, embraces such only as is within the possession of the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the Chair will indulge me a moment, I will say, that this is an important matter for the Territories. The order which has been made by the House does not determine where the business is. The entire week is set apart, if necessary, for the purpose of transacting the business in relation to the Territories, and the first question that comes up is the call of the committees for reports in relation to territorial business.

The SPEAKER. Upon the presumption that such has been the practice of the House, the Chair will not change that practice, and will receive reports in relation to territorial business from the Committee on the Territories and other committees, unless the House order otherwise.

Mr. CLARK. I wish to inquire if it would not be in order, in case there is an objection to the resolution I desire to offer, to move a suspension of the rules, for the purpose of introducing it?

The SPEAKER. Under the practice of the House, the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. RICHARDSON,] under the operation of the special order, would have the floor, and could take it from the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. CLARK.]

Mr. CLARK. For the mere purpose of making reports?

The SPEAKER. The Chair considers the right of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RICHARDSON] under the practice of the House, very clear, to occupy the floor, in preference to any other gentleman, unless to offer some matter territorial in its character.

Mr. CLARK. Do I understand the Speaker to mean that includes all reports and orders in reference to Territories?

The SPEAKER. The Chair so decides.

Mr. FAULKNER. I rise to inquire if it is in order to make a report from the Committee on Roads and Canals—a report in reference to territories?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that all matters of business clearly relating to the Territories, would be in order from any one of the committees. The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. RICHARDSON,] however, has the floor.

Mr. RICHARDSON. In relation to that matter, I wish to say—as the matter has come up—that I shall oppose the introduction of anything which does not relate exclusively to Territories. If any matter proposed to be introduced relates to other subjects, I shall oppose it; but if it relates exclusively to Territories, it ought to come in.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mine relates to territorial business.

Mr. RICHARDSON, from the Committee on the Territories, reported a bill to authorize the legislative authorities of the several Territories to control the appropriations to be made by Congress for the support of said Territories; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. R. also, from the same committee, reported a joint resolution to change the name of St. Peter's river, in the Territory of Minnesota, which was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. RICHARDSON. As this is a matter in which nobody is interested, except the people of the Territory of Minnesota, I move to put the resolution upon its passage.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. Let the resolution be read.

The resolution, which was read through, provides that the St. Peter's river, shall hereafter be known and designated on the records of that Territory as the “Minnesota river.”

The resolution was then ordered to a third reading, and having been read a third time, was passed.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

PUBLISHED AT WASHINGTON, BY JOHN C. RIVES.—TERMS $3 FOR THIS SESSION.

32d CONGRESS, 1st Session.

THURSDAY, MAY 20, 1852.

NEW SERIES.....No. 87.

Mr. STUART, from the Committee on the Territories, reported a bill making an appropriation for the completion of the public buildings in the Territory of Minnesota; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. S. also, from the same committee, to which was referred sundry petitions of citizens of Minnesota, praying Congress to disapprove of the act of the Territorial Legislature, approved March 31, 1851, apportioning representatives in that Territory, asked that said committee be discharged from their further consideration, and that the petitions do lie on the table; which was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. STUART, it was Ordered, That the Committee on the Territories be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of sundry citizens of New Mexico, in relation to the revenue laws of New Mexico, and that the same do lie upon the table.

Mr. GIDDINGS, from the Committee on the Territories, reported back, with an amendment, Senate bill No. 175, being "An act relating to the salaries of officers of the Territories of the United States," and to repeal the proviso in the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government, for the year ending the 30th of June, 1852, and for other purposes," approved March 3d, 1851; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLINGMAN, from the Committee on the Territories, reported a bill to run and establish a boundary between the State of Texas and the Territories of the United States; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. C. also, from the same committee, to which was referred the memorial of the House of Representatives of the Territory of New Mexico, praying the enactment of a law for a geological and mineralogical survey of said Territory, reported back the same, with a recommendation that it is inexpedient at this time to order the said survey, and asking that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FAULKNER, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported a bill making further appropriations for the construction of roads in the Territory of Minnesota; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LOCKHART, from the Committee on the Territories, to which was referred the "bill to amend certain acts for the establishment of territorial governments in Oregon and Minnesota," reported the same back, with a recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. L. moved that the bill be laid upon the table.

The question was put, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOCKHART, from the Committee on the Territories, reported a bill relinquishing to the Territory of New Mexico all the right, title, and interest which the United States may have to certain real estate within the corporate limits of the city of Santa Fe, New Mexico; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. L. also, from the same Committee, reported a bill to amend an act, entitled "An act to settle and adjust the expenses of the people of Oregon in defending themselves from the attacks and hostilities of the Cayuse Indians, in the years 1847 and 1848," approved February 10th, 1851; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FAULKNER, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported back with a recommendation that it do not pass, the "bill to provide for the survey of the Mississippi river above the Falls of Saint Anthony."

Mr. HALL, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill to reduce and define the boundaries of the military reserve at the Saint Peter's river, in the Territory of Minnesota, and to secure the rights of the actual settlers thereon; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. H. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands to report back without amendment the bill to amend an act entitled "An act to create the office of Surveyor General of the public lands in Oregon; to provide for the survey, and to make donations to settlers on the said public lands." I will state, that the Committee on Public Lands have requested me to report this bill, with a recommendation that it do not pass. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LANE] is exceedingly anxious that the bill should be considered by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, when he thinks he can satisfy the committee that it ought to pass. I therefore move that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that it be printed.

The bill was referred accordingly, and ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. SCUDDER, the Committee on the Territories was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Hosea D. Horn and John J. Selman, asking a grant of land in Utah Territory for the purpose of forming a settlement; and it was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PEASLEE, from the Committee on the Militia, reported a bill to provide for the protection of the Territories of New Mexico and Oregon; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RICHARDSON, from the Committee on the Territories, reported a bill to amend the act to establish the Territory of Oregon, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

RESPECT TO THE MEMORY OF MRS. ADAMS.

Mr. FOWLER. Is the Committee on the Territories through?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know certainly.

Mr. FOWLER. I ask leave of the House, if it is in order, to introduce the following resolution.

Mr. RICHARDSON. All the reports are in, and I move to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the special orders.

Mr. FOWLER. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his motion for a moment, until I introduce my resolution, which I hope will meet with the concurrence of the House.

The resolution was read for information, as follows:

Resolved, That when this House adjourns it will adjourn to meet at one o'clock to-morrow, that members of the House may have an opportunity of attending the funeral of Mrs. Adams, relict of the late John Quincy Adams, ex-President of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the gentleman from Massachusetts has a right to submit a motion to fix the time to which the House shall adjourn.

Mr. FOWLER. Allow me to state, sir, that the funeral of Mrs. Adams is to take place at eleven o'clock, at her late residence. I am desired by my colleagues to present this resolution as a mark of respect, which it seems is due to the venerable personage named in the resolution; and I will take the liberty to say, that it is the first occurrence of the kind that has ever taken place since the organization of the Government, and it may be the last. I mean that it is the first time that the widow of an ex-President has deceased in this city during the session of Congress; and it is proposed only to delay the business of the House one hour. I hope there will be no objection to the resolution.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I do not object at all to the gentleman's resolution; but I rise to propose an amendment, which is, that the House adjourn over the whole day. If we give this testimony of respect to the memory of Mrs. Adams, it certainly would be more consonant with that respect for us to spare one day from our legislative duties.

Mr. FOWLER. I most cheerfully accept that amendment, and would have so proposed in my resolution, but I thought that some gentlemen might think that we were asking too much in this case. I will very gladly accept the amendment, if the House will concur.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. What is the proposition?

The SPEAKER. The proposition, as modified, is to adjourn over until Wednesday next.

Mr. JONES. I think it is a very bad precedent, and I object to it.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. If the gentleman objects, and it be necessary, I shall move to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already stated that the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. FOWLER], has a very clear right to submit a motion to adjourn to a particular time to-morrow, or until the next day; but he cannot introduce a resolution without a suspension of the rules. If there be no further Territorial business, it will be in order to move a suspension of the rules for the purpose suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am perfectly willing that the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts shall pass. I shall interpose no objection. I have no inclination to do this. I would like to progress with the business of the House, however, and I will obviate the difficulty by moving that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. FOWLER. That was the original resolution.

Mr. HOUSTON. That will do just as well. The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts was entitled to the floor, and if it was his purpose, as he has indicated, to move to adjourn to a particular time, he had a right to do it. He has a right to the floor for that purpose. He had also a right to the floor for the purpose of submitting a proposition to suspend the rules, which is also a privileged question, provided there be no further reports from Committees on Territorial business, which is the special order, and the first one in order.

Mr. OLDS. I should like to know if this privilege of making reports extends to reports concerning individuals living in Territories?

The SPEAKER. No; not at all.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Is it not a privileged question to submit a motion, that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at a particular hour, or time? Is not a motion to fix the hour of meeting a privileged question, which takes precedence of other motions?

The SPEAKER. It does so in the opinion of the Chair, but not to change permanently the hour of meeting.

Mr. STEPHENS. I move that when this House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next.

Mr. FOWLER. I accept that as part of my proposition.

Mr. JONES. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILCOX. I rise simply to make this remark, that I was satisfied in my own mind that members of this House did not understand the object of this resolution, that when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next. If they had understood it, I feel convinced that there is no Representative here who would vote against the proposition to adjourn; and I simply rise to ask the Chair to explain why it was that the gentleman from Massachusetts desired the House to adjourn to meet on Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state, that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FOWLER] stated in his place, that his object in moving the adjournment till Wednesday next, was that members might attend the funeral of the late Mrs. Adams.

Mr. POLK. Is there not a way by which the Journal may be made to show for what cause the House adjourned?

The SPEAKER. It can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. The vote is about to be taken; and as it is very evident that a majority are in favor of the adjournment, I propose that, by the unanimous consent, the vote be taken upon the resolution, so that it may be entered on the record.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again inquire whether the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, which sets forth the object for which the adjournment is asked, is objected to or not?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOWLER. I ask that the resolution be again read. The House was in a great confusion when it was first read, and probably there were many who did not hear it.

It was again read by the Clerk, as follows:

Resolved. That when this House adjourns, it will adjourn to meet on Wednesday next, that the members of the House may have an opportunity of attending the funeral of Mrs. Adams, relict of the late John Quincy Adams, ex-President of the United States.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If discussion is stopped, and the sense of the House be taken on this resolution, there is no doubt but it will pass.

Mr. STANLY. I move to strike out the word "Wednesday," and to insert in its stead, "tomorrow, at one o'clock." By this adjournment we will not only show becoming respect to the memory of the deceased personage, but also be enabled to proceed with the consideration of the public business.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I trust that the amendment will not meet with the approbation of the House. If we intend to pay this marked and unusual respect to the memory of this distinguished personage, let us do it in a manner worthy of the object and the occasion. Let us not count the hours as if grudgingly given. This does not seem to me to comport very well with the feeling which should accompany such a manifestation of our regard for the character and virtues of the eminent lady for whose memory the distinguished honor is intended. What is the loss of one day here for such an object? I hope, sir, if the House intend to pay the respect proposed at all, they will pay such respect as a due regard to themselves, as well as the solemnity and dignity of the occasion, demands, and adjourn over one entire day.

Mr. STANLY. I do not yield to the gentleman from Georgia in respect for the distinguished deceased. I propose to give all the respect the gentleman from Massachusetts deemed to be proper, and at the same time obviate the difficulty which the resolution may encounter, as some gentlemen object to the loss of time proposed in the resolution as it now stands. Strict respect will be extended, and unanimously, if my amendment is agreed to—just as much as if the House should adjourn over an entire day. To give a whole day at this period of the session, with the immense number of private claims and great amount of public business before us, when we can show the same respect to the deceased by the shorter period, is a matter that appears to me to be worthy of consideration. It is the act of adjournment that does honor to the memory of the deceased, and not the duration of the adjournment.

Mr. STANTON. What difference will it make?

Mr. STANLY. We will lose a whole day in one case.

Mr. STANTON. The session will not be one day longer on that account.

Mr. HIBBARD. I demand the previous question.

The call for the previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, demanded the yeas and nays; but they were not ordered.

The question was then put on the amendment to strike out "Wednesday" and to insert in its place "to-morrow, at one o'clock," and it was not agreed to—there being on a division, yeas 44, noes 93.

The question was then taken upon the resolution as amended, and it was adopted—there being on a division, yeas 119, noes 19.

COLLECTION DISTRICTS IN OREGON.

Mr. RICHARDSON, from the Committee on the Territories, reported a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to create additional collection districts in the Territory of Oregon, and for other purposes," which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. R. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Which motion was agreed to.

So the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee,) in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The first business for consideration before the committee, is the special order, being a bill to encourage agriculture, and for other purposes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I rise to a question of order. The bill which the chairman reports as being the one first under consideration is not of that class which comes up as the special order. By a resolution of the House, this entire week was especially set apart for the consideration of the territorial business, unless disposed of in a shorter period of time.

The CHAIRMAN. But by a prior resolution of the House, the chairman will remind the gentleman that the "bill to encourage agriculture and for other purposes," was made the special order until disposed of, and is now the first business in order before the Committee of the Whole. To reach the territorial bills, this will first have to be got rid of.

Mr. KING, of New York. I desire to submit a few remarks, and I know of no more fitting opportunity.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman permit me to get the territorial bills before the Committee?

Mr. KING. I supposed that that business was the special order for this week, and now before the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the first business before the committee, in order, is "the bill to encourage agriculture, and for other purposes." It is easy for the committee to obviate the difficulty presented, by either voting down that bill or reversing the decision of the Chair. By a prior order, which appears upon the Journal, a different bill was made the special order.

Mr. KING. I move to lay aside that special order, and that the committee proceed to consider the territorial bills.

The question was taken upon the motion to lay aside the bill to encourage agriculture and for other purposes, and it was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The first business now in order is the consideration of House bill No. 134, being "A bill to authorize the Governor of New Mexico to call another session of the Legislative Assembly, should the same be deemed 'necessary and expedient.'"

Mr. PRESTON KING said: Mr. Chairman, no more appropriate opportunity will occur for me to submit some remarks I desire to make than the present, when the business relating to the Territories, whose acquisition originated the measures respecting which I shall speak, is before the Committee on the state of the Union. I allude to the measures known as the compromise measures.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I rise to a question of order. I regret it very much, but this week is set apart for the Territorial business, and I feel that I ought to do all I can to press that business forward. I make the question of order, that the discussion of any thing except something in relation to the bill itself is out of order.

Mr. KING. We are in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RICHARDSON] is right in his point of order; but the gentleman from New York [Mr. KING] has not yet shown what is to be the drift of his remarks, and it is impossible for the Chair to decide him out of order.

Mr. KING. My remarks will be general, and in relation to measures which were adopted in consequence of the acquisition of these Territories. I intend to speak upon the measures usually known as the compromise measures; and upon the point of order I will say, it has been invariably decided, whenever a question of order has been raised like that of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. RICHARDSON,] when the House were in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, that any question relating to the Union, or its affairs, was in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not decided the gentleman from New York [Mr. KING] to be out of order. The bill now before the House provides for an extra session of the Legislative Assembly of New Mexico, and refers especially to "An act proposing to the State of Texas the establishment of her northern and western boundaries; the relinquishment, by said State, of all territory claimed by her exterior to said boundaries, and of all her claims upon the United States, and to establish a territorial government for New Mexico." I think the Chair would be exceeding its authority, and the practice of the House on former occasions, to decide remarks such as the gentleman from New York proposes to make, to be out of order at this early period.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I request, after the gentleman from New York shall have concluded his remarks, that the House will permit us to pass these bills, that we may get towards the end of them, and then take up some of the other bills, and discuss these questions as they ought to be. I desire to pass this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a question for the House, and not the Chair.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I understand—

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] rise to a question of order?

Mr. HOUSTON. I understood the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RICHARDSON] to have raised a question of order—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has made a question of order, which has been overruled. Does the gentleman from Alabama appeal?

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not.

Mr. KING resumed. On the final adjournment of the last Congress, those in and out of Congress who favored or who acquiesced in the passage of the series of measures relating to slavery, which grew out of the late acquisition of territory by the United States, declared that these questions were settled; and they then declared their hostility to any further agitation or discussion of them. They went so far as to denounce agitation as hostile to the peace and safety of the Union. In the passage of these acts, the lines of party division had been disregarded; and, although most of them were adopted by Congress under the guide of the great leader of the Whig party—Mr. CLAY—and were all but one of them indebted for their adoption to the active influence of a Whig Administration, without which they could never have become laws, yet they were voted for and voted against by members of Congress, without regard to the distinction of Whig or Democrat. Whatever may be the opinion of any man, or set of men, for or against any or all of these measures, or whatever may be the opinion of the wisdom and patriotism, or the want of both, in which these measures were conceived and adopted, they stand as laws upon the statute-book; and whatever the present opinion of individuals, or the future opinion of the courts or the country may be of their constitutional validity, enough has transpired to show that the courts, as they are now constituted, are of opinion that all these laws are constitutional.

What are the measures which now stand as enactments upon the statute-book in relation to slavery in the new Territories? First, in the order of time, is the law erecting Oregon into a territorial government. In this law, by the act of Congress, slavery and involuntary servitude are expressly prohibited in that Territory. This law is the only one of the series which was passed by Congress under a Democratic Administration. It was approved by President Polk, who sent to Congress a special message assigning the grounds upon which he approved and signed it. The prohibition of slavery in the Oregon territorial bill is important mainly in the assertion and maintenance of the constitutional power of Congress to prohibit slavery in the Territories; for the people of Oregon, like the people of the Territories acquired from Mexico, were opposed to the introduction of slavery among them, and desired only, that in some form its introduction should be prevented by law. President Polk was personally opposed to inserting the prohibitory clause against slavery in the Oregon bill; but no constitutional objection existing, he deferred to the known public sentiment of the country and signed it. All the other measures have been passed under the present Whig Administration. One of these is the admission of California into the Union as a State, with a constitution containing an express prohibition of slavery. With the application of California for admission as a State, their constitution, containing the provision against slavery, was submitted to Congress, was approved as consistent with the Constitution of the United States, and California was admitted a free State into the Union by act of Congress. Another measure is the organization of separate territorial governments for the two Territories of New Mexico and Utah.

The people of New Mexico were known to be opposed to the introduction of slavery among them, by their own express declaration, in a constitution which they formed with a view to their admission into the Union as a State.

The people of Utah, who are chiefly, if not entirely, Mormons, whose difficulties with the people of the States in which they attempted to settle induced them to emigrate to the place they now inhabit, have not, that I am aware, ever distinctly expressed their opinion for or against slavery, unless an effort which they made to be included within the State of California, whose constitution prohibits slavery, may be regarded as expressive of their opinions upon this subject. The acts of Congress creating these two territorial governments, declare that they may hereafter be admitted into the Union as States, with or without slavery, as the people of these Territories may determine, when they come to be admitted as States; but these acts do not decide or declare the law in these Territories, for the time during which they remain under territorial governments. When this measure was before Congress, the friends of slavery denied the validity of the Mexican law abolishing slavery; but demanded that this law should be repealed, and that the Territories be opened to the introduction of slavery. Those opposed to the extension of slavery, insisted that the Mexican law should be affirmed, and that slavery should be expressly prohibited by act of Congress.

The friends of the compromise measures, some of them declaring that the law of God, the climate, and the law of nature, as well as the law of Mexico, forbid the introduction of slavery into these Territories; that slavery could not go there, and no act of Congress was necessary, opposed, and were strong enough to prevent any express declaration by Congress, authorizing or prohibiting slavery in New Mexico or Utah, during the period they remain under territorial government. The law relating to slavery, then, in these Territories, is to be found in their own established law, under the Mexican Government, which existed previous to, and at the time of their cession to the United States. This law had abolished slavery. Another of the measures was the act of Congress fixing, with the assent of Texas, the boundaries of that State. By this act, Texas, for a consideration of $10,000,000, abandoned all claim to any part of New Mexico, outside of the boundary line agreed upon by the United States and Texas. By this act, all that part of New Mexico east of the Rio Grande, and outside of the boundary line of Texas thus settled, was released from all claims of jurisdiction by Texas, her laws, and constitution, and remained a part of New Mexico. Standing, of course, like the rest of the territory ceded by Mexico, it was incorporated with that part of New Mexico west of the Rio Grande, and forms a part of the Territory organized under a territorial government as New Mexico. These are all the late laws relating to slavery in the Territories; and, with the laws abolishing the slave trade in the District of Columbia, and the fugitive slave law, are all the laws which—though not so called at the time they were passed, because the word compromise was then in bad odor—have since come to be known as the compromise measures. These, or any other laws which should be found to be inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States, are null and void. Any or all of them which are consistent with the Constitution, are valid as the law of the land, until they shall be modified or repealed by the appropriate constitutional authority. Congress possesses the perfect constitutional power to modify or repeal any one or all of them, except that in relation to the boundary line of States; the admission of States into the Union; the stipulations of treaties or compacts, where more than one party is interested, or where political or pecuniary rights have been once defined and vested: Congress, or the law-making power of one party alone, cannot change them.

It is now not quite two years since the last of these laws was passed, and the cry then raised against further agitation has ceased; and some of those who were most forward in raising the cry against agitation are now proposing to submit these compromise measures, and especially the fugitive slave law, to discussion and agitation for a popular verdict in a presidential election, to determine whether they are settled or not. What has produced this change?

In December last, when Congress assembled, and the Representatives had come fresh from, and imbued with the public sentiment in their respective districts, it was found that the panic-makers, who desire to save the Union as often as once in six months, and to get their pay for it as often as once a quarter, had got together and decided that the Congressional caucuses of both political parties must pass resolutions acquiescing in the compromise measures; this must be done, or the Union was in danger. Well, the Democratic caucus met, and the first thing after it was organized, the compromise resolution was proposed. It was not well received by the majority of the caucus, and it was then proposed to refer the resolution to the Baltimore Convention; but the resolution, and the proposition to refer it to the Baltimore Convention, were both laid on the table, and the Democratic caucus nominated its candidates and elected them. In the Whig caucus, the compromise resolution was adopted; but they made no nominations, and came into the House on Monday, as all recollect, with a sad exhibition of their party and their compromise resolution. From what quarter does the advice come to the Democratic party to change its platform, and make these compromise laws a part of the Democratic creed, and a party test? Chiefly from the Whigs of Georgia and Mississippi, and such of the Democrats of these two States as united with the Whigs in the last election, aided by a few Whigs and Democrats all over the Union, who do not seem to be well satisfied with their position, and desire in some way to be indorsed. In my judgment, these gentlemen are not safe advisers for the Democratic party.

In Georgia and Mississippi, these new combinations and new tests have sent two Whig United States Senators into the Senate.

But are the States of Georgia and Mississippi prepared to declare their acquiescence in the Wilmot proviso in the act of Congress organizing the Territory of Oregon, and in the prohibition of slavery in the constitution of California, and to express themselves satisfied with the present condition of the Territories acquired from Mexico, and the abolition of the slave trade in the District of Columbia? If so, let there be no equivocation in the proposition they present to indorse or acquiesce in the compromise measures. If there is to be a finality and end to efforts for the extension of slavery, it will do much to reconcile the country to almost any form of words expressing acquiescence in measures having such a conclusion. But the fugitive slave law seems with these gentlemen to be the beginning and end of the compromise. This law is odious, and for this very reason it would seem the coalition politicians of Georgia and Mississippi, demand that this law shall be the issue in the next presidential election—they have pushed this issue upon the Whig Congressional caucuses and broken that party into fragments. They demand that the Democratic party shall make the same issue. It is openly insisted that the old party divisions are unsatisfactory, and that the country must be divided again upon a slavery issue. The Democratic party can make the issue, and it is for the Democratic National Convention, at Baltimore, to determine, if the proposition shall be presented, whether they will make it, or adhere to the established Democratic platform.

In 1848 the Democratic Convention at Baltimore refused to change its platform; but an outside slavery issue was made by the Nicholson letter, and the Democratic party was divided and defeated. The compromise measures were not passed as a party measure. They are not an issue between the two parties organized as Democrats and Whigs. But few of either party supported them all. If a part of them are particularly presented, controversy will be revived. If the fugitive slave law alone shall be presented, and it is to be decided whether that law shall be continued, modified, or repealed, I shall vote to modify it, or to repeal it. And if the electors of New York are challenged by the issue presented to them to decide at the election whether they are satisfied with or approve that law, in my opinion, they will reject the candidate for President who is presented to them because he makes the fugitive slave law the platform of his party politics, as I have no doubt Georgia and Mississippi would reject the candidate who should be presented to them because he was opposed to that law. An issue upon the subject of slavery is and must be, in the present condition of the different States of the Union, a sectional issue. The effort of political partisans to make it out that either party is more friendly to slavery than the other has a tendency to make parties sectional. The Democratic party, regarding slavery as it exists in the States a subject of State and not National jurisdiction, has always heretofore refused to make a national slavery issue. The Democratic members of the present Congress assembled in caucus at the commencement of the present session, refused to make such an issue, and I believe that the Democratic National Convention, which is soon to assemble, will refuse to change its position in this respect by making a slavery issue for the presidential election. But should such an issue be deliberately made by the national nominating convention, and the electors of the Union be invited and challenged to indicate their opinions of slavery by their votes for President, I have no doubt the verdict at the election would truly express the sentiments of the country upon this, as well as upon any other question presented at an election for a popular verdict to pronounce upon.

Mr. CULLOM. I regret that I feel constrained upon this occasion, from a sense of duty to the Whig party no less than to myself, maintaining the attitude which I do and have done from early life in that party, and maintaining as I do certain relations towards certain movements of that party, I regret, I say, that I feel constrained, in order that my position may be understood here and elsewhere, in relation to the exciting questions to which the public mind is directed, to depart from what has been my settled purpose in relation to these questions. I had not intended, Mr. Chairman—and my silence upon this floor will attest the sincerity of this avowal—on taking my seat here as a member of this House, to consume the public time—the time legitimately belonging to the business of legislation upon the great interests of the American people—in expressing my opinions, or in designating to my constituents and to the country, who, in my opinion, would be the suitable candidate of the Whig party for the exalted office of President of this Republic. But, sir, in the progress of events, proceeding with the legitimate business, for which purpose I have been sent here by a generous constituency, when the Whig Representatives in Congress were called upon, according to custom and their recognized province and duty, to meet in caucus to recommend the time and place for the meeting of the Whig National Convention, it so occurred, and I regret the occurrence, that the part I took in that assemblage has been the subject of misapprehension, and, seemingly, of misrepresentation here; and, for aught I know, with many of my constituents, whose intelligence and opinions I hold in high esteem, and by whom it is right and proper that my position upon all matters of public interest should be correctly and fully understood.

What, Mr. Chairman, was the legitimate object of that caucus? It was called by the Whig chairman for the sole purpose of designating or recommending the time and place for the meeting of the Whig National Convention. This, and this alone, was its object. Other gentlemen thought, or acted as if they thought, it had another and more extended object and province in connection—to do what the people have assigned to the convention to do—namely, to prescribe certain rules, in part a platform for the party in the coming campaign; and I regret deeply, and I express it here, that I should have had occasion in that meeting to differ with any portion of my Whig brethren—(I will call them brethren, because I have stood side by side with them for years.) With them I have fought for the glorious and cherished conservative principles of our common party—the principles which involve the weal and perpetuity of the institutions of our great, and prosperous, and happy country. I have been with them in victory and in defeat; but, sir, I have never been called upon publicly, from a sense of duty, to differ with any respectable portion of the Whig party until the occasion alluded to.

I come now, sir, to review the circumstances which surrounded me and them upon that occasion. I shall still hold and regard them as brethren. I am not here to censure them or to impugn their motives. I grant them all purity of motive, and all desire for right; but, sir, I am here to justify and defend my own motives, and my own action on that occasion. What was that action? I did not presume, when I took my seat in the caucus of the Whig party, to arrogate to myself, or to that caucus, the prerogative of prescribing the rules that were to govern the representatives selected for the express purpose of nominating a candidate, and laying down such political principles as the party chose to be governed by. No, sir, that is the business of the convention. It was the business of the caucus to select a place, and to suggest a time for the meeting of that convention; this alone was its business, and further than this it had no authority, either delegated or customary, to go. In this spirit I took my seat in the caucus, disposed to discharge the duties imposed upon me. But when it was proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] and again by my honorable colleague from Tennessee, [Mr. GENTRY,] to introduce certain resolutions that were ruled out of order by the Chair, they not being germane to the pending resolution, I deemed it to be my duty to sustain the Chair, and I voted conscientiously to that effect upon this strictly parliamentary question, we being governed in our deliberations by the rules of the Senate. But it was announced by the meeting, that the propositions would be entertained as substantive propositions, and as such I pledged them my support. I was not in favor of the resolution at that juncture, not because I am not now to-day, and have ever been, in favor of the compromise measures, and of the finality of those measures, and of declaring at a proper time that finality, but because I believed it would be trenching upon the legitimate duties of the convention. I believed that that was a duty, belonging to a convention called by the great body of the people, for the special purpose of laying down those rules. I thought that, perhaps, the great body of the American people might not choose to be dictated to by a self-constituted caucus of congressional gentlemen, and that, therefore, it was proper for them to do nothing more than to recommend a time and place for holding the national convention.

When that resolution was announced, I stated to the meeting that my sense of duty would compel me to sustain, as a parliamentary question, the position of the Chair, but that I would vote for the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] if it came up, and also that I would vote for the resolution of my colleague, [Mr. GENTRY,] and I called upon my Southern friends to remain and aid me in obtaining the passage of one of those resolutions; for, although I did not approve the introduction of those resolutions, yet after they had been introduced, I felt willing to sustain them in a substantive manner.

Mr. POLK. I understand my colleague to be in favor of the finality of the compromise, and that his only reason for not sustaining the resolution of my colleague, [Mr. GENTRY,] in the caucus, was, that it was not introduced at a proper time and place. Now, I desire to ask the gentleman one question.

Mr. CULLOM. The gentleman misunderstands me; but he may state his question.

Mr. POLK. I desire to ask the gentleman, whether in case the Whig National Convention should refuse—

Mr. CULLOM. Oh! I will come to that subject directly, sir.

Mr. POLK. I wish to know whether, in case the Whig Convention should refuse to pass any resolution declaring the finality of the compromise, you will support their candidate for the Presidency?

Mr. CULLOM. Not unless your party dodges that subject. I had thought that the compromise measures which had become the settled law of the country, the compromise which had been indorsed by the Whig caucus at the beginning of the session, and which had received the indorsement of a majority of the Representatives of the American people in this House but the other day, might be considered as settled for the present. I had hoped that that would be satisfactory until the meeting of the National Conventions of the two parties of the country. But inasmuch as doubts were entertained; inasmuch as some friends of the South thought it wore a threatening aspect—though I confess I have seen nothing to justify such an impression—I have seen no demonstration to arouse my feelings as a Southern man, though the South is the land of my birth, and though my interests, whatever I have, are Southern interests, and my attachments all Southern, I would guard as carefully as any other man, this great question, yet, I say, I had seen nothing to excite my fears upon this subject, or to prompt me to introduce resolutions into the caucus touching the subject;—but I repeat, that resolutions having been introduced, I should have supported them had they been put to vote. But with all due respect to every member of that caucus—and I am bound to believe that they all discharged their duties according to the best lights before them—I am constrained to say, that I think the course of our receding friends was calculated to arouse sectional feelings. I thought that the withdrawal of Southern members from the caucus, would tend to establish a geographical division—a sectional division in the country—and thus leave the whole great question of nominating a candidate for President of the United States entirely to our Northern friends, and therefore I was willing to remain; and I declared before and after our friends retired from the caucus, that I was ready and willing to discharge the promise I had made to vote for the resolutions.

I have now before me a statement, prepared by a member of that caucus, which shows that if our Southern friends who withdrew had remained, the compromise resolution would have been passed by a majority of four, taking as a basis, those who voted for the compromise, the Jackson resolution in this House, HILLIEN's amendment, and those who declared in the caucus that they were ready to sustain them. I say that, according to this statement, which I am assured is correct, if our friends had remained in the caucus, the compromise resolutions would have been passed by a majority of four.

Mr. CABELL, of Florida. I ask the gentleman to give the names.

Mr. CULLOM. I will send the gentleman the statement, and he can examine it for himself.

Several MEMBERS. Read it! Read it!

Mr. CULLOM. Now, Mr. Chairman, what was the object of the gentleman who led this movement—this stampede in the Whig caucus? I cannot say. I will only allude to my honorable friend from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN,] who was prominent in the retreating wing of that body, and who spoke, as by authority, for others. I ask that gentleman if he did not evince that he came to that caucus to carry out a certain purpose; Upon the condition of its being carried out, he would cooperate with the caucus; but if the purpose failed, he would secede? I say my honorable friend from North Carolina was prominent in the retreating forces on that occasion. To what extent he aided in bringing about that retreat, or what command he held, I am not prepared to say; but I want to ask my friend if he did not come up there with the determination that the action of that caucus upon the finality of the compromise should determine whether or not he would further cooperate with the Whig party? Now, sir, when did my honorable friend from North Carolina become so warmly attached to the compromise measures?

I find, by reference to the Journal, that he voted against the major part of those measures.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Does the gentleman expect me to answer his question? I will do it with great pleasure.

Mr. CULLOM. Not now.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Then I suppose the gentleman asks questions he does not desire to have answered.

Mr. CULLOM. I will answer from the Journal. If I misrepresent the gentleman when I say that he voted against most of the compromise measures, I wish to be corrected.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will say, that I should like very much to answer, but if he prefers, let him refer to the Journal, and to my speeches, in connection with it, and answer from them.

Mr. CULLOM. The honorable gentleman from North Carolina voted against the compromise resolutions this session. He gave us notice in the caucus, that unless certain resolutions which he proposed were reported, he would not support the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,]

Mr. CLINGMAN. I said that that resolution did not precisely meet my views. I did not say I would not vote for it.

Mr. CULLOM. The gentleman said he would propose something as a substitute—whether free trade or secession resolutions, I did not then know. Now, suppose that the honorable gentleman had remained, and had offered his substitute; if he would not vote for the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky, could he have expected the gentleman from Kentucky would support his amendment? What splendid confusion it would have made! Why, sir, it would have been "confusion worse confounded." If our friends had remained, would he have produced harmony? The substitute of the gentleman might not have met the approbation of those who retired, or of those who remained. Was he to rule the Whig party, not claiming to be a Whig, and not acting with the Whigs?

Mr. CLINGMAN. I showed it to them, and they said they would vote for it.

Mr. CULLOM. I know nothing about that. But what has been the course of my friend from North Carolina upon this subject? As a friend of the compromise measures, I confess in all kindness—and I allude to the fact because I consider it my duty, as a sentinel upon the watchtower, to warn the country, to "cry aloud and spare not;" and as I live, my duty as a representative, though it may be an humble one, shall be faithfully executed, with zeal, candor, and firmness—that I think it has not been a judicious one. The gentleman says that the Whig party and the Democratic party, having become factions, ought to be merged into a third party. My friend wishes, no doubt, to put himself at the head of this Union party, which he says ought to be created out of the ruins of the Whig and Democratic parties. Now, if he intends to become godfather, or more appropriately, Captain General of this great third party that he vain would have raised in the country, it becomes me, as a citizen and as a representative, to review the course of my honorable friend who assumes the leadership of the movement, and show where he stands, and see if the guardianship of this great Union party should be committed to his hands, and if Southern men, who are loyal to the Union, can plight their destiny in such a cause to such a leader. What has been his peculiar position in relation to the institutions of the country? I find, on referring to the debates upon the compromise measures when they were pending, that the honorable gentleman, in a speech delivered in this House and published to the world, states that he used language which meditated nothing less than a dissolution of this Union. I will publish extracts from that speech, in which he said wherever he went he was met with the senseless cry of "Union!" "Union!"

Congressional Globe, 1st session 31st Congress, page 201, '3, and '4, Mr. CLINGMAN says:

"I gave my reasons at length, founded chiefly on my own recent observation of the state of public sentiment in the North, we believing that a collision was inevitable, and that the sooner it came the better for all parties."—Page 201.

"They [Northern men] knew that the evils already inflicted on us, to which I have referred, greatly exceed in amount any injury that Great Britain attempted when she drove the Colonies into resistance."—Page 203.

"Seeing that there appeared to be a settled purpose in the North to put them to the wall, many of our people regarding a dissolution of the Union as the inevitable result of this aggression, looked forward to the consequences of such a state of things."—Page 203.

"What would be our condition if separated from the North? * * * Subjecting the goods of the North to a duty with those from other foreign countries, would at once give a powerful stimulus to our own manufactures."—Page 204.

In claiming a fair settlement of the territorial question, he said:

"I mean, sir, that no restriction ought to be imposed by Congress on this territory, but that after it has been left open to all classes for a proper period, the majority may then, when they make a State constitution, determine for themselves whether they will permit slavery or not. The South will acquiesce in any reasonable settlement."

"But when we ask for justice, and to be let alone, we are met by the senseless and insane cry of 'Union! Union!' Sir, I am disgusted with it."—Pages 204, 75.

In the same speech he speaks of stopping the wheels of Government, and says:

"And if it is ascertained that no proper settlement can be gotten of the territorial question, it would be in the power of the Southern members to defeat all the appropriation bills, and bring the Government to a dead halt."

Again, he says:

"I tell gentlemen if we cannot, in advance, get a fair settlement of this question, I should be pleased to see the civil and diplomatic bill, the army and navy bill, and all other appropriations, fail."

Now, after this settlement of the territorial question, as he desired it, without restriction, at the next session, on the 15th February, 1851, (Appendix to Congressional Globe, 31st Congress, 2d session,) he spoke of rejoicing that the people no longer rested on the Union as the solid rock of safety.

That, sir, was the position of my honorable friend then, and yet he is now to be made the leader and head of this great third or Union party which is to merge the two great political parties.

My honorable friend from North Carolina, [Mr. OUTLAW,] and the honorable and talented and patriotic gentlemen who cooperated with him, I know would not push their doctrines to that extreme; but I am faithfully showing the extremes to which they would certainly be carried should they follow the lead of the gentleman, [Mr. CLINGMAN.] Misery loves company, and my friend appears elated at the position he has attained in bringing gentlemen into the meshes of his schemes; but they will not go these lengths—they are, I hope, true and loyal.

Now, Mr. Chairman, yourself and the country may see the reasons upon which I might have acted in remaining in the caucus, and why I should not retreat. My construction of the Whig creed will not permit a man to run away from his duty. I preferred to remain and do my duty; if consequences followed which I could not control, I could not, of course, be made responsible. I am in favor of the finality of the compromise here, and I am for it in the National Whig Convention, and I ardently hope to see it there adopted. I may add, that I have said upon the stump, and in public and private conversation, that I am for the finality of the compromise, and that I will support no man for the Presidency who is not sound upon those measures, the fugitive slave law included.

Mr. CLINGMAN. As my honorable friend from Tennessee has asked me several questions, will he now permit me to ask him one?

Mr. CULLOM. I have no time to spare.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will not detain the gentleman one moment. I desire to know why the gentleman did not introduce his resolution into the caucus? If he had introduced his resolution, and it had failed, and the vote had shown that those who retired could have carried it, he might then have established his point. The gentleman intimated his intention to introduce it. Why did he not do so?

Mr. CULLOM. I have fully explained my reasons. If the gentleman doubted whether these resolutions could pass before leaving, I might have my doubts after these members had retired; and being ardent in my support of the principles of the resolutions, I did not choose to submit them to a doubtful decision, though I was clear in the belief then, and am confirmed in it now, that the resolutions would have passed had the receding friends remained with me and given them their support, as I was ready to do.

But the Democratic party have no cause for exultation. The Whig party, in congressional caucus, did, at the commencement of the session, indorse the compromise and its finality, which the Democrats refused to do. This places the Whig party on prominent ground, and I trust that the delegates will assemble in the convention with a manly—a Roman courage—and face this question; for it is cowardice that gives Abolitionism and higher-law-ism a place in the bosom of Americans. The Constitution, in all its provisions, and the laws passed under it, must be executed and carried out if we would maintain inviolate the liberties and sacred privileges vouchsafed to us by that Constitution which is the result of the seven years' war through which our Washington and his compeers stood shoulder to shoulder, regardless of the many and trying scenes and vicissitudes of that most eventful period. What earthly law, Mr. Chairman, can be higher than that derived from the Constitution? From that source we derive peace, prosperity, happiness, and give countenance and protection to men of all nations, to all religions, and all creeds. Destroy that bulwark of American liberty, and chaos would come again. Then, indeed, would we have higher law and higher license, which is, in truth, the proper definition, aim, and import of higher law. That man who is against the execution of the plain provisions of the Constitution, ought not to be dignified with the name of American citizen, and surely cannot be called an American statesman. That is what I say; and I tell our Northern brethren, that instead of catering to this unholy and unjust crusade against the South and its institutions, you should rise above sectional feeling, and Americanize—nationalize your hearts, and meet this issue which demagogues have obtruded upon you, and frown down all attempts to rekindle the fire of discord between the two great sections of this Union. Nothing but courage is wanting to overcome this evil.

But this Union party is to be formed, and my friend from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] is to be the first President of the Southern Confederacy, if we get up a geographical split; for it will lead to that; and there will be a contest between the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CABELL] and the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN.] [Laughter.] There will be an awful seceding then; there will be a worse scramble for place and power than there was in the Whig caucus. Mark it! But the Union party—I ask, in the name of all that is honest, is not the Whig party a part of the Union party? Have I been fighting the battle of the Whigs? Have I emerged from the smoke and din of so many glorious battles, either at the head or in the ranks, to learn that I have been fighting against my country and her institutions? Forbid it, Heaven! I hope the Whig and Democratic parties both are Union parties; and, notwithstanding the excrescences in both parties, both are friendly to this Union. And that man who says the Whig party is not devoted to this glorious Union, slanders as gallant a band of patriots as the sun ever fell upon, and proclaims in doing so that he is either ignorant of the truth or willfully at fault. I am not ashamed of the name of Whig; it is no reproach. Our fathers bore it, and I have fought many a political battle under it. I seek no new alliances. I will neither add an alias to my name nor forsake my companions. In my advocacy of Whig principles, I have only the interests of my country to subserve, and I feel that the advancement of those principles will best accomplish the desired object. I am for the Constitution and its compromises.

How is this third party to be organized? Upon sectional grounds, of course. I cannot fully discuss this subject here. Our gallant candidate in the last gubernatorial campaign in Tennessee labored manfully to keep the party on national ground; and fierce was the war against secessionists and ultras. The doctrines of the opposition had a strong resemblance to those of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN;] but in the struggle the Whigs were victorious, and the verdict of the people was in favor of the Union and the Constitution, and the faithful execution of the laws, and especially did they repudiate all agitation; and while the North observes strictly the compact, (and candor obliges me to say I believe it will be observed,) I do trust that the South will not unnecessarily agitate the question. Our fire-eating disunion friends came in for their full share of the anathemas meted out to the Free-Soilers. They shared equally my denunciations. No! I never denounce anybody but argumentatively, for I am a mild man, [laughter;] but in my honest judgment the men at the South who are contending for the right of the States to secede from this glorious Union, and who are urging its exercise upon trivial pretexts, are grossly culpable. Equally culpable are those at the North who agitate this subject, and who, for opposite reasons, would destroy the fabric of our liberties. Thus extremes are often found among those who cooperate in some respects. A proper view, and a conciliatory spirit, would bring about a different state of things; but conciliation should come from the source whence the wrong sprung. The true friends of the Union have ever been right; and based upon conservatism, their acts will seldom be far wrong. My voice is against him who is against the Union, and against the perpetuity of the institutions of his country, come he from the North or from the South. It cannot be doubted that the extremes—the Free-Soilers and the Secessionists—are, to some considerable extent united against the compromise; but in the end they will accomplish nothing beyond their own defeat. "Truth is mighty, and will prevail." America is God's own chosen country, and he will not permit the throne of liberty to crumble beneath the blows of the wicked or the misguided.

Mr. Chairman, I have been called a Scott man; and why? Simply because I have, everywhere, deprecated all denunciation of the leading men of the party. I am not, Mr. Chairman, of that class of gentlemen—politicians—who who believe, or act as though they believe, that some men in their own party must be defamed and cast aside, simply because they stand, by virtue of their worth and prominence, in the way of others, who are, perchance, but sectional favorites. I, sir, recognize no such principle. Feelings that dictate such a principle find no lodgment in my breast. I feel it my duty to speak upon this subject openly, and with a view to lessen the discord and other evils, that grow out of it.

"Construe the times to their own necessities!"—

I have seen men, in different sections of this Union, conduct their schemes of self-aggrandizement upon this baneful and party-sacrificing principle; and other gentlemen in this House have, I doubt not, witnessed the same thing. I have seen it brought to bear in elections of the most unimportant character, as well as in others of much importance. I have known good and true men, warm and abiding friends of this Union and of our Constitution, slandered and beslimed with the venom of the vindictive spirit of the unholy ambition of rivals. Sir, this unscrupulous ambition, backed by the reckless adherence of such individuals as suffer themselves to be carried away, without reflection, by the dazzle of promises, or by a fair exterior—by a sort of will-o'-the-wisp light—as the moth is dazzled by the burning candle, has caused the Whig party many a defeat; and, if the course be continued in, it will cause us many another overthrow. I feel that I hazard nothing in saying that the exercise of personal or sectional feeling such as this, has been, for years, the bane of the Whig party. It has been a great instrument in the hands of our opponents, and it has done more to destroy our party union, to defeat us in our elections, than any other—perhaps more than all other causes.

It is quite time, sir, that this track were abandoned. It is time that those who have been duped come back to the ranks of their party; and it is time that scheming leaders returned to their duty. It is time that men professing to love and support the principles of Washington—the principles that have made our country what it is, great, mighty, prosperous, free, and happy—unite in solid phalanx, and go forth freed of faction, unshackled, regardless of petty personalities, giving no heed to the calls of Januses, and battle for the maintenance of those principles, and for the party they believe and declare to be in the right. In union there is strength, and in strength and action there is success. The Whig party possesses all the elements of success, and whenever united it is triumphant. Its principles are those of liberty and true republicanism.

I could not tell who would be the nominee of the Convention. I could not say whether it would fall upon Scott, Webster, or Fillmore. With one single reservation, I have declared myself for the candidate of the Whig Convention. That reservation was, that the nominee must be unequivocally sound upon the compromise measures.

Mr. POLK, (interrupting.) You say you will support no man except he be sound upon the compromise. I ask, if you do not require a distinct pledge from the convention, how will you find it out if there is no pledge?

Mr. CULLOM. I must ascertain the fact in some way, beyond all dispute, and unequivocally.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have deprecated this fraternal strife, and I do not think it very culpable in me to stay my hand from inflicting injury upon my Whig friends, with whom I expect to cooperate in the struggle which is to come off. When I have remonstrated with some gentlemen, and attempted to keep them from casting fire-brands into our party ranks, I have been actuated alone by a desire to see the Whig party and its glorious principles triumph, and not for the promotion of any particular man. With the Whig party, the motto has been "Measures, not men;" and I, sir, am not disposed to reverse the maxim.

I had, Mr. Chairman, the honor of being upon the electoral ticket of the distinguished President who now fills the Executive office with so much credit to himself, and with so much benefit and glory to this Republic; and, sir, humble as the tribute is, I stand here to award to him in my own right, and in behalf of my constituents, the fullest meed of praise my tongue can lisp, for the manner in which he has discharged the arduous duties of the station to which he has been elevated by the franchise of the American people. I say, too, sir, that the people in Tennessee—I speak particularly of my own constituents, but the remark will apply to the people of the whole State, and I speak it in their voice—are undivided in their devotion to Millard Fillmore. There is no respectable division of sentiment in Tennessee upon that subject. I have always preferred his nomination, and the fact is well known. I have said, too, that if he could not get the nomination, and the Convention should present a man who is sound upon the compromise, I would support him with equal ardor, and devote to him, as I did to Mr. Fillmore in the last campaign, whatever of zeal and ability I can command.

There is Mr. Webster, sir; I could support him for the Presidency, and I could support him with great pleasure. He deserves the thanks, not only of the American people, but of the world; his genius and patriotism are transcendent.

But, sir, although I say this much for those gentlemen, I shall not raise my voice in detraction of General Winfield Scott. I have never done so, and, God being my witness, I never will. His rivals would scorn the action, justice would rebuke it, honor and patriotism would forbid it. He may or may not be nominated. If he receive the nomination, he should receive, as he deserves, the support of the American people. Mr. Chairman, while I have been sleeping upon beds of down he has been defending me—he has been marching and fighting gallantly—not under the black flag alluded to by my honorable colleague, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] but under the flag of our own dear country—the stars and stripes of liberty. Yes, sir, he has been defending us and our liberties; he has been fighting the foes of the country, upon foreign and domestic soil, when the country has been wrapt in sweet, forgetful sleep; and my tongue shall never utter a slander or an imputation against him. His laurels have been dearly earned. A black flag! indeed. My colleague [Mr. WILLIAMS] did not measure the force and weight of that declaration. What is a black flag? Why, a piratical flag. Sir, is it to be said that the gallant soldier, the victorious chieftain of forty-three years, and of so many glorious battles, has marched under a piratical flag? Can it be possible that my honorable friend has a remote conjecture that such could ever be the case? Why, sir, the conjecture is an imputation, and avows a want of patriotism.

But, sir, General Scott, of all living men, perhaps, has shown the strongest evidence that he loves his country. I will not now stop to enumerate his achievements. Gentlemen say that they know he is sound upon the slavery question, and the declaration is supported by gentlemen upon my right, [Mr. CLINGMAN, Mr. OUTLAW, and Mr. STANLY,] and the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CABELL] has himself borne evidence to his soundness upon this question. The gentleman from Connecticut [Governor CLEVELAND] comes gallantly to the rescue, and makes General Scott preëminently responsible for the passage of the compromise measures while acting as Secretary of War. He actually lent the influence of his office to carry forward these pacific measures.

Here is an extract from Governor CLEVELAND's speech, delivered in the House of Representatives, 1st April, 1852. Amongst other things he said:

"It proposes to indorse the infamous fugitive slave law, a purely Whig measure, and that it is such I will demonstrate, so that no man upon this floor can deny it."

Again, he says:

"But Mr. Clay, as I have shown, had conceived the plan. Mr. Webster, for reasons best known to himself, had made his 7th of March speech. General Taylor died, and Mr. Fillmore took command of the ship of State, discharged the old, and shipped a new crew, with Mr. Webster as first officer; hoisted the compromise flag, and started on his Southern cruise. What motive governed Mr. Fillmore in his entire change of policy of the Administration, whether it was love of slavery and power, or hatred of his rival, Governor Seward, I am not able to say, and I believe the country is equally unenlightened on this subject. General Scott was by Mr. Fillmore placed temporarily at the head of the War Department, and, in that position, coupled with his great military fame, was able to, and did exert a powerful influence in favor of the compromise measures. Here, then, is every man whose name has been mentioned, or is likely to be mentioned as a candidate for the Presidency on the Whig side, to wit: Clay, Webster, Fillmore, Scott, all exerting themselves to the utmost in pushing through this series of measures, the slave law included. And what was the position of these distinguished Whigs? One was at the head of the Government, another in command of the Army."

Again, in the same speech, he says:

"But I must pass on; these measures were passed mainly through the influence of Clay, Fillmore, Webster, Scott, Cobb, and Foote; these were the men who carried them through, and every man who was in the last Congress knows it."

Thus we see that Governor CLEVELAND makes witnesses of every member of Congress to the fact that General Scott was one of the main supporters of those measures before and at the time they passed. And while the Free-Soilers in the North are holding General Scott responsible for the passage of those measures, with a view to render him odious, others in the South, with the same view, are endeavoring to make it appear that he is, and has been, opposed to them.

After all this, sir, gentlemen say that he must declare that he is sound. They want a guarantee that he will not array himself under the black flag, with Mr. SEWARD at the head. [Laughter.] My stars! how Mr. SEWARD frightens the American people! Why, sir, as much was said of Mr. Fillmore, but I defended him upon an hundred stumps from the charge of abolitionism. It was my lot upon the electoral ticket to defend him—not from his friends, but against the Democratic press, from Maine to Georgia, and against orators as numerous as the locusts of Egypt.

Now, I understand that Mr. SEWARD will support the nominee of the Whig National Convention; and it is said he is a Free-Soiler. I am not his defender. Does his unsoundness taint the candidate who receives his vote? If so, how utterly unworthy of trust will be the Democratic candidate, who receives the votes, as he will, be he whom he may, of GIDDINGS, KING, SUMNER, RANTOUL, and CLEVELAND. While a mote is discovered in the eye of the Whigs, remember there is a beam in the eye of our Democratic neighbor.

It is said, and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. CLEVELAND] proves it, that the compromise measures are not only Whig measures, but that General Scott is preëminently responsible for them. Why, sir, he takes all the glory away from the Democrats, and says that there was not a prominent Democrat who supported the measures in their inception. I understand my friend [Mr. CLEVELAND] to be a mighty Cass man, though a little free-soilish. Mr. Cass never voted for the fugitive slave bill. I have the Journal and the Congressional Globe, proving the fact; and I state here, that although General Cass was in the Senate of the United States on the very day that the bill passed, the very moment it was ordered to be engrossed he was missing; nor does the record show where he went; neither does he or his friends explain. Colonel Benton would call this riding both sides the sappling. [Laughter.] But the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. CLEVELAND] explains the reasons. And, sir, the distinguished Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] Young America himself, had to dodge the vote upon the fugitive slave law.

Hear what Governor CLEVELAND says in the speech referred to:

"Did the distinguished Senator from Illinois vote for this slave law? No! Why? Because a Democratic Legislature had instructed him otherwise. Governor Cass, one of the most distinguished men in the nation, and of his party, did not record his vote in favor of this Federal bantling, nor, in fact, did any Democrat whose position is one of mark, except those who have since formed a coalition with Whigs. In view of these facts, who will say that this fugitive slave law was not of Whig or Federal origin?"

Yes, sir, he was ill. My honorable friend [Mr. RICHARDSON] says he had a bile. [Laughter.] The Senator himself says he had a bill which fell due at New York. I think, sir, that that was an awful bill. It had no right to fall due just at the very moment the distinguished Senator was called upon to vote upon the fugitive slave law. That was a cruel bill. I know not whether it was a bill or a bile. [Laughter.] I will be corrected in this particular by what my friend from Illinois [Mr. RICHARDSON] may say, but I hope he and the honorable Senator will render the same excuse, for there is very little relevancy between a bile and a bill. Will the gentleman answer whether or not it was a bile that prevented the Senator from voting?

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman, I trust, is a man of too much gallantry to make charges without giving an opportunity for reply.

Mr. CULLOM. Go on, sir.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman can make what use he pleases of the statement I shall make in this matter, and he is welcome to all the clat he can derive from it.

I did say that Judge DOUGLAS was sick and unable to attend when the vote was taken upon the fugitive slave bill. I made the statement upon my own responsibility, relying upon my own memory. I was mistaken; and to me, and me only, belongs the odium, if there is any, for all that I said. The fugitive slave bill passed late in the session, and I remembered the fact, that Judge DOUGLAS was confined for several days before the close of that session to his room by indisposition. Remembering these facts, I did make the statement, and was wrong.

After the statement I made, my attention was not called to the subject till after Judge DOUGLAS made his own defense in the Senate, and since no suitable opportunity has occurred to set myself right. The gentleman can make now the most of it. I will add but another word.

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly, go on.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The imputation against Judge DOUGLAS that he dodged the responsibility of voting upon the fugitive bill, is made with but bad grace by gentlemen situated as the gentleman is. A bare statement of what is known to the whole country is sufficient. Judge DOUGLAS was the first to meet the tide of public sentiment at the North, which set strongly against this measure and to vindicate the bill. And while his Chicago speech was the first that was made for the bill, no argument in the courts, no essays in the papers, and no defense of the measure made anywhere up to this moment, have been as able and as satisfactory. The bill passed Congress in September, I believe. In October following, the Chicago speech was made, assuming all the responsibility of an affirmative vote, and yet the American people are asked to believe that Judge DOUGLAS dodged the vote, was afraid to vote upon the bill. I will not argue such a question here or elsewhere. But I ask the gentleman what Whig aspirant for the Presidency, or what prominent Whig can show that he has done as much? What Northern man has done more?

Mr. CULLOM. There were plenty more besides him.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Who were they?

Mr. CULLOM. Since the matter has become popular, I can find you many who did not vote for the fugitive slave bill, but who now defend it most lustily. There is the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS,] who said that we were about to destroy him in the South, and that we had erected a gallows upon which he was to be executed. My honorable friend, I understand, did not vote for the fugitive slave bill, although here; yet in the caucus, he made himself the very Magnus Apollo of the compromise measures. Not only so, but it is said—and if untruthfully, it should be corrected—that he not only refused to vote for the fugitive slave bill, but advised my friend to the right [Mr. BRIGGS] to change the vote he had cast in its favor. Notwithstanding that, sir, he has become the great oracle of the institution of slavery. We thank him for what he has done.

Mr. BROOKS. Rumors, like the one the gentleman has stated, should not be thrown out without some foundation—and there is no foundation whatever for this piece of fancy. My honorable colleague from New York, [Mr. BRIGGS,] I take it for granted, votes of his own accord and upon his own free will and principles, and will set me right in this matter. One word in reply to what the gentleman has said in regard to my vote upon the fugitive slave law. The gentleman must not scatter his arrows right and left if he will not give me an opportunity of defending myself. If the gentleman will consult the Congressional Globe and record, he will find that upon the various occasions upon which the fugitive slave bill was brought forward, I voted for it over twenty times upon divisions, and in every way facilitated action upon it. He will also find that my main objection to voting for it on its final passage was, that when it was brought forward by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, [Mr. THOMPSON, of Pennsylvania,] it was forthwith pressed, violently pressed, under the operation of the previous question, without giving the House an opportunity even to read the bill in print, or to have it printed at all. It is unfair for the gentleman to scatter his arrows right and left without affording me and my colleague [Mr. BRIGGS] an opportunity to defend ourselves from the random arrows he is throwing all about.

Mr. CULLOM. The gentleman called on me for an example of the case.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman permit me for only a moment?

Mr. CULLOM. Be brief, as my time has nearly expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will ask the gentleman but this one question: When, in the gentleman's opinion, will the fugitive slave law become popular enough at the North to permit General Scott to avow himself in its favor? Judge Douglas came out in its vindication before it was popular.

Mr. CULLOM. General Scott is known to be a compromise man. I, sir, know him to be such; and I would not permit myself to be deceived, nor would I be the means of deceiving others upon this point. Gentlemen may find enough in General Scott's Castle Garden speech, in his letters to Honorable Daniel Webster and Henry Clay, and in the evidence which all bear, to satisfy them, if they will be satisfied, that he espoused the compromise measures quite as early and as ardently as any man, perhaps, that can be found in the country, not excepting Mr. Webster or Mr. Fillmore. There are plenty of private citizens who are informed and satisfied upon this point—better informed and better satisfied, I might infer from their remarks, than are many gentlemen who it is presumed know more of such matters than the people. Notwithstanding General Scott is known here and everywhere to be sound upon these measures, he is assailed by the opposition press, and by Democratic orators, as Whig favorites always are. He is assailed, not because he is against those measures, not because he is supposed to be in favor of their repeal or modification, but because he should, in the opinion of wiseacres, come out with a letter. Sir, who has called upon him for his opinion? Where are the letters of the several Democratic aspirants upon the slavery question? Surely there are none before the country. Yet, sir, it does seem that Democracy will go into convulsions if it cannot get to read a letter from General Scott upon the subject. My judgment was that a letter should have been written long ago; but some Whigs, as if to force the nomination of another, have been—I had almost said bullying General Scott to write since the period of his prominence for the nomination would have made it appropriate for him to have written; and I must say, that much as I admire frankness in politics, I do not see how General Scott could for months past have written upon the subject. But, sir, should he be the Whig candidate, he should, and I know that he would, avow himself to the country, as he does on all occasions in conversation, for the prompt maintenance and execution of all the compromise measures.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FITCH] saw proper to assail General Scott, and I believe he called him the "mum Whig candidate for the Presidency." I must review a little the public course of the gentleman who thus assails General Scott, who defended me whilst I was a child; and I and my country would be recreant to the promptings of patriotism not to repel the assault, come it from what quarter it may. I have the right of speech here, if General Scott has not, and I will, with my voice, defend him. But listen a moment to the gentleman, [Mr. FITCH:]

"In 1849, Doctor FITCH pledged himself to the Free-Soilers, when a candidate for their suffrages, in the following language:

"1. To vote for the unconditional abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia.

"2. To vote for the abolition of the inter-State slave trade.

"3. To vote for the Wilmot proviso being extended over the Territory of California, and New Mexico, and against the law authorizing slaves to be taken there as property.

"Doctor FITCH concluded his letter, containing the above-named pledges of fidelity to Free-Soil principles, by the following explicit declaration:

"Entertaining the views indicated in my answer above, I shall not only vote yes on all these measures, but if no older or able member, whose influence for them would be greater than mine, can be found to introduce them to Congress, I shall do so myself, if I have the honor of holding a seat there."

GRAHAM N. FITCH."

This is the gentleman who proclaims General Scott a mum candidate, who asperses his name, and seeks to impeach his patriotism.

Mr. Chairman, whether Whig or Democrat assail a prominent Whig, I will test the cause—in this case I shall test it with the plummet. The Democratic press is down upon General Scott, as it always has been down upon Whig favorites. The object, sir, is to draw off the public mind from their own fueds and enormities. The Democratic orators everywhere, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FITCH] himself, have taken the field against General Scott. If it was his desire that the American people should believe, from his wanting General Scott to come out, that he himself supported that measure, he will fail of his purpose; for the Journals, unfortunately for him, stand as evidence to the contrary. His votes will be found recorded on page 1452 of the Journal of the Thirty-first Congress.

Mr. FITCH. I can save the gentleman the trouble of any reference to the Journal. I voted against the fugitive slave law—have so said before, and further said, as I now do, that under similar circumstances, I should give the same vote again. The previous question prevented debate on the bill, or attempt to amend it, and no means were left of expressing dissent from any of its provisions, except a negative vote on its passage. But it is the law—it is one of the series of measures constituting the compromise which I sustain—which I have declared, and I repeat it, should be sustained by all good citizens; should be received as a final settlement of slavery issues and slavery agitation in Congress; should be observed, and their provisions, those of the fugitive slave law included, be faithfully executed. My vote is of little importance to the country—my opinions less; but the same declaration I have made relative to the compromise has been made by the great mass of my party, and by all its prominent candidates for the Presidency. The questions now at issue are, will the party to which the gentleman belongs assume the same position—a position of national importance, and of vital interest to his section of the country? And will his candidate [General Scott] make the same declaration? Will he declare what will be his policy relative to those measures in the event of his election? The gentleman's opinions and assumptions, though doubtless of far more importance than any I may express, are not an answer, and will not be received as such. The answer can only come from the Whig party, and from General Scott. Both are evading it, and with the gentleman's aid. Will they continue to do so?

Mr. CULLOM. That will do, sir; but is General Scott to write letters upon the question when not requested so to do, when the gentleman, under solemn oath, acting with responsibility to God and his country, would not dare to record his vote for the measure? He recorded his vote with GIDDINGS, GOTT, JULIAN, and PRESTON KING. I hope I may be excused for mentioning this matter of history. I do not wish to bring down upon my head the anathemas of the venerable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GIDDINGS.] Fine company is that in which my friend from Indiana is found; and, although denouncing upon this floor a venerable patriot, he says he would vote so again. I have no doubt of it. The country shall see who General Scott's assailants are. On the 17th September, 1850, when the bill to repeal the slave trade in the District of Columbia was under discussion, Mr. A. G. BROWN offered the following amendment:

"And be it further enacted, That, if any free person or persons within the District of Columbia, shall entice or induce, by persuasion or other means, any slave or slaves to run away from his, her, or their owners, or lawful possessor, or shaft in any manner aid, abet, or assist any slave or slaves in running away or escaping from the owner or lawful possessor of such slave or slaves, or shall harbor any slave or slaves with the intent to assist him, her, or them, to escape from the service of such owner or possessor, such person or persons shall be liable to indictment in the circuit court of the District of Columbia; and, upon conviction, by verdict, confession, or otherwise, shall be imprisoned in the penitentiary for any time not exceeding five years."

Against this amendment G. N. FITCH voted, with CLEVELAND, GOTT, KING, and THADDEUS STEVENS.

This is the gentleman who has become the guardian of the Whig party, and of Southern rights. This is the author of the dodging resolution, that was intended as a platform for Secessionists, Abolitionists, and higher-law men to stand upon; and it is he who is made the mouth-piece to denounce General Scott as a "mum candidate." Sir, the gentleman will sicken of this business, so sure as fate. The ethics of the gentleman make it quite admissible to steal negroes, but do not allow that it is proper to punish the perpetrator.

I have said that the resolution of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FITCH] was a resolution drawn to enable the Free-Soilers and Secessionists to occupy the same platform. Any intelligent person who will read these resolutions carefully, will perceive this.

The resolution offered by the gentleman [Mr. FITCH] is in these words:

"Resolved, That we recognize the binding efficacy of the compromises of the Constitution, and believe it to be the intention of the people generally, as we hereby declare it to be ours individually, to abide such compromises, and to sustain the laws necessary to carry them out—the provision for the delivery of fugitive slaves included—and that we deprecate all further agitation of questions growing out of that provision, of the questions embraced in the acts of the last Congress known as the compromise, and of questions generally connected with the institution of slavery, as unnecessary, useless, and dangerous."

Now, almost all the Free-Soilers recognize the compromises of the Constitution—all parts of it, as they understand it. The State-Rights Free-Soiler [Mr. RANFOUT] from Massachusetts, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. CLEVELAND] and from New York, [Mr. KING,] all recognize these compromises. But they do not acquiesce in the compromise acts. These acts they denounce, as does the new convert from Indiana. These compromises of the Constitution require jury trials for the runaway slave, as these Free-Soilers contend. This resolution does not approve the fugitive slave law. Well, after a consultation, the resolution was put into the hands of a gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. JACKSON,] claimed to be a Secessionist. If I am not misinformed, he was told this resolution from the Indiana gentleman was worth nothing; so it was patched up for the gentleman from Georgia, who has to stand god-father to it. So it was, after a little Speaker-room caucus, as I believe, but, after some consultation, amended and offered by the gentleman from Georgia, as follows:

"Resolved, That we recognize the binding efficacy of the compromises of the Constitution, and believe it to be the intention of the people generally, as we hereby declare it to be ours individually, to abide such compromises, and to sustain the laws necessary to carry them out—the provision for the delivery of fugitive slaves [and the act of the last Congress for that purpose] included; and that we deprecate all further agitation of questions growing out of that provision, of the questions embraced in the acts of the last Congress known as the compromise, and of questions generally connected with the institution of slavery, as unnecessary, useless, and dangerous."

On examination, Mr. Chairman, it will be seen that these are the Georgia words inserted—forced on the Indiana Free-Soil resolution, "and the acts of the last Congress for that purpose." Now, sir, why was this inserted, if the first resolution was sufficient? The first resolution evaded the fugitive law. That was for the benefit of the Free-Soilers. The second [Mr. JACKSON's] inserted the fugitive act. That was for the benefit of the Secessionists. But nothing was said of the compromise measures—not one word. Only the "compromises of the Constitution," which are recognized by the Calhoun Nullifiers and Secessionists, and by the Free-Soilers, like Hallett, and others in this House, RANTOUL, CLEVELAND, GIDDINGS, KING, &c., &c., &c.

Thus, then, the coalition platform was built up. But it still required bracing; and though the Democratic organ called on its friends to sustain the previous question, moved by the gentleman from Georgia, the Union Democrats would not listen to its call. The previous question being voted down, another resolution was offered by a Union Democrat from Georgia, [Mr. HILLYER.]

First, let me state, as the record will show, that many of the Secessionists voted for the coalition platform. Those who in caucus voted together for Speaker, together voted for the "compromises of the Constitution," some for jury trial, and some against it; some for the fugitive slave law, and some for its repeal; but all for the "Compromises of the Constitution," as understood by Hallett and others in Massachusetts, and by the Secessionists in South Carolina.

The previous question was voted down; then the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. HILLYER,] a Union man, offered the following Whig resolution—Fillmore resolution—for it was the words of his message:

"Resolved, That the series of acts passed during the first session of the Thirty-first Congress, known as the compromise, are regarded as a final adjustment and permanent settlement of the questions therein embraced, and should be maintained and executed as such."

For this compromise (Fillmore) resolution, as far as I can learn from the Journals, every Southern Whig voted. The only one called a Whig who voted against it, was the gentleman from North Carolina, who thinks both parties are factions, and whose opinions agree with the Secessionists. I believe all those known as Secessionists from Virginia, South Carolina, and other States, voted against this resolution; voted with the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN.] With his name are those of FOWLER, PRESTON KING, MANN, RANTOUL, and TUCK; with Mr. VENABLE and others, understood to be opposed to the compromise measures.

Now, sir, why did the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HILLYER] offer his amendment? Because, like a patriot, he wanted a distinct indorsement of the compromise measures—all of them. He wanted no dodging-place for secession and abolition. Why did the Abolitionists and Secessionists (I believe all of them) vote against the Compromise, the Union resolution? Because it recognizes the "final settlement of the compromise measures!"

Now, Mr. Chairman, no man of sense can examine the course of these gentlemen, and not see that the Democracy are preparing, under the lead of Hallett, and such men, to pass unmeaning resolutions in the Baltimore Convention, and to give the "go-by" to the compromise resolutions—to allow Abolitionists to agitate for jury trial and repeal of the fugitive law, under the compromises of the Constitution; and to allow Secessionists at the South to denounce the territorial bills, the bill abolishing the slave trade in this District, and the act admitting California, as doing injustice to the South.

Sir, the high-minded, intelligent people I represent, will see through this flimsy mask, and despise the hypocrisy of those men who wish to make party capital out of this slavery question, and who will not abide by the compromise measures—all of them; will not support and sustain them as the Whigs of the South do, as General Scott does—as a final settlement of the questions therein embraced.

Now, Mr. Chairman, to return to the subject of letter-writing and bids for the Presidency, let me say, that it is not always that a letter is the best evidence of a man's soundness. The greater guarantee is to be found in his past life and services. It has been truthfully remarked that he who is not to be trusted without pledges, is not to be the more trusted though he should make them. And, sir, if the past life and services of a man afford any guarantee for his future action, then is that guarantee to be found in the life and services of General Scott. Of Southern birth and education, upright and talented, American in heart and in action, devoted from early life to his country and his country's weal, he certainly possesses all the requisites necessary for the station, high as it is, with which his name is connected.

Sir, if you take for example the celebrated Coleman letter of General Jackson, you will find that it was construed to suit each and every latitude; and, descending to later times, if you look at the Kane letter of the late President, (Mr. Polk,) you will find that that also was subjected to similar construction. And again, sir, if we glance at General Cass's Nicholson letter, we find that it also was construed to suit every meridian of the Union. That letter, sir, has passed through many editions, and under numerous supervisions, to meet the exigencies of the times; and it is doubtless now undergoing a revision, and will be presented in such a form as will be most likely to strike the public mind favorably in case he should become a candidate for the Presidency. And, sir, it is probable that the various editions of his life also, will be revised for a like purpose.

Mr. Chairman, it has been said that the attempt to elect General Scott to the Presidency will, at least in the South, be a splendid failure. Sir, I do not claim to speak for the South. I do not pretend to be invested with the power to look into the future. It has been proclaimed that Tennessee will not sustain him. I am not here invested with authority to commit my State to the support of any man. I claim no such power; but I am not willing to say, nor am I prepared to admit, or believe, that my State—one of the proudest of the Confederacy, one that has vindicated her devotion to the principles of the Whig party in every presidential contest from 1836 to the present time—will now abandon her long-cherished principles. Who is authorized to say that she will ingloriously retreat in the approaching contest, and permit her proud banner, that has floated in glorious triumph over a thousand hard fought fields, to trail in the dust? Others may distrust her fidelity and devotion to the country and the principles she has so long espoused; but as for myself, I do not distrust her. She has learned her principles in a school not soon to be forgotten. She has at all times attested her devotion to her principles, and my word for it, she will be found faithful among the faithless, and her banner will yet wave in triumph amidst the fiercest strife, and no blot shall stain her escutcheon. Her motto has ever been, and I trust, will ever be, "Fearless and faithful."

Let me say to my Democratic friends, that you have got no time to swap horses; you have your own feuds to adjust, instead of distressing yourselves upon the question whether the Whig party will lay down a sound platform, and whether a national candidate will be placed on it. Look to your own troubles, which are thickening upon you; your State conventions have nearly all given the go-by to the compromise measures; your Free-Soil wing here, who are numerous and influential, in warning tones give notice in their speeches, and in heated conversation, that the attempt to make the finality of the compromise measures a part of the Democratic platform in convention, will prove abortive; whilst the State-Rights Secession wing refuse to acknowledge its binding efficacy.*

[Here the hammer fell.]

*NOTE.—Since the delivery of this speech, I find, in the Republic of the 18th of May, 1852, the following letter, which, I understand, comes from a respectable gentleman. I publish this as one of many instances of the coalition between the Democracy and the Abolitionists. These are the allies of those who denounce General Scott!

Extract of a letter from a gentleman in Boston to a friend in this city:

"BOSTON, May 13, 1852.
"The coalition Senate has passed a bill which, in my judgment, nullifies the fugitive law. It has passed to a third reading in the House, though there is hope it will be killed when it comes up for engrossment. The vote in the Senate I inclose you. The politics of each member is marked. You will notice, among the yeas, the name of Mr. Haswell, who is the editor of the Boston Times, a Locofoco paper in this city, that has the names of Douglas and Hunter for President and Vice President at the head of its columns. He voted for it. You will also notice the name of Mr. Knowlton. He is the editor of the Worcester Palladium, a Locofoco paper. He has been a candidate for Congress several times, and is the delegate from that district to the Democratic National Convention. Knowlton not only voted for it, but he spoke in favor of it.

"I will try and procure a copy of the bill. The vote in both Houses was nearly a party vote. Out of one hundred and ninety-six Whigs in the House, only four voted for it; with these four exceptions, the whole of the yeas are from the Democrats and Free-Soilers.

"In the Senate, only one Whig voted for it."

This bill was supported by Hallett's friends—

Mr. CLINGMAN. I do not intend to detain the committee now by a speech, in reply to my friend from Tennessee, [Mr. CULLOM,] for two reasons. In the first place, I, as a member of the Committee on Territories, am extremely averse to having the time devoted to territorial business taken up by this political debate, and I intend to ask that the committee rise, in order that the House may pass a resolution terminating debate. But, secondly, as I am on the floor for this purpose, I assure the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CULLOM] that the reason why I do not reply to him now is not that I have any lack of respect for him individually, or for his effort. The gentleman has obviously passed over all the seceders except myself. He probably thought that he would not be a match for any of these individuals, and selected me as the weakest and humblest of the number. While I readily admit that the gentleman has shown great judgment and prudence in choosing his antagonists, I nevertheless say to him, if the occasion was such as, in my judgment, to require it, that even I, humble as I admit myself to be in comparison with the gentlemen who were associated with me, would not fear to meet him on these issues, and with little fear of the result. But everybody sees that the object of the gentleman is to avoid all collision with the others. They might possibly, in his opinion, prove too formidable for him, or else his object is to place me preëminently conspicuous in this matter, not with the view of benefiting me, but of injuring them. Now, I say to the gentleman, that in assigning me the place of leader, he pays me the greatest compliment in his power, for there is no body of the same number mentioned in all history that I should be prouder to be associated with as a comrade than the gentlemen who seceded from that caucus. The object of the gentleman is, to injure them, through me, by indirectly intimating that they must be a very feeble party, when they have such a poor leader. Now, those gentlemen can take care of themselves, and need no defense from me. Nobody knows better than the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. CULLOM,] so far from being the leader, or even a prominent actor, I was, in fact, only a follower.

But the gentleman finding that he is placed in a position where he cannot defend himself before the country—for his whole speech to-day is but a confession of that, as every one must see—finding Haswell and Knowlton—no doubt warm friends of the "compromises of the Constitution," but willing to nullify a law of Congress, provided that the Democratic Governor of Massachusetts shall appoint commissioners in every county to aid in procuring the discharge of persons arrested as fugitive slaves; and, also, for a habeas corpus in favor of the fugitive slave; and, if the slave is not discharged by the judge, he may claim jury trial.

These men would all, no doubt, vote for the resolution recognizing the "compromises of the Constitution," but are for nullifying the "compromise measures."

The following is the vote of the House of Representatives upon Mr. HILLYER's amendment:

YEAS.—Messrs. Willis Allen, Appleton, Thomas H. Bayly, Beale, Bowie, Breckinridge, Briggs, Brooks, George H. Brown, Busby, E. Carrington Cabell, Chandler, Clark, Cobb, Cullom, Curtis, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dockery, Junham, Edmundson, Ewing, Faulkner, Ficklin, Fitch, Florence, Freeman, Henry M. Fuller, Thomas J. D. that he has gotten into a place where he will not be able to carry the burden placed upon him by public opinion, has endeavored to shift it off upon me. I have a great deal of charity, but I have not quite enough to make me willing to carry so heavy a load as he has on him. No; he must carry his own cross to the place of execution. I do not intend to be a cross-bearer for him or any one else. Each gentleman must answer for his own sins, and defend himself before his party. As to what the gentleman has said to-day, I have no apprehension that it will hurt me in any respect. I have often heard much louder thunder; and when he publishes his speech, in which he says he intends to make some references to me, and make quotations from some of my speeches, if I find that his mode of arraying these things should be such as to require defense, I will be ready enough to make it. But I am not soft enough to engage in this fight now. My position is well understood by the country, and even if it were otherwise, I should not now regard it as proper for me to consume the public time in my defense. I intend to wait, and let this contest go on for the present, and if I see a fitting occasion, and shall have reason to believe that a speech from me would be of service to the country, I shall make it. I am always ready to defend myself before my constituents when I think it necessary, and am equally ready to do it before the public in the newspapers, when I think the occasion requires it, and if it should become necessary, which I can scarcely suppose, I shall not fail to do it here. But whenever I can advance the public interests, I will be as prompt as any other gentleman to take part in the discussion. I appeal to the committee to let us go through with this territorial business, as I think we may be able to finish it in two days, and then allow the political discussion to go on.

Mr. FITCH. Will the gentleman from North Carolina give me time to briefly answer such remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CULLOM] as relate personally to myself?

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will give way for a short time, if the committee will consent. My object is to make the motion I have indicated.

Mr. FITCH. If the gentleman wishes it, I can close with making the motion which he desires to make. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CULLOM] appears willing to "Compound for sins he is inclined to,

By damning those he has no mind to."

He seeks to blind the country to his inclination to aid the success of General Scott's non-committal policy, by denouncing me for placing my humble opinions upon record.

If the gentleman was really as desirous of telling the whole truth, and thereby doing justice to a political opponent, as he is of apologizing for the mum policy of his presidential candidate, he would have informed the House, of what his researches into my political opinions have doubtless informed him, namely—that interrogatories similar to those he has read, and read my answers, were propounded to me two years after the date of those he has paraded before the House, with an additional one, asking if I would vote for repeal or modification of the fugitive slave law, and answered in the negative, with the reasons in full which governed the answer. The answer he has read, was in accordance with the then sentiments of a large portion of the citizens of my State. It coincided with the then opinions of most of the Democrats of my district, and also with the opinion of most of the Whig party of the State. It is an answer which had been previously given, in substance, by my then Whig competitor. The sentiments and opinions, of which such answer to such interrogatories was the legitimate consequence, were induced by a course of action precisely similar to the one now advocated by the gentleman, namely—the nomination and election of a candidate for the Presidency, without asking any pledge or any opinion from him, upon the sectional question then at issue. The Democrats of my State, myself included, had opposed the proviso, and warmly advocated the election of a candidate openly pledged to opposition to it. The Whigs, and especially you Whigs of the South, asked no such pledge—no opinion from your candidate. You thereby courted Free-Soil votes to his support. You elected him. We were indignant at your abandonment of those in the North, who were striving to defend your constitutional rights—in indignant at your indifference to your own rights and interests, and your willingness to sacrifice them to party political success. We determined to no longer fight your battles upon our soil, and at our cost. In our anger, we determined to permit the Free-Soilers—ay, aid them—in presenting the bitter chalice to your lips, which you had helped them prepare. You know the result, in the dangerous agitation and excitement of the last Congress. But the compromise passed. We are desirous, for the peace and welfare of the country, that it should remain undisturbed, and its provisions be executed in good faith.

Hence I have sustained it as a settlement—and as I hope, a final settlement of the slavery controversy; and when, two years after the interrogatories the gentleman has read, others of a similar character were presented to me, with the addition I have mentioned—full time having been afforded within the two years to examine, in all their bearings, the principles involved in them—I answered them in the negative, stating that affirmative action upon some of them would be unconstitutional; upon others, impolitic and bad faith towards the South; and upon any of them, useless and dangerous. This negative answer was given when I was told—and had no reason to doubt the correctness of the statement—that my election depended upon an affirmative answer; but I coupled the answer with the declaration to those to whom it was made, that it was in accordance with my honest convictions, and that though it might insure my defeat, I had rather remain a private citizen, sustaining the Constitution and the Union as it is, than be elected to Congress, pledged to a policy which my judgment taught me was dangerous to both. If the gentleman from Tennessee is disposed to array this against me as a change of opinion, he should bear in mind that his candidate for the Presidency is amenable to the same charge of change, relative to his alleged views of naive Americanism, and several other isms. The gentleman from Tennessee does not understand me as arraigning General Scott's opinions; no one can arraign them, for no one knows what they are. I make no complaint of his opinions, but of his refusal, if he entertains any, to make them known. He refuses to inform the country whether he is in favor of carrying out, or extending, certain laws, the faithful execution of which, in the opinion of many, is essential to the peace, and consequently to the prosperity, of the country; or whether he will act with those, or permit their action, who are disposed to violate or repeal such laws. It is because of this refusal—this non-committal policy, that General Scott is called the mum candidate. If the gentleman from Tennessee, and his friends of the South, again adopt this policy, and are again successful under it, they will again have evinced their little regard for their own rights and interests, and have jeopardized both by placing both in the keeping of the Seward Free-Soil wing of their party. They will again have crushed those of the North who are willing to defend the rights of the South. They will have invited aggression, and at the same time have rendered powerless those of the North who were willing to aid in repelling it. They need, therefore, make no useless complainings if aggression comes.

I have said, and repeat it, that General Scott has made no declaration of his opinions upon all the compromise measures, and will make none unless by the advice and with the consent of the leaders of the Seward wing of his party. And if any is made with their consent, it will be of such equivocal character as to present a Northern and Southern face—permit of one interpretation at the North, and another at the South. The gentleman arrays against me my vote on the fugitive slave bill. He may esteem it what he chooses. It is a vote I shall at all times be ready and willing to justify. The bill, I thought, went beyond any necessity for the enforcement of that provision of the Constitution which requires the delivery of fugitives. But under the operation of the previous question, there was no opportunity for debate or amendment, and no other means of dissenting from any of its provisions than a negative vote against the bill. It is now the law, and opposition to it should cease, and its provisions be fully and faithfully enforced; and more especially since any real or fancied concessions in the law to the South, have their corresponding concessions to the North in other laws of the same series.

That gentleman, and others of his Southern political friends who are testifying in behalf of General Scott, declare, and probably believe, that he is in favor of sustaining the compromise. But if he is so, why does he pertinaciously refuse to so state to the public? And why does not some one of his Free-Soil supporters corroborate the testimony of these Southern witnesses? The only semblance of a public expression upon his part to which reference is had relative to any of the compromise measures, is of a date prior to the passage of the fugitive slave law, and is therefore no indication of his opinion relative to that law. Does such partial expression satisfy the gentleman from Tennessee? The gentleman says that the compromise resolution which I introduced is to be the non-committal platform upon which Democrats from the North and South may stand. The warmest compromise friend of General Scott would doubtless be satisfied if his peculiar friends—those who are so noisily testifying in his behalf—would persuade him to publish to the country a compromise platform, even one half more non-committal than that! The gentleman's speech, and the speeches of certain other Southern Whigs, are but the advance, the forerunner of a movement, the result of which will be a universal "caving in" upon the part of Southern Whigs to the support of General Scott. The gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLEY,] who was the first in the House to hoist the Scott flag, will soon be the leader of the Southern Whigs. They may wince now under his discipline, and manifest signs of meeting, but they will ultimately fall into his ranks, and march in his rear to the support of their mum candidate—not because they expect him to administer the Government in accordance with the principles they now advocate, but because they may receive assurances that he will make such disposition of the offices as will meet their wishes!

Mr. RICHARDSON was next recognized by the Chair.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I merely gave way to the gentleman from Indiana for explanation.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman from North Carolina is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I am willing to hear the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. RICHARDSON. My suggestion is, that a gentleman cannot hold the floor, and deal it round to four or five gentlemen, and then claim it back.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I yielded by unanimous consent, and so stated. I will now move that the committee rise.

Mr. GENTRY. Will the gentleman allow me to say a few words before he makes that motion?

Mr. CLINGMAN. Certainly I will if there is no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee can proceed if there be no objection.

No objection being made—

Mr. GENTRY. I do not wish to make a speech, and shall not tax the patience of the committee at all to-day. I merely wish to say, that during a congressional career somewhat protracted for as young a man as I am, it has been a uniform rule of action with me, whenever I could do so, and I have generally found that I could do it, to decline political contests upon this floor with my own colleagues, even of the adverse party. If it was needful for me at any time, in the performance of what I esteemed to be my duty, to shiver a lance, I always chose rather to select an antagonist from some other State. I have often felt here that collisions betwixt the members from any State exhibiting the local controversies, criminations, and recriminations which exist in our local politics everywhere, were in bad taste, and as long as I can possibly do so it is my purpose to avoid any such exhibition upon this floor. I say this by way of accounting for the fact that I do not intend to join issue with my colleague, [Mr. CULLOM,] who has addressed the House to-day. But, at the same time, it is due to myself to say that I dissent from many of the conclusions which he has arrived at in his speech, and that I intend, in due time, to discuss the questions which have been debated by him on this occasion. I desire to say further, as I am upon the floor, that in nothing that I have said or written, or to which I have appended my name, have I intended to arraign my colleague for the non-performance of his duty upon the occasion to which he has referred.

Mr. CULLOM. And I certainly have not arraigned my colleague's action or motives.

Mr. GENTRY. I wish to disclaim the idea that I have arraigned my colleague. He spoke of having been arraigned.

Mr. CULLOM. The publication of those who seceded from the caucus, seems to suppose it was necessary they should make it. And if it was necessary for them to publish, it was necessary for me, not having been heard, to make my response.

Mr. GENTRY. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CULLOM. But I did not mean to cast any reflections on my colleague's motives or action.

Mr. GENTRY. I want to say, in justice to myself, that in the preparation of that address I was to some extent consulted, and that my advice was given at every stage of that proceeding to exclude from it every phrase that could in the remotest degree be construed to impute any improper motives to any of those gentlemen, from the South especially, who took a different view of their duty from that taken by the gentlemen who seceded on that occasion and signed that address. He who will look through that address, will see that there is a remark in it intended expressly to cover such cases, and allow every gentleman to explain himself. We say that we know that some of the gentlemen who remained were as thoroughly committed to the views which we entertained as we were, but differed with us as to the propriety of time and place. It was the wish of those who signed the address to give to it the fullest possible effect, as being an expression of the fixed principles and purpose of the Southern Whig party, and as proclaiming to the Northern Whig party the condition, and the only condition, upon which the unity of the Whig party, as a party extending North and South, could be maintained. Perhaps we were wrong in our judgment; perhaps it was a needless movement; perhaps an ineffective movement; perhaps a mischievous one; but I do not so believe. If the party is saved at all, that movement saves it. I wish to God I could feel an assurance that it can be saved at all. I do not want a false issue to be presented to the country in regard to the occurrences at that caucus. I am sure that my colleague has fallen into a very common mistake, that seems to prevail elsewhere, that we, in introducing the resolution that we did, undertook to lay down a platform for the Whig party in convention in Baltimore. At the caucus, and in our address to the country, we expressly disclaimed any such object. We aimed at nothing more and proposed nothing more than to invite the Northern Whig members of Congress, assembled together with us upon that occasion, "to consult on matters and things of importance to the Whig party;" for that was the character of the call under which we assembled. We aimed, I say, at nothing more, proposed nothing more, did nothing more than to invite them to agree with us, as far as we ourselves were concerned, and as far as our action would have any influence on the country, upon a basis of party action which we deemed to be essential to the maintenance of the unity of the Whig party. That was the whole height and depth, and length and breadth of our proposition—nothing more. We did not assume to dictate to the Baltimore Convention. We intended to announce to the country what was the principle of action upon which we agreed, and to let that enunciation have such influence as it could upon the Whigs that we represented throughout the country. That, and nothing more, was the whole of what we proposed.

I have not, indeed, and do not intend to make the slightest effort to criminate my colleague, or any other gentleman from the South, who took the same view of duty which he did. It would be as painful to me as any fact I can conceive of, to believe that my colleague was not as resolute and determined as I possibly can be, in reference to the great object aimed at by myself and those who seceded with me from that caucus.

But my colleague uses a term to-day which I should say was unkind if it came from anybody else, about those who seceded on that occasion. He says we ran away from a fight in which the finality of the compromise was involved; and he distinctly announces that if we had remained, upon his invitation, and stood by him, he has conclusive evidence, in his pocket, or somewhere else, that we could have passed those resolutions. Well, now, it is due to my colleague to say, that before I retired from the caucus he did appeal to me, and to those who were acting with me, not to retire, announcing that it was his purpose again to offer the resolutions that had been ruled out of order when offered by the gentleman from Kentucky and myself, and asking us to stay and help him in the endeavor to carry those resolutions. That is very conspicuously reported in the official report of the proceedings of that caucus, which has been sent over the country as a reply to the address of the seceders. But it is not reported that, in reply to that appeal from my colleague, I urged him to offer those resolutions—announcing to him the fact, which every man of sense in the country will recognize as correct, that for Southern Whigs to vote the finality of the compromise was a matter of no consequence at all. We were inviting our northern Whig brethren to meet us upon this platform. The whole country knew the position of the Southern Whigs in reference to those measures.

Mr. CULLOM. In justice to my colleague I will state, in that spirit of kindness which always has existed and I trust always will exist between us, both personally and politically, that my colleague did solicit me to offer those resolutions.

Mr. GENTRY. I did.

Mr. CULLOM. But he said that he had no hope I could get them passed, but should be glad if I met with success.

Mr. GENTRY. I did.

Mr. CULLOM. The reason why I did not offer those resolutions was, that so many Southern gentlemen having retired, I did not choose, as a friend of the compromise measures, to subject them to defeat.

Mr. GENTRY. I confess it is painful to me to be under the necessity of debating a matter like this.

Mr. CABELL. Will the gentleman from Tennessee allow me to make a statement in this connection?

Mr. MEACHAM. I wish to inquire if this debate is in order?

Mr. GENTRY. Oh, yes; strictly in order. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that when the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] proposed to yield the floor to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. GENTRY,] he distinctly asked if there was any objection. None was made; and the Chair therefore decides the gentleman from Tennessee to be in order.

Mr. CABELL. I have but a word to say in addition to what has been said by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. GENTRY,] in relation to those who seceded from the Whig caucus.

It has been stated, that if the gentlemen who retired from the caucus had remained, the compromise resolutions would have passed. That statement has been replied to, in part, by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. GENTRY.] But, in this connection, I wish to state, that at the first caucus which assembled, the chairman, in reply to an interrogatory from me, said he would rule out of order any proposition, whatever it might be, saving that of fixing the time and place for holding the Convention. During the interval which transpired between the first and second caucuses, it was intimated that the chairman had changed his purpose in that respect. When the second one assembled, I rose and asked the chairman, or, rather, intimated to him, that it had been stated he would change his purpose in this respect. In reply to that suggestion, the chairman stated to me, and the caucus, that his opinions were unchanged, and that he would rule every proposition out of order except that for fixing the time and place for holding the National Convention.

I deem this statement one of some importance, for the reason that, in the official publication of the proceedings of that caucus, it is stated that the chairman decided that he would receive the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GENTRY] as a substantive proposition, though he would not receive it as an amendment. I know not from whom the statement comes; but it is not altogether truthful. It does not state the whole truth. It omits to state the declaration of the chairman in reply to me, and others. I distinctly made that point, and the chairman told me, as other members of the caucus will bear me witness, that his opinions had undergone no change, and that I was mistaken in that respect.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will not reflect upon what the gentleman has said, but I say, upon my responsibility as a gentleman, and as the secretary of that meeting, that the very words of the chairman were reported in that statement.

Mr. STANLY. I concur in that statement, distinctly.

Mr. CABELL. I do not mean to say that the chairman did not use the language. I do not know what he might have said to others. I only state what he said to me. He used no such language in my presence, but just the contrary.

Mr. CHANDLER. I did not understand the gentleman to make that distinction.

Mr. CABELL. I left the caucus, and I do not pretend to say what transpired after I left. I only speak of what the chairman said in reply to myself. He distinctly stated that he would rule everything out of order, save the proposition to fix a time and place for the Whig National Convention, and then I retired from the caucus. I do not pretend to say what might have taken place after that.

Mr. GENTRY. I can explain that matter satisfactorily.

Mr. CABELL. Before this matter goes further, I desire to say that I do not mean to impute any false statement to the secretary or officers of that caucus. I only stated what was the declaration of the chairman in reply to the suggestion made by me, and that this important declaration, or announcement of the chairman, has been withheld in the official report of the proceedings of the caucus.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask the gentleman to yield me the floor for one moment. I regard it as devolving upon me to corroborate the statement made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CHANDLER.] I recollect very distinctly, that the chairman of that meeting announced unequivocally and repeatedly—over and over again—until I thought he was lowering his dignity by such repetition, that the resolutions of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GENTRY] and the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] could not be entertained as amendments, but that they might be entertained as substantive propositions.

Mr. GENTRY. A small mistake there.

Mr. DOCKERY. I recollect distinctly that the chairman stated it about the time the gentlemen were leaving the caucus, for, let me remark, my position was a peculiar one; I voted with those who left the caucus, against sustaining the decision of the chair. But as the decision of the chair was sustained, I declined to retire from the caucus, believing that I could best serve my constituents, and the South, by remaining there and voting and battling to the end.

As some of these gentlemen rose to go, I insisted that they should remain, and adopt the plan of the chairman by offering the resolutions as substantive propositions, believing that they would be stronger, when untrammelled by the rules of order by which the caucus was governed. The rules of the Senate had been adopted for the government of the caucus, and I believed that if the resolutions were submitted as independent propositions, when they could be supported upon their own merits, and not as amendments subject to the rules of order, they would be much stronger. This was at the time those gentlemen were leaving—I mean some of them, for they did not all go out at the same time. I think, however, gentlemen who were there, will sustain me in saying that they were invited to remain and vote upon the resolutions as substantive propositions, but they refused to do so.

Mr. OUTLAW. I ask the gentleman to allow me to say a single word.

Mr. GENTRY. I have but a few words to say, and then I will yield the floor. I desire to state the facts in this case myself; and fearing that my friends may fall into an unnecessary collision, I insist upon my right to the floor. I am anxious that the facts should be made to appear as they really occurred. I feel quite confident that when I state the facts in relation to the matter, no one present on that occasion will attempt to controvert them.

I have not the slightest suspicion that any gentleman has intended to make untrue statements in relation to this matter; but, you know, Mr.

Chairman, that there is a great deal in the manner of stating a truth, as to the impression to be produced by the statement.

Now, here is the fact: The Chairman never did in any way revoke his first decision, which was, that anything beyond the mere matter of fixing the time and place for holding the National Convention would be beyond the legitimate powers and duties of that Congressional caucus; and that it would be a usurpation of power which had not been delegated to them by the people. But it is also true, that when I pressed my resolution upon him with some degree of vehemence, he, responding, I dare say, somewhat prompted by the kind feelings he entertained towards me personally—although he would not be inconsistent with himself, and reverse his decision, he nevertheless said that it would be competent for the meeting, if it should so choose, after it had disposed of its legitimate business, to entertain that proposition, and that his own personal wishes were in favor of such a result.

I said that I saw gentlemen upon the other side were beginning to be sleepy, and that by the time we had resolved ourselves into a kind of debating society upon the resolutions offered by my friend from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] and myself, gentlemen would begin to have an appetite for their beds. [Laughter.] I dare say we might have passed the resolution. But it would have been passed by Southern votes with the help of those few Northern gentlemen who were willing to cooperate with us. The Senate Chamber would have presented but a "beggarly account of empty boxes," and another fraud would have been played upon the country like that played at the beginning of this session of Congress, and which has been made conspicuous by the votes of members who acted in that caucus, upon the resolutions recently offered to the consideration of this House by my friend from Georgia, [Mr. HILLIER.] Oh, that caucus resolution! I beg gentlemen to excuse me from speaking upon that subject. [Great laughter.]

Gentlemen say, that if those of us who retired from the caucus, upon the proceedings of which my colleague has animadverted, the resolution offered in that caucus by my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL] or that offered by myself, would have passed. I affirm, in reply, that if passed at all, it would have passed by Southern votes—Northern members being absent, or present with a mental reservation, as seems to have been the case in the Congressional caucus at the beginning of this session of Congress.

Now, there is the whole of it. These resolutions were ruled out of order by the chairman, and that ruling was sustained by the meeting, both upon my resolution and that offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL.] It is also true that the chairman did say, that after we had got through with the legitimate business of the evening, if we chose we could resolve ourselves into a debating society, and discuss the subject. [Laughter.] But it is still further true, as I said, that as soon as we had resolved ourselves into such debating society, gentlemen would begin to get very sleepy, and there would have been no one left but ourselves. That would have been the practical effect of the whole matter. The great object in introducing that resolution was to get Northern Whigs to meet Southern Whigs upon a principle of action which we deemed to be important to the peace and harmony of the country and the preservation of the Union, and an indispensable means of maintaining the unity of the Whig party as a political organization extending over the whole country, North and South.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman allow me to make one more remark?

Mr. MEACHAM. I rise to a question of order. [Cries of "No!" "No!" "Go on!"]

Mr. MEACHAM. I desire to know whether the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GENTRY] has a right to let out the floor to whom he pleases?

Mr. GENTRY. It all comes within my hour, and I imagine I am entitled to that.

Mr. DOCKERY. Since this Whig caucus is assuming some importance in the country—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will allow the Chair to state, that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] has no right, under the rules, to take the floor, yield it for another gentleman to make a speech, and still retain it for himself. When, however, the gentleman asked the floor for that purpose, the Chair announced that it could only be done by unanimous consent, and there was no objection, and the gentleman from Tennessee was therefore recognized by the Chair. Upon this ground the Chair must overrule the point of order raised by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MEACHAM.]

Mr. GENTRY. If I am trespassing upon the indulgence of the gentleman from North Carolina, I will yield now.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Not at all. I only wish to retain the floor.

Mr. DOCKERY. If the gentleman will allow me, in connection with this subject, I wish it to be distinctly understood by the House and the country, that my friend from Florida, [Mr. CABELL,] upon the meeting of the first caucus, moved that the rules of the Senate be adopted for the government of that body; which motion was agreed to.

Now, sir, some of us, who are not very well versed in parliamentary law and the rules of the Senate—who never have been, and probably never will be, members of that distinguished body—yielded to the opinions of those who explained that, according to the rules of the Senate, this amendment was out of order, not being germane to the original proposition fixing merely the time and place for the meeting of the convention. Well, I again repeat what I said before—however it may differ from the opinion of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. GENTRY]—that it was distinctly announced that this question might come up, not in a debating society, as the gentleman from Tennessee would have the House believe, [laughter,] but in the then organized caucus, as a substantive proposition—

Mr. GENTRY, (interrupting.) And entertained by the meeting if they chose—

Mr. DOCKERY, (resuming,) and entertained by the meeting if they thought proper. [Laughter.] He ruled it out of order as an amendment to the original proposition, intended to carry out the purpose for which the caucus assembled, but not as an independent substantive proposition. As such he, in effect, decided that it might be entertained. Several members of the meeting insisted upon the seceders remaining there, and submitting as substantive propositions those which had been ruled out as amendments, when they would vote for them with those who subsequently professed to be their only true friends.

Now, sir, let me submit one question, and I will yield the floor. In matters where we disagree to some extent, who is likely to best understand the question at issue—those who remained there all through until the adjournment, or those who left before the meeting had progressed half through, and occasionally, after being absent a while, returning to the door and peeping in and listening, to ascertain what was going on—perhaps some of them walking in a step or two and retreating? and indeed, there is a rumor out of doors, that one of those distinguished gentlemen who left, was part of his time with BILLY SEWARD, taking a drink of grog. [Laughter.] Now, how could he know what was going on, as well as those who remained in the meeting?

Mr. GENTRY. I suppose that it is true, that one of my friends, waiting for me to come out, did in his peripatations around and about the Senate Chamber, meet with the distinguished Senator referred to by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. DOCKERY,] who was ensconced in an ante-chamber, receiving reports from his adjutants and directing the course of the war. [Laughter.] I thank my friend from North Carolina [Mr. DOCKERY] for the allusion. It is an important one, and suggestive of grave reflections to the people of this country.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from North Carolina, as I am the person to whom he alludes, as having taken a glass with the Senator from New York, what is his purpose in dragging such an incident of private intercourse into this discussion?

Mr. DOCKERY. I will answer that it was from no disrespect to the honorable gentleman from Kentucky; but as we are gathering all the incidents of the evening, I thought to mention this also.

Mr. MARSHALL. Degustibus, non, &c. I have only to say that greatly as I disagree from the Senator from New York upon questions which I deem essential to the peace of society and the harmony of the States, I have never ceased to accept from him the amenities of social life. I meet him in the social circle and in the social walks of life, without permitting political opinions to interfere. Every gentleman possesses the right, I believe, without arraignment, to regulate his social walks and conversation, and I exercise that right to suit my own taste. I suppose this passage was produced to show to the country that while I differ toto caelo from the Senator from New York, the breach had not become fatal, as I still was willing to indulge in his company, in one of the commonest occurrences at Washington. [Laughter.] In a word, I found the Senator from New York unexpectedly, at an unseasonable hour of the night, so fixed as to keep apart from the caucus, and yet to direct and command its operations unseen, so far as he could do so through the instrumentality of his friends; and, after I was separated from it, we took a drink. Should he invite me, under equally embarrassing circumstances to himself and his friends, I should drink with him again. [Laughter.] The member from North Carolina is entitled to the benefit of all he can make out of this new point in parliamentary debate.

Mr. CLINGMAN claimed the floor.

Mr. GENTRY. I hope my friend from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] will indulge me yet a moment longer. I understood the Chair to decide that my friend from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] had, by his courtesy to me, lost his right to the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not so decided.

Mr. GENTRY. Then I fear that my misunderstanding of the decision of the Chair has caused me to abuse the courtesy of my friend.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Not at all—not at all.

Mr. GENTRY. I must ask him to permit me to make one additional remark. My colleague [Mr. CULLOM] made a remark in relation to those who retired from the Congressional caucus, which grates harshly upon the ear of a Tennessean. He spoke of those who ran away from that caucus. Tennesseans are not in the habit of running away, and nothing could be more unpalatable to them than such an imputation.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to disclaim any personally offensive imputation against my colleague, or any gentleman who acted with him.

Mr. GENTRY. I feel well assured that my colleague is candid in his declaration. I am equally candid in declaring that it is not, and has not been, my purpose to impute unpatriotic or disloyal purposes or motives to him. But I must say that, according to my comprehension, paradoxical as it may seem to be, those who ran away were they who stood most firmly to their duty, and those who did not "run away" were most wanting in true soldiery.

Mr. Chairman, I repeat what I said at the outset of my remarks—it is not my intention to make a speech to-day. In due time I will discuss fully and freely the important questions embraced in the speech of my colleague. Before I conclude, however, permit me to remark, that I do not read the political signs of the times as sanguinely as my colleague, [Mr. CULLOM.] He seems to see nothing but bright skies and tranquil prospects. To my view dark clouds are gathering in the political horizon. The compromise measures, which passed with so much difficulty, and designed to restore harmony to a distracted country, will be bereft of healing power, unless both of the two great parties into which the country is divided shall so place their candidates and shape their organizations for the approaching presidential election as to exclude from the canvass agitation having for its object the repeal or modification of any of those measures.

It is not enough that a presidential candidate may be believed to have been favorable to the enactment of those measures, and himself individually in favor of maintaining them. A far greater question is, by what influences he is surrounded? What counsels, what influences will control the political organization upon which he relies for his election? And what influences will decide the policy of his administration in the event of his success? The public interests demand—the peace of the country, the safety of the Union require not only that he shall be publicly and unequivocally pledged "to regard the compromise measures as a final settlement of the dangerous questions they embraced," but that the political organization upon which he relies for election shall be of such a character as to wield all the influences of a presidential canvass directly in favor of reconciling the minds of the people, North and South, to the acceptance of those measures as a final adjustment of the sectional controversies which made their enactment a public necessity. These are the conditions upon which alone my humble support will be accorded to any presidential aspirant at the next election.

Mr. HASCALL next obtained the floor, and addressed the committee for one hour on the subject of the compromise measures and in opposition to them, and in favor of the establishment of an agricultural bureau. His speech will be found in the Appendix.

Mr. CLINGMAN resumed the floor.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman from North Carolina yield me the floor for a moment.

Mr. CLINGMAN. My friend from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] asks the favor of a moment, and I yield to him the floor.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I rise to a question of order. It is whether it is competent for any one member of the committee to hold the floor for an hour, and single out gentlemen from the committee whom he will permit to occupy that hour?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that it is not in order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to raise another point of order.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Does the time consumed on the points of order come out of my hour?

The CHAIRMAN. It does not. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RICHARDSON] will state his point of order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN,] by yielding the floor to other gentlemen to occupy it, the Chair deciding it to be out of order, has lost his right to the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would have decided in the first instance, had the question been made, that the gentleman could not yield the floor to any gentleman to make a speech; but the question was distinctly put to the committee whether there was any objection to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] yielding to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. GENTRY.] No objection was made, and the arrangement was consented to by the committee, and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] now claims the floor, and is entitled to it.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Under that I will answer briefly the question put to me by my friend from Florida, [Mr. CABELL.] It is in relation to this point of order. But three or four minutes are left me before the expiration of my hour, and in half that time I can answer that question, and then make my motion. I understood Mr. Mangum, both in the caucus and since—and I have had several conversations with him—to say this, in substance: He regarded everything which did not relate to the time and place of holding of the National Convention, as out of order, both as an amendment and as a substantive proposition; but he also declared that, after that matter was disposed of, if this motion was made, and if a majority of the caucus saw fit to entertain it, they might, and he hoped they would do so; but he should be obliged to hold that it was not in order if the point were made. He would, however, appeal to them, and, individually, would be gratified, if the majority would consent to act upon it, and decide it. I understand this to have been his position all the while.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in relation to those who, it is said, ran away from the caucus, I beg leave to say, that we left there very few from the South; only one representative from the State of Delaware, one representative from Missouri, and several from Tennessee, Kentucky, and North Carolina. There were five of the slaveholding States which had representatives there. But there were ten States which, after we left, had not a single representative; and it appears, therefore, that this proceeding of fixing the time and place of holding the convention, was consummated by representatives from only one third of the slaveholding States, as well as by only one fourth of the Whig members from those States. And I say, further—having still a minute left—to the gentleman from Tennessee, that, unless the convention shall come up to the position of the seceders, its nominee will not be able to carry the electoral vote of one State from the Potomac to the Rio Grande. Whether we are few or many, I say, boldly, that those who concur with us, and sustain us among the people, will cause him to lose every single electoral vote in the Southern States.

I took the floor, originally, to make a motion that the committee rise, and I now appeal to gentlemen to let us rise, stop this debate, and get through the territorial business. We can do so in one day's sitting, and then we may go on to the consideration of the general business.

Mr. HOUSTON. And take up the appropriation bills, which are urgently pressing for action.

Mr. STANLY. I hope the committee will not rise until four o'clock, by which time this discussion may be finished.

Mr. CLINGMAN. My object is to stop the debate, and then move that the House again resolve itself into committee, in order to dispose of this territorial business.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I give notice to gentlemen who intend to indulge in irrelevant debate on these territorial bills, that I shall endeavor to get the floor upon every bill, move that the committee rise, and offer a resolution that debate be instantly closed.

The question was then put upon the motion that the committee rise, and it was disagreed to.

Mr. GREY obtained the floor.

Mr. PARKER. It is growing late, and, with the gentleman's permission, I move that the committee rise.

Mr. GREY. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I raise the point of order that the committee having just refused to rise, and no business having been transacted since, it is not now in order to submit the same motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order raised by the gentleman from Ohio, and decides that the motion that the committee do now rise, is in order.

The question was then put upon the motion that the committee rise; and there were, upon a division—ayes 65—

Mr. STUART. I appeal from the decision of the Chair, that it is in order to make two successive motions to rise.

[Cries of "Too late!" "Too late!"]

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order for the gentleman to appeal while the House is dividing.

The negative being counted, there were—noes 35.

So the committee agreed to rise.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman [Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee] reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly House bill No. 134, being a bill to authorize the Governor of New Mexico to call an extra session of the Legislative Assembly, should the same be deemed necessary and expedient; and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move the usual resolution for the termination of debate upon the bill No. 134, five minutes after the House shall again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. ORR. Put it one hour after the House goes again into committee.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will make but a single observation. We have but four days after to-day to dispose of the whole territorial business. Tomorrow there will be no session; and unless I adopt the course which I propose, but few of the bills will be passed during this week, and Congress for the consideration of the territorial business will not set apart another week. I make the motion which I do very much against my inclination, knowing that I am trenching upon the time of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. GREY.] If an hour is given upon each bill for discussion—as there are some thirty of them—we will not be able to pass more than five or six at the utmost; and I give notice now of my intention to move to terminate debate upon every one except the last one, upon which I trust the gentleman from Kentucky will obtain the floor, to submit his remarks.

Mr. ORR. Is it in order to amend the resolution by moving to strike out five minutes and insert one hour in its stead? The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GREY] is entitled to the floor, and the original resolution, in my opinion, operates as a fraud upon him.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will modify my motion, and embrace all the other bills.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remind the gentleman from Illinois that he cannot apply his resolution to any bill which has not been under consideration in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will, then, move my resolution be modified as the gentleman from South Carolina suggests. This need not be taken as a precedent, as I mean to move to close the debate upon the balance of the bills as soon as may be.

The question was then taken, and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. HAMILTON asked and obtained leave to withdraw from the files, for the purpose of laying before one of the Executive Departments the papers in the case of Thomas F. Harkness.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understood this morning that when the House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, that there yet remained a special order before it. I presume the special order was made at the instance of the gentleman from Tennessee. Action having been had upon that subject, however, there will be no objection, I suppose, to that special order being rescinded, so that it will not be in the way of the action of the committee hereafter. It will now require a motion every time we go into Committee of the Whole to pass over that special order to reach other business. I therefore, if it is in order, move that that special order be rescinded. It is in relation to the homestead bill, which has been already acted upon.

Mr. COBB. I hope my friend will not do that, as I intend attaching an important measure to it.

Mr. HOUSTON. With great respect to the gentleman, I must insist upon my motion, unless some proper objection is urged. It is impossible to get along with the public business until we clear these things out of the way.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands, that when the bill, commonly known as the homestead bill, was made the special order, there were two bills before the House, and both were included in the special order. One has been disposed of, and the other is bill 84, to encourage agriculture, and for other purposes. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] now proposes that the order of the House, making this the special order, shall be rescinded, and the bill be laid upon the table.

Mr. JOHNSON. Let the motion be to reconsider the special order.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is too late. I move to rescind and lay on the table.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the order was rescinded, and the bill laid upon the table.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution, terminating debate upon House bill No. 134, was passed, and to lay that motion upon the table.

The question was then taken, and it was agreed to.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I ask the unanimous consent of the House for leave to withdraw the papers of Captain Levy from the files of the House, in order that they may be referred to a committee who have the same subject in charge in the Senate.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

Mr. CLARK. I wish to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill No. 55.

If gentlemen will hear me for one moment upon the subject—

A MEMBER. What is the bill?

Mr. CLARK. It is a bill providing for the sale of certain salt springs in Iowa.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I object to the bill until I know something about it.

Mr. CLARK. I wish to inform gentlemen as to the contents of the bill, and if they will listen to the reading of the bill—

Mr. LETCHER. I object.

Mr. McMULLIN. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. CLARK. I believe I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa is not entitled to the floor. He had the resolution read for information, and the Chair then stated that the gentleman could make his statement as to the purport of the bill by unanimous consent. There was objection to his making that statement—

Mr. CLARK. I wish to proceed further. I move a suspension of the rules to enable me to introduce the resolution.

Mr. McMULLIN. I now move that the House adjourn.

Mr. ASHE. I rise to a privileged question. I wish to know whether the Committee on Elections cannot report now, and whether it would not take precedence of any other motion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot conceive that it is a question taking precedence of the motion to adjourn.

Mr. McMULLIN. I withdraw my motion for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it cannot be made at this time, because there is a privileged motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. McMULLIN. Then I insist upon my motion.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The one is a question of privilege, and the other a privileged question. The question of privilege overrides the privileged question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stands corrected.

Mr. DAVIS. I offer the report of the minority of the Committee on Elections in the matter of the contested election from the eleventh district of Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. That is not a privileged question. It is a question of privilege to permit a minority to report, and if there is no objection the report will be received.

There being no objection, the report was read by the Clerk, and ordered to be printed.

On motion, the House adjourned till Wednesday next at twelve o'clock m.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi, gave notice that he would ask leave to introduce a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to ratify and confirm an exchange of lands between the United States and Charles Reynolds, of the city of Natchez and State of Mississippi.

PETITIONS, &c.

The following petitions, memorials, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. PARKER, of Indiana: The petition of John Yaryan, S. W. Hill, and seventy odd others, citizens of Union, Wayne, and Randolph counties, Indiana, praying for a tri-weekly mail route from Liberty, via Centerville, to Winchester.

By Mr. FITCH: The petition of A. Van Voorst and others, citizens of White county, Indiana, asking for a mail route therein named.

By Mr. BRAGG: The petition of citizens of Mississippi, Louisiana, and Alabama, praying an appropriation to open the bar at the mouth of Pascagoula river, on the Gulf of Mexico.

By Mr. ROBIE: The petition of citizens of Bath, Thurston, Addison, and Cameron, New York, praying the establishment of a post route from Bath, by way of John S. Dupue's and Noble H. Rising's, in the town of Thurston, to the post office at West Addison, Steuben county, New York.

By Mr. BISSELL: A memorial adopted at a public meeting of the citizens of Upper Alton, Illinois, praying the enactment of a law providing for the settlement of the Territory of Nebraska.

By Mr. IVES: The petition of A. Ford and 150 others, citizens of New York, praying aid in the construction of a railroad from Sackett's Harbor, in said State.

SENATE CHAMBER, May 19, 1852.

To the Editors of the Globe:

In casting my eye cursorily over a part of the debate in the House, in the Daily Globe of this date, in relation to the congressional caucus, I find many discrepancies and some errors. The Journal of the proceedings, republished in the National Intelligencer, is correct and exact upon every material point that was raised. The Chair ruled both Mr. MARSHALL's and Mr. GENTRY's resolutions out of order, as amendments to the resolution offered by Mr. STANLY. The Chair, however, decided to receive Mr. GENTRY's resolution as a substantive proposition, if it should be so offered—not Mr. Marshall's, which could be received only by the assent of the majority of the meeting.

The reason of the discrimination in the mind of the chairman was, that Mr. GENTRY's purported to construct no platform for others, but simply to define the position of those supporting it. Mr. MARSHALL's went further, and, in the opinion of the Chair, was inadmissible, on the ground of assuming to construct, in part, a political platform, which the Chair deemed as in no extent warrantable by the usages of the Whig party, but a naked usurpation of power properly exercisable only by the people, or their representatives in National Convention.

Mr. CHANDLER's statement, as sustained by Mr. STANLY and others, is entirely accurate.

Your obedient servant,

WILLIE P. MANGUM.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, May 19, 1852.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the Senate, inquiring what further provision for the settlement of accounts connected with the Mexican contribution fund is necessary to authorize proper and just compensation to be made for services in relation thereto; which was read and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. FISH presented a memorial of citizens of New York city, praying that the public lands may be granted in limited quantities to actual settlers; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. RUSK presented documents in relation to the claim of James Myer, late of the Mexican Boundary Commission, for balance of salary and expenses of transportation from New Mexico to the United States; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BRIGHT presented the following joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Indiana; and it was ordered that they be laid on the table and printed:

In favor of a modification of the bounty land law.

In favor of the adoption of measures for the suppression of the African slave trade, and the promotion of the colonization of free people of color.

In favor of the construction of a ship canal around the rapids of the St. Mary's river.

In favor of the establishment of an Agricultural Bureau.

In favor of an appropriation for the erection of public buildings in the city of Indianapolis.

Mr. SEWARD presented the petition of the heirs of Nathan Weeks, a lieutenant of the Revolution, who was killed in action, praying for the pay due him and the seven years' half pay due his widow and children; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Also, seven petitions of citizens of the State of New York, praying that the bill now pending before Congress, granting to every man who is the head of a family and a citizen of the United States, one hundred and sixty acres of land, may become a law; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SUMNER presented the petition of last-makers in Massachusetts, praying a modification of the patent laws; which was ordered to be laid on the table.

Also, a petition of workmen of Boston, praying that the bill now pending before Congress, granting to every citizen of the United States, who is the head of a family, one hundred and sixty acres of land, may become a law; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WALKER presented a petition of citizens of the United States, praying that the bill now pending before Congress granting to every citizen of the United States, who is the head of a family, one hundred and sixty acres of land, may become a law; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WELLER presented the joint resolutions of the Legislature of California, in relation to volunteers who served in California during the late war with Mexico, and the payment of claims for private property taken for the public use; which were ordered to be laid on the table and printed.

Also, a joint resolution of the Legislature of California, relative to the levying and collecting a tonnage duty for hospital purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a joint resolution of the Legislature of California, in favor of the establishment of a branch Mint in that State; which was ordered to be laid on the table and printed.

Mr. GWIN presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, in favor of a change in the time of meeting of the electors of President and Vice President in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed. The great extent of that State was the reason given for desiring a postponement to give time to collect the vote.

Also, joint resolutions of the Legislature of California, in relation to contracts for the transportation of the mails between Panama and San Francisco; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, presented the memorial of John Cripps, praying to be allowed a pension for services in the war of the Revolution; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, the petition of Joseph Robinson, praying a grant of land for his services in the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Also, documents in relation to the claim of Noah Smith to a pension, for services during the war of the Revolution; which were referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. MALLORY presented an additional document in relation to the claim of Kennedy and Darling; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SMITH presented the memorial of A. Miles & Son, alleging that they are creditors of Texas, and praying the payment of their debt by the General Government; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

PETITIONS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. BROOKE, it was Ordered, That the petition of John Crawford, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

On motion by Mr. GWIN, it was Ordered, That the petition of Jonas P. Levy, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. FOOT presented additional documents relating to the claim of Dr. Avery Downer; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. FOOT, it was Ordered, That the report of the Committee on Pensions on the same subject, be recommitted to the same committee.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. JONES, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the petition of Christopher Knowlton, praying a pension for wounds received during the last war with Great Britain, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the petition of Thomas Thurston, owner of the schooner Wanderer, praying to be allowed the fishing bounty, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief, which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Printing, to which was referred a motion to print ten thousand copies of the report of the Committee on Military Affairs, accompanying the bill to repeal the several acts organizing the staff departments of the Army therein mentioned, and to provide for the discharge of the duties thereof by a detail of officers of the line, in octavo form, in connection with the bill, reported in favor of printing two thousand five hundred copies of the same; which was agreed to.

Mr. GWIN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the petition of Thomas Copeland, praying remuneration for improvements in machinery in the Gosport navy-yard, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the memorial of Richard M. Johnson, of Kentucky, praying compensation for losses incurred by him by reason of his impressment into the service of the United States, in the late war against Mexico, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to which were referred resolutions of the Common Council of New Orleans in relation to the establishment of a navy-yard and naval dépôt at New Orleans, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof, and that the resolutions be printed; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred a report of the Secretary of the Navy, containing the proceedings of the court of inquiry in relation to the loss of the United States steamer "Edith," charges of Lieutenant Craven against Commodore Jones, and of Commodore Jones against Lieutenant Craven; and correspondence in relation to the erection of a saw-mill at San Francisco, and in relation to the appointment and transportation of Lieutenant Meade and other officers for the steamer "Edith," from Boston to the Pacific, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill for the relief of Richard W. Meade, reported it back without amendment, accompanied by a report; which was ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. MALLORY, it was Ordered, That the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, on the petition of J. T. Page, be printed.

Mr. FOOT, from the Committee on Pensions, to which were referred the following petitions, submitted adverse reports thereon; which were ordered to be printed:

Petition of Elliot F. Penny, a soldier in the last war with Great Britain, praying a pension.

Petition of Sarah F. Gowell, widow of a soldier in the last war with Great Britain, praying a pension.

Petition of citizens of Waldoboro', Maine, praying that the pension now received by Conrad Hyer may, at his death, be granted to his grandson.

Petition of Sarah Smith, widow of a soldier in the Army, praying a pension.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of John Hazen, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BERRIEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the petition of James Chapman, administrator of Thomas Chapman, praying one fourth part of the proceeds of the cargo of the brig "Diana," condemned for violating the non-intercourse laws, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the memorial of Benjamin S. Roberts, of the Army, praying to be allowed the pay and emoluments of a lieutenant of dragoons from the time he was discharged from the Army to the time when he was appointed a lieutenant of mounted riflemen, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. GEYER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred a petition of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying that the introduction of convicts, felons, and paupers into the United States may be prohibited, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMS, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the memorial of J. Smith, praying indemnity for a steam-vessel lost in the employ of the United States, submitted an adverse report thereon.

Mr. FELCH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill granting a right of way and a portion of the public lands to the State of California, to aid in the construction of a railroad from the city of San Francisco to the city of San José, in that State, reported it back with an amendment.

On motion by Mr. GWIN, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole; and the reported amendment having been agreed to, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. CLEMENS, by unanimous consent, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to extend the provisions of an act approved the 3d of March, 1847, and the act approved the 26th of February, 1849, for carrying into effect the existing compacts with the States of Alabama and Mississippi in relation to the five per cent. fund and the school reservations; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives was received, announcing that it had passed a resolution changing the name of St. Peter's river, in the Minnesota Territory.

PORTS OF ENTRY AND DELIVERY.

Mr. HAMLIN. There is a bill reported by the Committee on Commerce regulating the collection districts for the Territory of Oregon; and as this is the week in which territorial business comes up in the House of Representatives, I ask the indulgence of the Senate to pass over the prior orders and take up that bill this morning, so that it may be considered by the Senate and sent to the House to be considered by the House along with other territorial business. I apprehend that it will take but a very few minutes to dispose of it.

Mr. HUNTER. What is the character of the bill?

Mr. HAMLIN. It is a bill to authorize the President of the United States to designate the places for the ports of entry and delivery for the collection districts of Puget's Sound and Umpqua, in the Territory of Oregon, instead of the places where they now are.

The motion to postpone the prior orders was agreed to; and the bill having been read a second time, it was considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that the President of the United States be authorized to designate the places for the ports of entry for the collection districts of Puget's Sound and Umpqua, in the Territory of Oregon, upon receiving satisfactory information as to the best location for said ports, instead of the places now established by law in said districts, respectively.

Mr. HAMLIN. It was found, on establishing ports of entry in that Territory, that it was impossible to fix them in places which would not be affected by the influx of population. It was therefore deemed advisable by the Committee on Commerce, to place discretionary power in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury, so as to designate the ports as the wants of the country should require. I am also directed by the Committee on Commerce, to offer a second section to the bill, regulating the salaries of the collectors in these districts. I offer this section as an amendment to the bill.

The additional section was read, as follows:

Sec. 2. Be it further enacted, That the salary of the collector of customs for the district of Oregon, in the Territory of Oregon, shall be and hereby is fixed and established at $3,000 per annum, with fees and salary in the aggregate not exceeding $5,000. And the salary of the collector of customs for the district of Puget's Sound and Umpqua, respectively, shall be fixed and established at $2,000 per annum, with fees and salary not exceeding $3,500, which salaries shall continue in force for the term of six years.

Mr. HAMLIN. These sums correspond with the sums paid to the collectors in the smaller ports in California. The matter was submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, and these sums were fixed upon on his recommendation. The sums thus proposed seem satisfactory to the committee. The amounts the collectors have heretofore received, have not been sufficient to pay their expenses; and they have had to live upon their own means in discharging the duties of the Government. The time during which these sums are to be paid is limited to six years, at which time it is hoped there may be such a change of things in that country as to permit a reduction of these salaries. The bill limits the power to that time; and, when it has expired, if it be found necessary to revive the provision regulating these salaries, it can be revived; and if not, then it will die by its own limitation.

The additional section was adopted.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and the amendment made by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole was concurred in, after which the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

THE DEFICIENCY BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1852," the question pending being upon the amendment of the Committee on Finance, as it has been amended, as follows:

For additional compensation for increasing the transportation of the United States mail between New York and Liverpool, in the Collins line of steamers, to twenty-six trips per annum, at such times as shall be directed by the Postmaster General, and in conformity to his last annual report to Congress, and his letter of the 15th of November last to the Secretary of the Navy, commencing said increased service on the 1st of January, 1852, at the rate of $33,000 per trip, in lieu of the present allowance, the sum of $236,500: Provided, That it shall be in the power of Congress, at any time after the 31st day of December, 1854, to terminate the arrangement for any additional allowance herein provided for.

Mr. HUNTER. The honorable Senator from Michigan, I believe, desires to submit some remarks in relation to the proposed appropriation for payment of the citizens of Alabama and Georgia for depredations committed by the Creek Indians. I would therefore ask the Senate, by general consent, to lay aside the amendment in relation to the Collins line of steamers, and take up the other; and I hope that when it is taken up, we may come to a vote upon it.

Mr. SEWARD. I hope it will not be taken up.

Mr. BORLAND. I would say to the Senate, that day before yesterday, when the amendment in relation to the Collins line of steamers was taken up, it was done by laying aside informally the amendment which the Senator from Virginia now proposes to take up. The Senator from Michigan had the floor at that time upon the amendment mentioned by the Senator from Virginia. It was, however, laid aside informally, and the amendment relating to the Collins line of steamers was taken up out of place, and I made my remarks upon it. I then supposed that the amendment on which the Senator from Michigan is now prepared to speak would come up as a matter of course.

The PRESIDENT. It cannot come up except by unanimous consent. Does the Senator from New York adhere to his objection?

Mr. SEWARD. Yes, sir; I do.

The PRESIDENT. The pending question then is upon the amendment relating to the Collins line of steamers.

Mr. BORLAND. I should be very sorry to inflict another speech upon the Senate on this question so soon after having consumed so much of the time of the Senate during two other days; but, if the friends of this proposition are determined to force it on the Senate, and on the country, to the postponement, and, perhaps, the exclusion, of the necessary and proper features of the deficiency bill, they ought not to feel aggrieved if those who believe that it is not only wrong in itself, but that it is out of place in this bill, should occupy some of the time of the Senate in offering their objections to it, especially since it has been advocated at such length, and so elaborately, by them.

I think I can say, with entire confidence in the truth of the statement, that, if the friends of this proposition had not discussed it at such length themselves—had not advanced such views in support of it—and had not made it so prominent a subject of discussion by the Senate, and before the country, those who are opposed to it would not have consumed so much time, perhaps would hardly have spoken at all, in replying to their arguments. They have forced this subject, and its elaborate discussion, on the Senate. They have done so, to the interruption of the general business of the country. We had before us the items of a deficiency bill, asked of us by the Administration, who are charged with the execution of the laws of the country; and we are told it is indispensable that it should be speedily passed, in order that the regular business of the Government should go on. And yet the friends of the Administration—those who tell us the same thing with regard to the business of the country, and the operations of the Administration, and the necessity of speedy action—have brought forward a subject in connection with the bill, have tacked on to it a matter that has not one feature of a deficiency in it. Instead of making it a mere amendment to the bill, it has swallowed up the bill itself, and has taken its place. Instead of a little more than $2,000,000, or, perhaps, $3,000,000 to be provided for by the bill, as it came from the House of Representatives, this amendment itself proposes to appropriate little less than $7,000,000; and thus makes, altogether, an appropriation of some $10,000,000 that we are called upon to pass! They will not permit even those features which properly belong to the bill, and which constitute a deficiency, to be acted upon. However reluctant, therefore, I may be, to occupy the time of the Senate upon any subject, I feel it due to myself, and to my constituents, when it is proposed to take $7,000,000 out of the Treasury of the United States, for what I believe to be an improper purpose, to state, as fully as they may occur to me, the objections which I think lie to the proposition, and which I think should defeat it.

Sir, I am quite unwilling to occupy the time of the Senate this morning, because I supposed it was the general understanding, that the Senate would hear the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. Cass;] and I know that he has come with his notes and papers, for the purpose of presenting his views upon the proposed Indian appropriations.

Besides, I think there has never been an instance before, when a Senator, in the position in which the Senator from Michigan stands, who declined the other day to present his views then, in order to allow the friends of a particular proposition to bring it up, as the friends of the Collins line do with that measure, and who was then refused the courtesy of the Senate to proceed with his remarks when he desired to do so. I would greatly prefer that the honorable Senator from Michigan would go on, and that the Senate would hear him now, since he is prepared to address us to-day. I think it is due not only in courtesy, but in strict justice. If, therefore, the Senator from New York, or those who, with him, urge this measure upon us, will withdraw their objections, and agree that the Senator from Michigan shall go on, I will not inflict a speech upon the Senate at this time. I hope the Senator from New York will consent to the laying aside of the pending amendment, with a view to give the Senator from Michigan an opportunity to go on.

The PRESIDENT. This is not a question between the two Senators.

Mr. SEWARD. I understand that the honorable Senator from California, [Mr. Gwin,] the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, who is an able and earnest advocate of the amendment relating to the Collins line, and whose vote is deemed necessary for it, is obliged to leave town this evening. The amendment will, therefore, lose his vote, if the question is not taken to-day. Having made this explanation, I cannot now—without discourtesy not only to the honorable Senator from Arkansas, for whom I entertain a high respect and very sincere regard, but also to the distinguished and venerable Senator from Michigan, [Mr. Cass]—insist on my objection to the motion to lay the subject of the steamers aside for the present. I will, however, express the hope, that when the honorable Senator shall have concluded his speech on the Indian question, the honorable Senator from Arkansas will not insist on further debating the amendment concerning the Collins steamers in committee, but will allow the question to be taken to-day; and that the honorable Senator from Arkansas will be kind enough, in consideration of the peculiar circumstances, to reserve his further expression of his views upon the Collins line, until the time when the amendment shall have been reported from the committee to the Senate, as the same question exactly will then come before the Senate. I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. BORLAND. Does the Senator withdraw his objection? I am not sure that I heard the remarks of the Senator from New York very distinctly.

Mr. HALE. His remarks were very complimentary to you.

Mr. BORLAND. Did the Senator make it a condition, that I should not present my views until after the vote is taken?

Mr. SEWARD. I proposed no conditions. I withdrew the objection without conditions.

Mr. BORLAND. I move, then, that this amendment be passed over informally, and that the amendment relative to Indian depredations be taken up, with a view to allow the Senator from Michigan [Mr. Cass] to address the Senate.

No objection being made, the motion of the Senator from Arkansas was concurred in, and the question was stated to be upon the amendment of Mr. BELL, as amended, to insert the following:

For payment to the citizens of Alabama and Georgia, for depredations committed by Creek Indians upon their property, and for other property taken by the troops of the United States, and friendly Creeks, in the years 1833 and 1837, $355,797; to be distributed according to the schedule returned by the commissioners appointed under the act of Congress approved March 3, 1837.

Mr. CASS addressed the Senate at some length. His speech will be found in the Appendix.

Mr. BELL replied at considerable length. His speech will be found in the Appendix.

Mr. GWIN. Mr. President—

Mr. CASS. Will the Senator from California allow me to say a few words?

Mr. GWIN. I have to say that I am in some degree responsible for the amendment in regard to the Collins line. It has been under discussion for several weeks, and as I must leave town to-morrow morning at six o'clock, I should like very much to have the vote taken upon it to-day.

Mr. CASS. I only want to ask that these documents which I have may be printed with my remarks. I want to dispose of them, and I never want to touch the subject again.

Mr. MANGUM. Will the honorable Senator from Michigan suffer me a moment to occupy the floor?

Mr. CASS. Certainly.

Mr. MANGUM. These contested points affect a past Administration which is now in its grave; and nobody feels any interest in the points which have been made. The acts of this Administration have been disinterred by the eloquent gentlemen during the last week; but I think it would be better to defer this discussion until some future Gibbon shall write the history of the decline and fall of the Republic. Such a matter may be interesting to posterity, but it seems to excite very little interest in the minds of gentlemen who are present. Let us postpone this discussion for the present, and vote upon the other question. These gentlemen may conduct this contest as long as the siege of Troy. Until either the one party or the other is annihilated, the contest will still go on; and looking to the vigor of both gentlemen, intellectually and otherwise, there is not much prospect of their bringing this discussion to a speedy termination. I trust the Senate will vote on the amendment in relation to the Collins line of steamers.

Mr. CASS. If the Senate will give me ten minutes, I will dismiss the subject. All I want is, to get my documents introduced, so that they can be published together.

The honorable gentleman then proceeded and concluded his argument.

Mr. CLEMENS. Mr. President—

Mr. BELL. I wish to say a single word in reply, if the Senator from Alabama will permit me.

Mr. CLEMENS. I would willingly do so, but that I am under a promise to the Senator from California, to make a suggestion which I think is due to him. I think he is entitled to the courtesy which has been denied to him to-day. I hope, therefore, that this amendment will be passed over until to-morrow, for the purpose of enabling him to vote upon it. He is compelled to leave here, as he has told the Senate, at six o'clock to-morrow morning, and I promised him—feeling myself, perhaps, more interested in the amendment than anybody else—that I would make this suggestion. I hope, therefore, that the Senator from California will be gratified in his request. I hope the amendment will be laid over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT. No motion can be made to lay the amendment over until to-morrow; but it can be passed over by unanimous consent.

Mr. DAWSON. I dislike to interpose any objection; but I consider the vote of the Senator from California as important to be passed upon this measure, knowing him to be friendly to it, as upon any other proposition connected with the deficiency bill. If the votes are to be taken upon the two amendments, I would prefer that they should be taken upon them in the order in which they now stand; first, upon the proposition to pay these claims; and I consider them to be as justly due as any deficiency which may exist in relation to the Collins line. I think that the vote of the Senator from California is as important to do justice to the claimants under this amendment, as it will be to increase the compensation of the Collins line.

Mr. BELL. I beg leave to waive all privilege of reply to the honorable Senator from Michigan. I only intended to read one or two sentences in addition to the evidence I have already adduced, to show that the warnings to the Government to which I have alluded, were commenced in March, 1836. But I waive all privilege of reply for the purpose of allowing the vote to be taken now.

The PRESIDENT. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Georgia to object to passing over this amendment?

Mr. DAWSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. GWIN. I hope the Senator will permit me to say a word in explanation of the reason for the request which I have made of the Senate.

Mr. DAWSON. I have understood the reason why the Senator asks us to take up the other proposition, and I am perfectly satisfied with it, only that I desire to have the aid of the Senator from California in doing an act of justice to those people who have been oppressed in this way; and I am unwilling to let him go until he votes upon both propositions.

Mr. GWIN. The Senator from Georgia entirely mistakes the position which I occupy in regard to this amendment. He has no right to presume that I am going to vote for it, for I have not so stated to the Senate. I was chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which the subject of increasing the compensation of the Collins line was referred; and under the instructions of that committee, I introduced into the Committee on Finance the amendment in regard to that subject. I therefore feel that degree of responsibility which every member of this body should feel in bringing a proposition of such importance before the Senate, and wish to be present when the discussion is closed and the vote taken upon it. It has been under discussion for weeks, and I have not spoken more than ten minutes on the subject. I am generally here very punctually; but inasmuch as it is a matter of necessity for me to leave here to-morrow, I merely wish to have an opportunity of seeing that a question which is in some degree under my charge is disposed of. For that reason I desire to have a vote on it. I am very willing to vote on the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee; but the Collins amendment was first in order, and was put aside for the purpose of bringing up that proposition. I hope it will be restored to its proper place.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair cannot entertain any motion unless by unanimous consent. The pending amendment cannot be passed over but by unanimous consent.

Mr. DAWSON. I desire to have the question on the pending amendment.

Mr. RUSK. I have a proposition which I wish to make, and it is this: Both these subjects have been largely discussed, and if we can get a vote upon the proposition before us now, we can also get a vote on the other. It is not yet four o'clock, and I understand Senators are ready to vote upon the amendment with regard to the Collins line. I hope we shall take the vote on the pending amendment, and then on that question. I hope the Senate will sit until we do get a vote.

Mr. BELL. I wish to make a remark, somewhat in the nature of a personal explanation. A gentleman has sent me a note, stating that I possibly did injustice to General Jesup in my remarks, by saying that he had authorized the friendly Indians to take the property of the whites. I did not say so. I wish to disavow any such remark. I said that it was impossible for the officer in command—and the officer himself said so—to discriminate between property which belonged to the whites and property which belonged to the Indians. Although General Jesup did not authorize the troops and friendly Indians to take the property of the whites, yet the consequence was, that all the property in the neighborhood—all the wild cattle and stock that could be had, was taken, and the white settlers suffered. This was so, although General Jesup did not authorize the troops and friendly Indians to take the property of the white settlers.

Mr. CHASE. Mr. President, I wish to state very briefly the reasons which will govern my vote upon this amendment. I should have been very glad if the Senate had thought fit to postpone the question, in order to accommodate the Senator from California. But, as so large a portion of the discussion has been confined to matters which seem to me to be totally irrelevant to the real merits of the question before the Senate, I think it right that a few moments, at least, should be devoted to the questions which are actually involved.

Mr. RUSK. I wish to make another appeal to the Senator from Georgia to withdraw his opposition to the proposition to postpone this amendment. I do not believe that we now can take the vote with strict justice to these claimants.

Mr. DAWSON. I understand this matter, I think, perfectly well. This amendment is a question which is now before the Senate, and if it is desired to be discussed, let it be discussed; but let it keep its precedence as it now has it. Let us not take the question upon another proposition, and then fall back and take the vote upon this afterwards. I prefer that we should take the vote upon the two propositions as they now stand. If we keep both before us we shall have a full house to decide them, and get a full vote, and have the views of the Senate expressed more fully on both propositions.

Mr. CHASE. I have not the slightest disposition to consume the time of the Senate, as every Senator knows, and I should be extremely glad if the honorable Senator from Georgia would withdraw his objection. It seems to me to be due to the Senator from California, that it should be done. The amendment in regard to the Collins line of steamers stood first in order, and was set aside by general consent, for the accommodation of the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. BORLAND,] who was not prepared to proceed with his remarks, in consequence of sickness. It was an indulgence to that Senator—an indulgence which is always granted by the courtesy of the Senate—which gave the amendment which has been proposed by the Senator from Tennessee its present position. I repeat to the Senator from Georgia, that I shall be extremely glad if he will withdraw his objection, and permit the proposition in regard to the Collins line of steamers to be taken up and acted upon.

Mr. DAWSON. When the bill shall be reported to the Senate, the whole matter will be entirely within the control of this body, and the speech of the Senator from Ohio can be as well delivered then as now; whether it be for or against this appropriation. I am not stubborn, nor do I generally interpose; but when I see two propositions before this body at once, and understand the relation which one bears to the other, I am disposed to occupy a position which, I think, will subserve justice on both sides.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will have to interfere with the consumption of time upon a subject which is not before the body.

Mr. CHASE. I am not aware of any relation which exists between these two questions; I trust there is none. I trust the Senator from Georgia is altogether mistaken in the intimation which he has thrown out, that there is any connection between these questions. What connection can there be between them?

Mr. DAWSON. I referred to the number of Senators that we should have in the body. I thought that if both questions occupied the attention of the Senate, we should have a pretty full attendance, and that a fair vote could be taken.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will have to interfere again, and say to Senators that the subject matter properly under discussion, is the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee. It cannot be set aside but by unanimous consent, to take up any other proposition.

Mr. CHASE. I shall, then, state, very briefly, the reasons which govern my vote, and I shall not speak at any length. I do not see that the discussion which has occupied so much of the time of the Senate as to the policy of the administration of General Jackson in relation to the Creek hostilities, has anything whatever to do with the question which is presented by this amendment. Whether the policy of that Administration was wise or otherwise, it cannot affect, as it seems to me, in the slightest degree, or ought not to affect in the slightest degree, the decision of this body on the question which is now presented to us. What is the naked, simple question before the Senate? It is, shall the Government of the United States pay the sum of $355,000 for alleged depredations committed by the Creek Indians upon the property of persons in Alabama and Georgia? That is the naked question. That is the whole question presented. It is simply, shall the Government of the United States pay that sum as indemnity for depredations committed by the Creek Indians upon the property of the citizens of those two States?

Now, what principle is invoked as the ground upon which this payment is to be made? It is said that these depredations were not committed during the existence of a state of war. That is a matter which is controverted. It is a matter, as it seems to me, of no moment whichever way it may be settled. The agents who were instructed, under the act of 1837, to inquire into the amount and character of these depredations were instructed to report them in three classes. In the first class, they were instructed to enumerate those claims which came within the provisions of the act of 1816, claims which might arise in a state of war. In the second class, they were instructed to report the claims which arose under the Indian intercourse act. And in the third class, they were instructed to report generally depredations committed by the Indians upon the property of the citizens. They reported certain claims within the first class. I think the aggregate of them was something like $25,000. They were claims for which, in the opinion of the commissioners, the Government of the United States was responsible under the act of 1816. Under the second class they reported no claims at all. And, under the general head of Indian depredations, they reported a number of claims amounting to about a million and a quarter of dollars. The amount which they thought it would be proper to allow is the precise amount which is fixed in this amendment. This report was made in 1837. In 1838 it was brought to the notice of Congress, and, in the other House the present Comptroller of the Treasury, Mr. Whittlesey, then at the head of the Committee on Claims, made an elaborate report, examining the evidence, examining the principles, and disallowing the claim. That report, I believe, was concurred in by the House. From that time to this the question has remained in that state.

Mr. President, it seems to me somewhat extraordinary that a claim of this character—an old claim—pressed upon the attention of Congress—reported against, and perhaps also reported favorably upon, should be pressed here as an addition to a deficiency bill, already large in its amount, and, in fact, enormous and unprecedented in its amount. I am a little surprised that the friends of the Administration should desire to press into this deficiency bill an amount of this magnitude, when it is already swelled beyond all former precedent. At the same time, if the claim is well founded—if it is supported by principle, I should not, for that reason alone, withhold my vote from it. But, as I have already said, it is not within the principle of the act of 1816. It is not claimed to be within it. It is not within the principle of the intercourse act, although it is claimed to be so. I will, in a very few words, show the grounds of the opinion which I now express, that it is not within the principles of the intercourse act.

The intercourse act is not a recent one. The act of 1834, it is true, has been chiefly referred to in this discussion, but the principles of the intercourse act are almost as old as the Government. The act of 1796 contains the same identical principle which is contained in the act of 1834. What is that principle? Why, the Government of the United States draws a line, by which it separates from the Territories of the States the Indian country. Within that Indian country the tribes, and the General Government, exercise exclusive jurisdiction. The tribes are all under the tutelage of the Government, and it becomes the duty of the Government to exercise over those tribes within its own Territories constant supervision and superintendence. The object of the Government is to prevent depredation by those tribes; and in order to effect that, it has legislated, from the beginning of our Indian policy, so as to make the tribes responsible for those depredations. If an Indian, passing out of the Indian country, or within the limits of the Indian country, where he is under the jurisdiction of the United States, commits a depredation upon the property of a citizen, the mode of redress is pointed out by the statute. Proof of the individual claim is to be made. Then a demand for the amount is to be made upon the Indian tribe. If payment is refused, the amount is to be withheld from the annuities due the tribe. In the ultimate event the Government guarantees the payment, but it does not guarantee the payment in any case where the individual so injured seeks private revenge. The object of all these enactments is to prevent the exercise of private revenge, and to maintain a rigid and constant supervision over the Indian tribes within the Territories of the United States. But never in any case, from the commencement of the Government up to this time, has the Government made itself responsible for depredations committed within the limits of any State. The reason for this is obvious. Within the limits of a State, the State authority is supreme and sovereign. In the Territories the only sovereignty to which an appeal can be made is the sovereignty of the United States. Within the limits of the States the duty of protecting the citizen devolves upon the State. Within the limits of the Territories the duty of protecting the citizen devolves upon the Government of the United States. But even there the United States does not seek to protect the citizen, except by its general legislation, and as a part of its general Indian policy. There is, therefore, as it seems to me, no ground whatever for saying that this claim comes within the principles of the intercourse act. If it does not fall within the provisions of the intercourse act, where does it fall? I desire that Senators shall consider for a moment what they are about to do when they vote for an amendment of this character.

I know of but two principles upon which this amendment can be successfully vindicated; and if they are wise principles of legislation, and of governmental policy, this amendment can be sustained; but if they are not wise principles, this amendment cannot be sustained. Is this Government responsible for bad legislation? If it is, then the amendment can be sustained. Is this Government responsible for bad administration? If it is, then this amendment can be sustained. If you show that there has been bad legislation, and bad administration, then you must prove that these are cases in which the Government ought to be responsible. These are the principles upon which this claim must be sustained, if it is sustained at all. Where would this principle lead us? It would lead us to the doctrine of assuming all the consequences of all the acts of legislation which may be adopted by Congress. If you repeal a tariff act, or reduce the tariff upon particular articles, injuries flow from that legislation. Great losses arise from such causes. Is the Government responsible for them? It is responsible, in my judgment, if it is responsible for these depredations.

Again: is the Government responsible for injuries which result from the general policy of the Government? It seems to me that the honorable Senator from Tennessee has argued this case as if it were. He has said that this treaty was unwise—that it necessarily led to the results which have been witnessed; and having led to these results, that the Government is responsible for the consequences. Then, if we are responsible for the consequences of this Indian treaty, we are responsible for the consequences of every treaty that we negotiate. We negotiate treaties with foreign Powers by which the interests of our citizens are largely affected. I will not individualize instances, because they will occur at once to the mind of every Senator. We can hardly negotiate any treaty where the results will not be injurious to somebody. Every treaty that we make—all legislation that we enact, turns the accustomed course of policy, and you cannot change the policy of a great Government and mighty people, without inflicting individual injury in some instances; but it has never been heard of till now that for these injuries the Government was responsible.

Mr. President, this question has been presented here again and again. It was presented by the constituents of my friend from Iowa, and my friend from Wisconsin, when they suffered so largely from the depredations of the Indians in the Black Hawk war; but this Government did not indemnify them. It was presented in the case of claims for Indian depredations in Michigan, but the Government refused to indemnify in that case. Uniformly, at all times, has the Government refused to sanction claims of this sort. It seems to me, therefore, that as these depredations do not fall within the principle of the act of 1816, as they do not fall within the principle of the intercourse law—as they must be vindicated, if they are vindicated at all, upon a principle which will open the doors of the Treasury so wide to claims of every description, that you may well cease to pass all deficiency and all appropriation acts—(for you will have no money left to appropriate)—we ought to pause before we adopt the proposition of the honorable Senator from Tennessee.

32D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, MAY 21, 1852.

NEW SERIES.....No. 88.

Mr. BRADBURY called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and being taken, resulted—yeas 20, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Berrien, Borland, Brooke, Clemens, Dawson, Downs, Foot, Geyer, Gwin, Houston, Jones of Tennessee, King, Mallory, Mangum, Morton, Rusk, Sebastian, Seward, and Upham—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Bradbury, Bright, Chase, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Felch, Fish, Hamlin, Hunter, James, Jones of Iowa, Mason, Norris, Pearce, Shields, Smith, Spruance, Stockton, Sumner, Wade, Walker, and Weller—24.

The PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment of the Committee on Finance, as amended, to insert the following:

For additional compensation for increasing the transportation of the United States mail between New York and Liverpool, in the Collins line of steamers, to twenty-six trips per annum, at such times as shall be directed by the Postmaster General, and in conformity to his last annual report to Congress, and his letter of the 15th of November last to the Secretary of the Navy, commencing said increased service on the first of January, 1852, at the rate of $33,000 per trip, in lieu of the present allowance, the sum of $236,500: Provided, That it shall be in the power of Congress, at any time after the thirty-first day of December, 1854, to terminate the arrangement for any additional allowance herein provided for.

Mr. WADE. The two Senators from Pennsylvania wished me to announce to the Senate that they have paired off on this subject. Mr. COOPER, if he were here, would vote for the amendment, and Mr. BRODHEAD would vote against it. They wished me to state this fact to the Senate.

Mr. ADAMS called for the yeas and nays on the amendment, and they were ordered.

Mr. CHASE. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment. It is to add to it the following:

And provided further, That the proprietors of said line of steamers shall consent to such a modification of the existing contract that the Postmaster General may advertise for and accept, under any future legislation of Congress, proposals for carrying the mails in steamships between the United States and Great Britain from and after the said 31st day of December, 1854, when the said contract shall cease to be obligatory.

Mr. GWIN. I appeal to the Senator from Ohio to withdraw his amendment. He can bring it forward after the bill shall have been reported to the Senate. I do not see any particular objection to his proposition, but it can be as well offered then as now.

Mr. CHASE. My only object in offering the proposition was to put the amendment into such a shape that I could vote for it. I hoped that it would meet with the acceptance of the friends of the amendment. But after the suggestion of the Senator from California, I shall withdraw it for the present, though I shall be obliged to vote against the amendment of the committee in its present form.

The PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. BORLAND. It was my purpose to have made a few remarks upon this amendment before it should be adopted; but I see a disposition in the Senate to vote on it now, and I am unwilling to defeat that wish, or postpone the gratification of it, especially as I have unfortunately been the cause of some delay already. I have, however, an amendment to offer to it, and some further remarks to submit, which I shall take occasion to offer and to submit when the bill shall be reported to the Senate.

Mr. MALLORY. Before the vote is taken I desire to say that, to oblige the honorable Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] who is now absent, I have paired off with him.

Mr. CASS. I mentioned before that I wished to have the amendment so modified as to terminate the contract on the 1st of January, 1854, instead of the 31st of December of that year. Did I understand the Chair to intimate at the time that such a proposition would not be in order?

The PRESIDENT. Such a proposition would not now be in order; but it will be in order when the bill shall be reported to the Senate.

Mr. BELL. I desire to sustain this line; but I am inclined to think that I shall not vote for the amendment, in its present shape, when it comes into the Senate. I understand that an attempt will be made to modify it in the Senate. I wish to sustain the line by some reasonable and proper appropriation. I wish merely to say to the Senate, that although I shall vote for the amendment now, I do not commit myself to vote for it in the Senate, unless a modification shall take place in its terms.

Mr. DAWSON. I wish to take this occasion to state, that any vote that I may give now under the implied understanding, for the gratification of one of our fellow-members, that we should vote to-day, is no pledge in relation to the manner in which I shall vote when the proposition comes into the Senate, where it can be altered or modified. I am not in favor of the amendment as it now stands, but I vote for it now in order to keep the proposition before the body, so that we can have more time to deliberate upon it, when we come to act in the Senate.

The question being taken by yeas and nays upon the amendment, resulted—yeas 23, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Berrien, Bright, Cass, Dawson, Downs, Fish, Foot, Gwin, Houston, James, Jones of Iowa, Mangum, Miller, Norris, Pearce, Rusk, Seward, Shields, Smith, Spruance, Stockton, and Upham—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Borland, Bradbury, Brooke, Chase, Clemens, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Felch, Geyer, Hamlin, Hunter, Jones of Tennessee, King, Mason, Morton, Sebastian, Wade, Walker, and Weller—21.

So the amendment was agreed to; and, on motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 19, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. SIBLEY. I believe there are no reports from committees this morning on territorial business. I move, therefore, that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I beg to make this single remark in addition. The House have set apart one week for the transaction of territorial business. Two days of that week have passed by, and nothing has been effected. I do not propose to interfere with the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. GREY,] who has the floor in committee; but I wish that there should be a general understanding in the House, that so soon as that gentleman shall have got through with his speech, the debate upon the territorial business shall be confined to matters which are relevant.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask the gentleman to withdraw his motion for a moment, until I make a report.

Mr. SIBLEY. I withdraw it.

Mr. FAULKNER, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to which was referred the memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, asking for said Territory the grant of $50,000 to enable it to open a wagon road from Santa Fé to the valley of Taos, made an adverse report thereon; which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. FAULKNER, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Thomas Jefferson, relative to a military and agricultural school in the Territory of Nebraska, &c.; and that the same be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WILDRICK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported, as correctly enrolled, the following bills:

H. R. 205. "An act to regulate the mileage of the Delegate from the Territory of Oregon."

H. R. 219. "An act to authorize the Legislature of the State of Mississippi to sell the lands heretofore appropriated for the use of schools of that State, and to ratify the sales already made." The bills severally received the signature of the SPEAKER.

A message was here received from the Senate, by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, Esq., its Secretary, informing the House that they had passed House bill No. 217, entitled "An act to legalize certain entries of public lands made in the State of Florida."

Mr. SIBLEY. I now renew the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the special order.

Mr. HALL. If the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be voted down, I would inquire what would be the regular business in order?

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business, which is the report of the Committee on Printing.

The question was then taken, upon Mr. SIBLEY's motion, and it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee, in the chair.)

LEGISLATURE OF NEW MEXICO.

The CHAIRMAN. The business first in order is Senate bill No. 134, authorizing the Governor of the Territory of New Mexico to call an extra session of the Legislative Assembly of said Territory, should the same be deemed necessary and expedient.

Mr. GREY, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the committee an hour in regard to the action of the Whig Congressional caucus upon the subject of the compromise measures. [His speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. The time has now arrived for action upon this bill, and I propose to amend it by striking out "ninety days," and inserting "sixty days". I desire to say, in relation to that amendment, that the Territorial Committee deem sixty days to be long enough for the Territory to hold a called session of the Legislature; in fact enough for their regular session. There is this difficulty in that Territory, which does not exist in any of our other Territories, and occasions the necessity for the passage of this bill, now under consideration, amended as I propose to have it—

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. With the permission of the gentleman from Illinois, I want to correct an error into which he has fallen. The amendment which the committee itself proposes, is ninety days. The original proposition was six months, as appears by the bill itself. The gentleman has forgotten that this bill was reported by the committee several months ago; and, latterly, they have had under consideration the question to extend the time of the regular session, which, as the gentleman has said, is sixty days.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand the gentleman from Illinois proposes an amendment to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I wished to correct the error into which the gentleman from Illinois has fallen. He said that the committee were in favor of sixty days. He is mistaken; ninety days is what the committee have recommended. The object of the bill was to give us one long session, to enable us to draw something like order out of the great confusion that prevails there growing out of the frequent changes which have been made, the military government superseding the Mexican government, and the territorial government superseding that, to say nothing of the side-blow that Texas gave us.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will correct the misapprehension into which I suppose I have fallen. I believe I was not present when this bill passed the committee. I recollect that when this subject was up in relation to the time of their regular session, they agreed then that sixty days was long enough. I will state to the gentleman, and to the House, that they can have this called session sixty days preceding their regular session, and run it to one hundred and twenty days, and if they cannot make laws sufficient with what we give them to govern the Territory, no time that we can give the Legislature will be sufficient. I doubt very much whether they will better, during the time they continue in the territorial state, the laws under which they live. Some of them need amendment, no doubt. I was proceeding to state, when I was up, that there was a necessity why this Territory should have more time to transact its legislative business than our other Territories, and it arises from this fact: The proceedings of the Legislature are carried on, necessarily, in two languages, the Spanish and the English. Interpreters have to be had, when a motion is made by those who speak the Spanish language alone, to interpret it into English, so that both may understand what the proposition is. When a proposition is put for the action of the legislative body, it has to be stated in both languages. It takes more time, consequently, to transact their business than our other Territories.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must remind the gentleman that the Committee on the Territories have reported an amendment to strike out six months and insert ninety days.

Mr. RICHARDSON. To that I propose an amendment to insert sixty days.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Ninety days is the recommendation of the committee, and sixty days the individual recommendation of the gentleman from Illinois, who is the chairman of the Territorial Committee. I hope that his amendment will not prevail.

Mr. STUART. The Committee on Territories considered this subject with a great deal of care, and were very clearly of the opinion that ninety days were necessary. The bill as introduced and referred to the committee, asked for six months. The Delegate representing that Territory furnished some very strong arguments to show that six months were necessary; but the committee decided—and I think with considerable unanimity—that is, of the members present, as the honorable chairman [Mr. RICHARDSON] was not present—from an investigation of the facts which the Delegate brought to their attention, that three months were necessary in order to enable that Territory to consummate their duties. The main difficulty consists in the fact that their territorial assembly is composed partly of members speaking the Spanish and partly of those speaking the English language. So that an interpretation of the speeches is necessary before they can be understood or replied to by gentlemen in that Legislature. I trust that the committee will not adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. RICHARDSON], but permit the bill to stand as it is.

The question was then put upon the amendment of Mr. RICHARDSON to the amendment of the committee; and it was not agreed to.

The question then recurred upon the amendment of the committee, to strike out "six months," and, in its stead, to insert "ninety days;" and it was agreed to.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

MILITARY ROADS IN OREGON.

The committee next proceeded to the consideration of House bill No. 187, being "A bill for the construction of military roads in Oregon Territory."

Mr. FLOYD was recognized by the Chairman as being entitled to the floor.

Mr. RICHARDSON. With the gentleman's permission, I will give the notice—

Mr. FLOYD. I yield for a moment to the gentleman, but not my right to the floor.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am satisfied, in my own mind, that discussion with regard to the politics of the country will continue; but I now give notice to the gentleman from New York, who has obtained the floor, of my intention, as soon as he departs from the discussion of the question immediately before the committee for consideration, to raise and insist upon the point of order that such debate is irrelevant and improper. I will press the point, and have a vote of the committee upon it.

Mr. CARTTER. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. FLOYD then commenced giving his views on the subject of slavery, and presenting the northern view of the subject; when

Mr. CLINGMAN said: I rise to the question of order that this discussion is irrelevant. Ordinarily I would not have raised this point, but at the present time I deem it to be my duty to appeal to the Chair to decide, whether or not this discussion is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the discussion is not in order; and, if the point is insisted upon, the Chair will be compelled to enforce order.

Mr. FLOYD. It is no more out of order than that which was indulged in by others, on these territorial bills.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I do insist upon it.

Mr. CARTTER. From the decision of the Chair I appeal.

Mr. POLK. Why not allow the gentleman from New York to enjoy the same privileges that others have in debate?

Mr. CLINGMAN. I objected, during our last session, to this kind of discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina makes the point of order, that the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FLOYD] are not germane to the subject-matter of the bill now under consideration, and therefore out of order. The bill provides for an appropriation to construct certain roads in the Territory of Oregon. The gentleman from New York has been discussing questions of slavery and the general policy of the country. The Chair decides, and would have decided at any time, had the point been raised properly, that, under the rules of the House, this debate is not in order. From this decision of the Chair, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTTER] appeals. The question then is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

Mr. CARTTER. I will make the simple inquiry of the Chair, whether he did not decide that this description of debate was in order, on the occasion of the point of order being raised on the gentleman from New York, [Mr. KING] by the gentleman from Illinois? [Mr. RICHARDSON.] Did not the Chair then announce that it was in order, in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to discuss matters pertaining to the Union? And, I will further inquire, has not that been the uniform practice?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois called the gentleman from New York to order before he had advanced to the substance of his speech. He had stated at the commencement that he intended to discuss the compromise, so far as it related to the Territories. It was impossible for the Chair, at that time, to see what relation the gentleman's remarks would have to that particular bill, and he pointed to a clause in the bill which made reference to one of the particular measures embraced in the compromise, to which the gentleman from New York said his remarks would be addressed. The Chair then decided that he was in order, stating distinctly that it was because the gentleman had not advanced far enough in his argument to enable him to decide what its nature would be. If the question had been presented in the shape it is now, the decision of the Chair would then have been the same as it is now. It is very easy for the committee, if they are disposed to indulge this latitude of debate, to overrule the decision of the Chair.

Mr. DEAN. I would like to make an inquiry. Has not such latitude always been permitted, and would it not be in order to move to allow the gentleman to proceed?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will reply that sometimes these things have been permitted, and at other times they have been refused by the committee. I have known many instances in which the decision of the Chair has been sustained, and others in which it has been overruled.

Mr. HOUSTON. My recollection, however, is—and I have no more disposition to cut off the gentleman from New York [Mr. FLOYD] than any other gentleman—that the days which have been appropriated by special order of the House to territorial business, have never been consumed in this rambling, general debate. I do not understand that they have ever been; and while I regret—

Mr. CARTTER. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am in order. I do not propose to—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not in order.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not propose to debate it further, except with this addition. If the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FLOYD] and if members of the committee will adhere to the rules as decided by the Chair, we will soon get through this territorial business, pass these bills through the House, and then the appropriation bills will be before us, on which this debate would be in order. It is evident to all of us, that if we persist in a course of this sort—or if we resort to the process suggested by the chairman of the Committee on Territories, of having the committee rise with the view of adopting a resolution to close debate, and then again going into committee when, as each bill is taken up, some one will get up and make an hour's speech; the result will be that the Territories will be excluded from the benefit intended by the special order. If gentlemen will wait but a few days, the appropriation bills, upon which latitude of debate is always allowed, will come up, and can be discussed in a general way. I therefore appeal to gentlemen to let the decision of the Chair stand, and let us go on with the business before us.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to say that I made the point of order upon the gentleman from New York [Mr. KING] the other day, and I was anxious then that this irrelevant debate should be stopped. As he was permitted to proceed, I have not felt that I could with propriety make the point, or press it now. This much I deemed necessary to say, in my own justification.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair feels it incumbent upon him to arrest this debate upon the question of order, as by rule thirty-five he finds that these questions are required to be decided without debate. The question will be upon the appeal.

Mr. DEAN. I ask for tellers.

The question was then taken upon the appeal, (Messrs. WILLIAMS and ROBINSON acting as tellers) and there were—ayes 58, noes 46; no quorum voting.

[Cries of "Call the roll!" "Call the roll!"]

The roll was then called, and the absentees noted. The committee then rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the special order; and having found themselves without a quorum, had caused the roll to be called, and the names of the absentees to be reported to the House.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Report the absentees.

The list of absentees was then read as follows: Messrs. Charles Allen, William Appleton, Ashe, Avrett, D. J. Bailey, Thomas H. Bayly, Beale, Bibbighaus, Bissell, Bocoock, Bowne, John H. Boyd, George H. Brown, Burt, Busby, Lewis D. Campbell, Colcock, Cottman, Daniel, Darby, Dawson, Dinmick, Doty, Dunlap, Edgerton, Edmundson, Freeman, Goodnow, Goodrich, Green, Hammond, Hays, Hascall, Haven, Hebard, Horsford, Thomas M. Howe, Thomas Y. How, Hunter, Ingersoll, Andrew Johnson, James Johnson, Kuhus, Landry, Mann, McCormick, McDonald, McMullin, McQueen, Mencham, Meade, Miner, Henry D. Moore, Nabers, Orr, Andrew Parker, Price, Rantoul, Ross, Russell, Schermerhorn, David L. Seymour, Smart, Smith, Benjamin Stanton, Richard H. The SPEAKER. There being a quorum now present, the committee will again resume its session.

The Chairman of the committee resumed the chair.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am willing that the gentleman shall proceed in his remarks, and if I can obtain the floor upon these bills I will make a motion to limit debate upon all of them to five minutes.

Mr. CARTTER. That is right. We will go for that.

The CHAIRMAN. That can be done by unanimous consent, if there is no objection.

Mr. STANLY. I object.

Mr. CLINGMAN. As it seems to be the general desire, I withdraw the point of order I made, with the understanding that irrelevant debate is stopped after the gentleman from New York [Mr. FLOYD] concludes.

Mr. CARTTER. I withdraw the appeal made.

Mr. FLOYD resumed, and concluded his remarks without further interruption. He said that the number of persons in the North who had any other than extreme dislike to slavery was exceedingly small, and their influence inconsiderable; nor would the citizens of that portion of the country willingly consent to the extension of slavery. They had but one voice on that subject, and that was for the personal and individual freedom of man. He then reviewed the compromise measures, expressed his objections to the fugitive slave law; and in conclusion said, that if the Democratic party should incorporate the compromise measures in their creed as a test, they would meet with disaster and defeat.

[The speech of Mr. F. will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. F. having concluded—

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no amendment to be offered to this bill, it will be laid aside to be reported to the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I intend, before I take my seat, to move that the committee rise. My object is to terminate debate on this bill; and it is my desire to do so on each succeeding territorial bill upon the calendar, as it may come up, so that the matters contained in the bill may be discussed upon their merits under the five minutes rule. I move that the committee rise and report the bill already laid aside to be reported.

The question was then put and the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman of the committee reported that the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union had had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the special order, and had directed him to report to the House Senate bill No. 134, with an amendment, and House bill No. 187, without amendment, with a recommendation that they do pass.

Mr. RICHARDSON. My motion included only one of the bills. The latter bill for the construction of military roads in Oregon Territory has not been discussed.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee, (the chairman of the committee.) I suppose the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RICHARDSON] must be mistaken, as the chairman of the Committee of the Whole expressly asked whether there were any amendments to be offered to that bill, and if there were none, that it would be laid aside to be reported to the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I believe the bill is right, and I think it does not need any amendment. I intended, however, to include only one bill in my motion.

Mr. HOUSTON. It was certainly not understood that the bill, which was last under debate, was to be reported to the House. I expressly asked the question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair only knows the report made by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. STANTON. There is certainly no mistake about it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If there be no objection, I will move to recommit the last bill to the committee again.

The SPEAKER. The first bill will be reported to the House. It is Senate bill No. 134, authorizing the Governor of the Territory of New Mexico to call an extra session of the Legislative Assembly of that Territory, should the same be deemed necessary and expedient. The Committee of the Whole have reported this bill to the House, with an amendment, striking out the words "six months" in the seventh line, and inserting "ninety days." The first question is upon the adoption of the amendment.

The question was then put, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and having been engrossed, it was read the third time and passed.

MILITARY ROADS IN OREGON.

The bill for the construction of military roads in Oregon was next in order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. There is, I believe, no objection to the bill for the construction of military roads in Oregon Territory, although it was not discussed upon its merits in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Almost every other question but that was debated. There proceeds from the Committee on Territories, or any member, no proposition to amend it, so far as I know, and I will, therefore, call for the previous question upon it.

Mr. BROOKS. With the gentleman's consent I will ask him a question. I desire to know whether these roads come here with the recommendation of the War Department, or that of any officers of the War Department; and whether there is any estimate, or anything of that kind? I desire to add, before the answer is made, that hitherto such appropriations for military roads have been included in the army bill. I do not rise to throw any obstacle in the way to the passage of the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will reply that the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ROBINSON,] not now in his seat, reported this bill from another committee than that of which I am a member. The delegate from Oregon understands fully this subject, and with a view to allow him to submit an explanation, I withdraw my call for the previous question.

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman will perceive that the bill, as it stands, is a bill for internal improvements, though ostensibly said to be for military roads. Hitherto, as I have remarked before, such appropriations have been in the army bill. A military road in an army bill is one thing, but a bill beginning a system of internal improvements is altogether another. If these roads come from the War Department, intended to be included in the army bill, I do not see why they should be made an original bill. I wish to be informed on what authority they have been proposed.

Mr. LANE. I think I shall be able to satisfy the gentleman from New York with regard to the provisions of this bill. It was introduced by myself, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals. That committee reported it back, with the recommendation that it do pass.

It is true the bill is not predicated upon any recommendation of the Secretary of War, nor have the committee reported the same upon any other evidence than the representations made by myself, showing the absolute necessity which exists for the appropriation provided for in the bill under consideration. The bill provides for the location and establishment of a military road, commencing at Fort Silacom, on Puget's Sound, north of Columbia river, and terminating at Fort Wallawalla, a distance of not more than one hundred and seventy miles. This road is important as a military thoroughfare, and quite indispensable to the convenience of the citizens of the northern portion of the Territory, as well as emigrants traveling in that portion of the country. Another road, or rather a continuation of that to which I have just alluded, is proposed to be established from Fort Silacom to a point on the Columbia river, some forty miles from its mouth; and this too is necessary for the transportation of supplies for the troops at the fort I have just mentioned. The bill now before the House further provides for opening a road from the mouth of Myrtle creek, on the Umpqua river, to Camp Stewart, in Rogue River Valley. At or near this point troops designed for the protection of the emigrants on the frontiers of the Territory will, in all probability, be stationed. If a garrison is established there, (and I have no doubt there will be,) the construction of this road will be found indispensable for military purposes. The country through which these roads pass is exceedingly difficult of access, and the appropriations proposed to be made by this bill are, in my opinion, demanded not only for the military uses I have specified, but are essential to the convenience of a large portion of the people I have the honor to represent here.

Mr. HOUSTON. That bill came into the House from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union more by a misunderstanding than anything else. I was aware that it was a bill making appropriations for the construction of roads in the Territory of Oregon, and I inquired of the chairman at the time the vote was about to be put upon the motion that the committee rise, whether this bill was to be reported or not. He told me that this bill was not to be included in his report. I stated that if this bill was included in the report, I should interpose objection. Now it turns out to be—

Mr. RICHARDSON. There was a misapprehension between the chairman of the Committee of the Whole, [Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee,] and myself. I did not express myself as I had designed to. My object was to report the bill in relation to New Mexico, and when we got into the House to move the termination of debate upon this one in committee, in order, as soon as might be, to bring the committee to a vote upon it, and afford opportunity for the consideration of other territorial bills.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not wish to throw any obstacles in the way of the progress of the territorial business. I have shown throughout that my desire is to proceed with that business as rapidly as we can with safety; but it must be evident that this bill is not before the House in a condition that will justify it in voting its adoption. I trust the Delegate from Oregon will give me his attention for a moment. I understand that the roads to be constructed under the appropriations proposed in this bill have never been surveyed under the orders of the War Department. Am I correct in that assertion?

Mr. LANE. That is so.

Mr. HOUSTON. The Delegate acknowledges the correctness of that declaration. It is true we have in days gone by—but it is a policy to which I have never subscribed, but, on the contrary, have always condemned as an individual member of this House by my vote—prosecuted these roads under the direction of the War Department, after that Department had made the survey of lines and reported to us the estimates and the necessity for them. In this case, as I understand the Delegate from Oregon, it is a bill introduced by himself and carrying out his own views of the wants and necessities of his constituents; but with a view to have the bill meet with the general acquiescence of the House, the Delegate very wisely and very shrewdly placed the expenditure under the direction of the War Department, when in truth and in fact there has never been a survey of the roads, and no order for a survey to be made. There has been no examination of their locality; and we know nothing of the views of the War Department relative to this bill, or the necessity for the construction of the roads proposed in it. If we propose to build military roads under the direction of the War Department, it seems to me but proper respect we owe to the Secretary of War and to ourselves, that we should first authorize an examination and survey to be made, and allow him to report to us the estimates and the necessity for the construction of the roads, and for what purpose they are intended to be used. Upon his estimates and report, the House can then base its action.

Mr. SIBLEY. I wish to correct a statement the gentleman has made, with regard to the general policy pursued in the construction of these roads. I pursued the very same course that the Delegate from Oregon is now pursuing, at the first session of the last Congress. I introduced a bill, granting to Minnesota a sum of money to construct certain roads in that Territory, which never had been surveyed by the War Department, which was referred to a committee, and reported back favorably; but, in accordance with precedent, that money was placed under the charge of the War Department, and the Secretary of War was made responsible for its proper disbursement. I make this statement, to correct the misapprehension of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. HOUSTON. That does not alter at all the principle I have set out with. The gentleman states that he introduced bills in the manner that the Delegate from Oregon has now done, at the first session of the last Congress. That may be so; but the earlier practice and precedents of the Government, I presume, up to the very session when the Delegate from Minnesota introduced the bill to which he alludes, has universally been, that the War Department make its surveys and estimates before the House is called upon to act. What are we now doing? Who, in this House, except the honorable Delegate from Oregon himself, knows the necessity of these roads, either in a local or a military point of view. I ask my friend from Illinois [Mr. RICHARDSON] whether he has not already stated that he did not report this bill, and therefore does not stand responsible for its provisions. I will ask the gentleman who did report the bill, what evidence has he other than the recommendation of the Delegate—whose opinion would go a great length with me—that the construction of this road is necessary in a military point of view? I presume none. We are without information. We are giving to the Secretary of War, for his superintendence, the construction of roads for which he has not asked, and which he does not state are at all necessary. We have no report from him as evidence of a necessity for the construction of these roads. The Delegate here, in the discharge of his duties as a representative of the interests of the people of Oregon Territory proposed the construction of these roads in a bill which was introduced by himself, referred to a committee, by whom it was formally reported back.

Mr. ROBINSON. I regret that I was not present when the gentleman from Alabama alluded to me, and I would beg that he repeat his allusion, that I may, if necessary, make a reply.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not know that I made allusion to the gentleman. The only allusion which could possibly be construed as bearing upon him, if he reported the bill, was my statement, that I presumed the gentleman reporting this bill had no survey, no estimate, no evidence that these roads were needed for military purposes, excepting the recommendation of the Delegate from Oregon, [Mr. LANE.]

Mr. ROBINSON. It is very true that the Committee on Roads and Canals had no estimates from the War Department in reference to these roads. They had no information upon the subject further than their own general knowledge of the wants of that Territory with regard to roads, and the representation of the Delegate from that Territory—a representation, allow me to say, in which the committee placed the most implicit confidence, and upon which they would act with as much judgment and satisfaction as if they had had a dozen estimates from the Secretary of War.

This, if I understand it, is the first appropriation ever asked for that immense Territory—an appropriation of but $50,000, and comprehending three or four different roads. They thought it was not an extravagant demand upon Congress. They thought it, in fact, but a very moderate one, looking to the precedents which they have had before them in reference to appropriations for other Territories—Minnesota, for instance, the last year, and other Territories, from the commencement of the Government down to the present time. I am astonished that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] should raise the objections he has, and that he should desire that Territory to wait the action of the War Department in sending out a corps of engineers to explore that country, who, I undertake to say, and believe, would know far less about the wants of the Territory, and where these roads should be located, than the Delegate from that Territory, who has traveled over it so much, and who represents that people. This is all I have to say upon the subject. I believe the committee were unanimous upon the subject, and not a solitary objection was made.

Mr. BROOKS. My object in calling the attention of the House to this appropriation was not so much to throw any obstacle in the way as to have an understanding of what we are about. I have no doubt that the Delegate from Oregon [Mr. LANE] is as well qualified to speak upon this subject as anybody could be, and perhaps better; but it is necessary, and desirable, if the House are to vote the appropriation, to understand that we vote it upon the authority of the Delegate from Oregon—on his authority alone—and that we ourselves, or the committee who report it, know nothing of the matter, except what comes from the Delegate from Oregon. If the House has that sort of confidence, and I am not indisposed to share it with them, let the responsibility go to the proper quarter, and let the appropriation be considered as coming from that quarter, and no other. I wish, however, to invoke the attention of the House to this deviation from the ordinary mode of procedure; that is, following out the estimates from the Departments before we launch forth in appropriations for roads, especially in distant Territories. There is no certainty that the Delegate from Oregon can tell the House that the $50,000 in this bill will begin to make the roads for which he asks appropriations, because he has had no survey of the routes—no reconnaissance, even. Indeed, he knows nothing of them but from general observation. He has had no calculation submitted to him, no estimates from engineers or other topographical officers; and I venture to say, that the $50,000 appropriated in this bill, and intended for these roads, are but the beginning of a quarter of a million which must follow hereafter to complete them. The roads being established by a law in this bill, further appropriations can be inserted in another appropriation bill hereafter, all in proper order. It is well enough, then, for the country to understand that this is a new mode of doing business here, which the Delegate has introduced. For myself, I have never been able to see the difference between internal improvements for a Territory and internal improvements for a State. I know that there is an attempted metaphysical difference which some persons assume, but in point of fact, the money goes from a common Treasury for both Territories and States to make like roads in both, and they amount to the same thing in substance and in principle, I think. If these be mere military roads, the War Department ought to ask for them, if they ought to be made; and if they be appropriations for internal improvements in Oregon, the Committee on Commerce ought to investigate them, and if a proper object, insert them in their general bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. I supposed that the gentleman from New York, when he interrupted me, desired to make a mere explanation. I do not exactly approve of the plan of this making a speech in the way of explanation.

Mr. BROOKS. I have concluded the remarks which I intended to make. My object was to have an understanding upon the subject, so that we may know how much money is to be paid, from what authority it comes, and who is to be held responsible. These facts the debate has elicited.

Mr. HOUSTON. We have seen already one of the evil consequences of this mode of procedure. There is the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] who, upon a former occasion, as I thought then and I believe now, very improperly endeavored to shift the responsibility from his friends in power, gives us notice in time now, that these appropriations are not to be charged in that quarter. In this instance I agree with him. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] has fallen into a very great error, when he undertakes to say that the judgment of the Delegate from that Territory is to be relied upon as accurately, or more so, than a survey from the War Department. I am not asking specially for an estimate to close the necessary survey. All I desire is, that we shall have a survey; that there shall be a survey, before we are called upon to make an appropriation of this sort. Does the gentleman who reported these, tell us that the appropriations will complete these roads? Have we any evidence how much they will cost?

Mr. LANE. If the gentleman will allow me, I will explain. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] seems to be anxious to defeat the appropriations for these roads, for reasons which no doubt are very satisfactory to himself. But if he could be placed in Oregon upon some peak of the Cascade range of mountains, and look over the country, he would see the absolute necessity which exists for small appropriations, for the purpose of making it possible for the people of that country to pass over these mountains, and for the convenience of our military posts. It is necessary that these roads should be made in both points of view, for military purposes, and for the convenience of our people. If that gentleman could see the emigration passing over these mountains, and see thousands of families with their teams broken down, and mountains before them which they cannot cross, without the sacrifice of a large portion of their property, he might comprehend the necessity of this small appropriation for the purpose of making it possible for these emigrants to pass over that district of country, without this unnecessary sacrifice of their property. It is practicable to make a good road from Fort Walla-Walla to Fort Stilacon, and for this purpose we ask the appropriation of $20,000.

Mr. BISSELL. How many miles is it from Fort Walla-Walla to Fort Stilacon?

Mr. LANE. One hundred and fifty miles that should be opened, so as to make it possible for emigrants who desire to settle around Puget's Sound to pass over that district of country and terminate their journey at Puget's Sound. As the roads are now, emigrants are compelled to travel to Oregon City or Portland, and then two hundred miles from these places to Puget's Sound. I am well acquainted with the topography of Oregon, and I hazard nothing in saying that even with all that we may hope to obtain from the action of the General Government in the establishment of military roads necessary for military purposes during the hours of our territorial infancy, the construction of roads within our country will impose upon our people an amount of taxes no State in the Union has expended for similar purposes; and I understand the feasibility of that which I proposed by this bill fully as well as I could hope to do with the reports of any gentleman who might be sent to survey these roads by the War Department.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I wish merely to address an inquiry to the Delegate from Oregon, [Mr. LANE,] to see if I correctly understand him. He says that he is as well acquainted with this matter, and understands as well the feasibility of the road to be made as any gentleman sent out by the War Department. I wish to ask him whether the sum proposed to be appropriated will be sufficient to finish the road.

Mr. LANE. The appropriations are altogether insufficient to complete the roads, but I believe the sum asked for here, is sufficient to make it possible for people to pass from Walla-Walla to Fort Stilacon, and save a distance of near two hundred miles. In a military point of view, it is absolutely necessary that this road should be made. The other appropriation which I ask for, is for a road from near a point selected as a military post in the Rogue River Valley, Camp Stuart, to the mouth of Myrtle creek, or Umpqua river. That is a section of country over which some of our troops passed, last season, and at a heavy cost of transportation. We have no permanent peace with the Indians there, and a garrison must be established in the Rogue River Valley. We must use the road for military purposes, and for the convenience of military defense in Oregon Territory. I can say to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON,] further, that I have no reason to believe that the Secretary of War will take prompt measures, if an appropriation for the survey of these roads should be made, towards sending out an agent to that country. I recollect that gentleman, the Secretary of War, told me in this House, three months ago, that troops would be sent out this season for the protection of emigrants en route to Oregon; and since that, he has written me a letter, in which he states that he cannot do it; and in my speech, I then stated that I felt confident the Secretary of War would comply with his promise, and send out troops, and my remarks have gone to the country, and upon my assurances, based upon this promise of the Secretary of War, emigrants have started for Oregon, expecting protection on the way. It was the duty of the Government to afford them protection. But no such protection, it seems, is to be afforded them, and the consequences of this neglect upon his part, remains yet to be known. If I had as much confidence that the War Department would, in any event, seek, or even favorably regard, the promotion of the interests of the people of Oregon, as the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] seems to entertain, I would, perhaps, consent to delay this appropriation until the Secretary of War would cause those roads to be surveyed.

I do not think I have ever seen the moment when I would give my consent to appropriate improperly a single dollar of Government money, or to waste unnecessarily, in any way, one cent of the public Treasury. And in this instance, I ask for this appropriation for the reasons I have already stated, and because many petitions have been presented here, asking appropriations for the construction of these roads.

Mr. DEAN. How long will it take to send a Government agent out there to make these surveys, and what will it cost?

Mr. LANE. To send out an agent to survey those roads, and make a report, and then to get the appropriation bills passed through Congress, would require a period of not less than three years.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will say in reply to the question of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DEAN,] which seems to me, I confess, to be rather a queer question, and to be answered in rather a queer way,—that I have no doubt the gentleman from Oregon knows just as much about the time that would be consumed in sending out and having surveys made, as he does about the cost of making the roads without surveys. I have no hesitation in saying, in reply to the very emphatic remark of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ROBINSON,] that I have as much confidence in the representations of the Delegate from Oregon as anybody; but then I have not confidence enough in any member of this House, either from a State or a Territory, to agree to support appropriations, commencing a system of internal improvements when no man can tell whether it will cost ten thousand or one hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yet, you would have confidence in a cadet from West Point.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would have confidence in the Department that has control over the subject of surveys. If the House has not confidence in it, it would be as well, and much better to disband that branch of our military service.

It will not do for us to attempt to justify what I regard as a loose practice of legislation by saying that I have no confidence in the War Department, or its officers. If we have no confidence in them, let us suspend them and be done with it. Why keep up an engineer corps if we have no confidence in what they do? We send them out to survey our rivers. The gentleman from Indiana, I presume, has voted for appropriations to survey rivers preparatory to their being made navigable.

Mr. ROBINSON. I never have done it in my life.

Mr. HOUSTON. Well, if the gentleman has not, other gentlemen have who are quite as reliable as either he or I.

But, sir, I am not opposing this bill upon the ground of want of confidence in the Delegate from Oregon—not at all. That does not come up. But I put it to the House, are you prepared now, even with all the sympathy for the Territories which we all have, and which I have—are you prepared to commence a system of internal improvements at the mere request of the Representative from a Territory?

I understand it to be the practice of the Committee on Commerce—and if I am mistaken, the chairman of that committee can correct me—not to make appropriations for harbors and rivers, and all that class of internal improvements, unless there has been a survey, and estimates accompany that survey.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. With the permission of the gentleman from Alabama, I will say, that so far as my knowledge is concerned on the subject of appropriations for what are termed "internal improvements"—embracing in that term appropriations for rivers and for harbors, and, I will also add, for roads—I believe the general practice has been almost universally to require a survey and an estimate from the Topographical Bureau before the Government has been called upon to enter upon the work. I deem it a judicious and safe practice, and one which ought not, without good reason, to be departed from.

I will, with the permission of the gentleman from Alabama, add that I believe there have been cases of appropriations made for rivers and harbors, where the amount has been very definite, and could be definitely ascertained from the representations that were made to the committee, so that they believed not a very large expenditure would be required, in which, without going through the formality of a survey and estimate, the appropriations have been made. But the general rule is as the gentleman from Alabama has stated.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Oregon himself places this bill upon a ground on which I do not think this House can venture to sustain it, even with what I regard, as I before remarked, the rather loose rule of construction on the subject of internal improvements which exists in the minds of many of my friends on both sides of the House. The gentleman says that these roads are important for emigrants to pass over; and that unless the appropriation is made, the emigrants going to that country cannot get there.

Mr. LANE. The gentleman did not understand me.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will yield to the gentleman for explanation.

Mr. LANE. Every gentleman in the House will recollect that I stated that the road from Fort Stillacoom to Fort Walla-Walla was necessary for military purposes, and for the convenience of emigrants going into that country. I furthermore stated that a road from Columbia river to Fort Stillacoom was also necessary, for the purpose of transporting supplies from the Columbia river to that post, for the subsistence of the troops garrisoned there. I then undertook to show, and perhaps I did it very imperfectly, that a road from the settlements in Oregon to Rogue River Valley was necessary for military purposes. I have recently received a number of letters stating that the Rogue River Indians have already threatened depredations, and that with the opening of summer a bloody Indian war may be expected. Now, if the Government does not send out a force for the protection of the people of Oregon Territory, and of those en route to and from California, the people of Oregon will have to organize a volunteer force of their own, sufficient to chastise these Indians. A point has been selected in Rogue River Valley, near where Captain Stuart was killed last summer by these Indians, and a road leading south from Myrtle creek, on the Umpqua river, to the Rogue River Valley, is necessary for military purposes, and would also be very convenient for the people of the Territory.

I desire now to call the attention of the House to the fact, that Oregon Territory is costing the Government of the United States very little. There are but few troops there, and this is the first appropriation that has been asked for the purpose of assisting the people of the Territory in making roads. The formation of the country is such, as to require some aid from the Government—something more than the people themselves can do, to enable them to open ways to travel to and from the important points, and the military posts of the country. If the gentleman from Alabama could see at this moment, that in case of Indian hostilities, it would cost more than the amount of the appropriation asked, to remove the troops from one point to another in the Territory, he certainly would not oppose this appropriation. It is a small one, and I know it to be necessary. I am not sure that some military commander has not recommended it, but as I have no official information of that fact, I will not say that it has been so recommended.

In conclusion, I will add, at the risk of a little repetition, that while it is true that the roads I have mentioned, and for the establishment of which this appropriation is asked, would prove of great utility and convenience to a large portion of the people of Oregon, they are seriously demanded by the military interests of the country, and I hope for that reason, if for no other, will not be denied.

Mr. HOUSTON. I shall now conclude, in a very few words, what I have to say upon this subject. And I wish to reply to the view presented by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ROBINSON] and repeated by the gentleman from Oregon, that this is a small appropriation, that it is not extravagant, and that it is the first the Territory has asked for. Now, I feel the force of all that, but I ask if it touches the principle involved? I do not care if it is only a hundred dollars; still, if in truth it is not necessary, why, then, it is an improper appropriation. I do not charge the Territory with being extravagant. On the contrary, it is one of your cheapest Territories. But I think I dispose of the argument of the gentleman by saying, that although it is not a large appropriation—some fifty or sixty thousand dollars being embraced in the bill—yet, if the fifty thousand dollars are not necessary, if they are to be thrown away, if they are to be expended upon roads that may turn out to be useless, why, then, as a matter of course, it is an appropriation that ought not to be made.

The Delegate from Oregon says these roads are necessary for military purposes. Now, if he is correct in that statement—and I have no doubt he is honest in his opinion—why did he not refer this matter to some of the military authorities for the purpose of obtaining information which could be relied upon? Why, he says "the military bureaus are not to be relied upon." Mr. Speaker, they are relied upon to furnish the estimates necessary for the War Department, and it is reasonable to suppose that the head of the War Department knows where troops are necessary, and what facilities are required for those troops, better than the Delegate from the Territory of Oregon, or any member of this body. They know better whether roads are necessary, from one point to another, and where they shall be located.

But it is a singular fact, and one to which I wish to call the attention of the House, that although these roads purport to be military roads, the bill was reported from the internal improvement committee. Now, if they are military roads, why did the bill go to the Committee on Roads and Canals? Its proper destination, if they are military roads, would have been the Committee on Military Affairs. That committee properly has charge of all objects and matters relating to the defense of the country, and of roads necessary to the transportation of troops and supplies.

But some gentlemen seem to question whether it has been the practice for the War Department to estimate for these roads. Now, here I find in the estimates for the present session of Congress one for a road from Point Douglass, across the Territory of Minnesota, to the Missouri river; and there are other estimates here for roads in the same Territory. Now, these are estimates submitted to the House, the present session of Congress, by the proper authorities. If, then, it was proper for them to do that for Minnesota, why is it not proper for them to go a little further, and do the same thing for Oregon? So it seems to me, notwithstanding the argument of the gentleman, the practice of the House has been the other way.

Mr. SIBLEY. If the gentleman will allow me, I merely want to state, that all these roads have been surveyed by the War Department.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am glad the gentleman has told me that. All these roads have been surveyed under the direction of the War Department, and I think a like survey is necessary for the roads provided for in this bill.

Mr. LANE. I ask the gentleman from Alabama to recollect, that the surveys he proposes to make would cost this Government more than the appropriation this bill proposes to make to construct the roads.

Mr. HOUSTON. That may be. It may be that the roads would never be surveyed at all; that the Department which has charge of the military operations of the country would decide that they were not necessary in that region in the country.

Mr. HENN. My recollection in regard to these appropriations is, that they were first made without estimates from the War Department, and that estimates were afterwards made, and the recollection of several gentlemen to whom I referred was the same, for their continuation or completion. I have, however, referred to the law upon the subject, and I find it bears me out in my recollection, inasmuch as appropriations have been made precisely similar to that proposed in this bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. I thank the gentleman for his recollection; but when it comes in direct conflict with the record I have before me, I am compelled to rely upon the record, and not his memory.

Mr. HENN. Those estimates are for roads already surveyed.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will show the gentleman that he is mistaken upon this subject, and that he has not examined it, as he could not, because he has not had the time. Why, is it a supposition that is reasonable, that after an appropriation for the construction of a road has been made and expended that the War Department should then survey the road and estimate for it? No, sir. Before you proceed with the work, it must be surveyed and the estimate made out. All these things must precede the making of the appropriation. That is my recollection; and, if you will go back to the practice of the Government, I am quite sure you will find that I am correct. I do not pretend to deny that there may be cases differing from it, but you will find that it has been the general practice of the Government.

Mr. BISSELL. There is scarcely anything which enlists my sympathy more deeply than the interests of the Territories. My feelings are so strongly drawn out towards that class of our citizens who go to inhabit the distant Territories, that I can hardly ever bring my mind to the conviction that I ought to vote against anything they ask for. I want to vote for this bill; but, with the lights before me, I greatly fear I shall be compelled to concur in the views of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Houston,] and vote against it. The bill proposes to make an appropriation of $50,000 for the construction of three roads in Oregon. Now, I do not know but the necessity of the case requires that these roads shall be made. I do not know but it is the duty of the General Government to make them, and our duty to appropriate twice that amount. But I confess that I have nothing in the evidence before me to justify me in voting for it.

Now, I will not ask the committee who reported this bill, and who now call upon us to support it, so much as some other gentlemen have done. I will not ask that agents shall be sent out there to examine into the matter, to survey the roads, to ascertain their utility, and the cost of their construction. I will not ask that, for it would consume too much time, and possibly be unnecessary. I will not even ask that the committee shall call upon the Secretary of War and ascertain his views with regard to the necessity or propriety of constructing these roads; as to the necessity of the appropriation, and for his information as to the disposition to be made of the troops in that Territory for the future. I only ask this, and let gentlemen say if it is not reasonable: I ask that some member of that committee will rise and state to the House that the committee have examined the subject for themselves; that they have, with maps before them, traced out the direction and distance of these roads, their practicability, their utility, and the cost of their construction. If any member of the committee will say that committee did this, and, after having done it, agreed unanimously to report the bill, I will vote for it.

Mr. MASON. The Committee on Roads and Canals had this subject before them, with maps, and the statement of the Delegate from Oregon, [Mr. Lane,] and my recollection is that they agreed unanimously to report it to the House.

Mr. BISSELL. Then the gentleman will beat no loss to answer a question or two with regard to it. Will he tell me what is the distance of the first road proposed to be constructed?

Mr. MASON. It has been some time since the action of the committee upon it, and I have forgotten what is the distance. I recollect, however, that the committee examined the subject thoroughly, and were satisfied in relation to the merits of the bill.

Mr. BISSELL. Then it is so long a time since that examination was made that the committee are not now prepared to give the House the information it may desire; but I think that the bill merits an examination.

Mr. MASON. I hope you will examine it.

Mr. BISSELL. For that purpose, before I take my seat, I shall move to recommit it to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HENN. I now wish, with the consent of the gentleman from Illinois, to ratify my statement in regard to this matter, by reading a law which made an appropriation for a road in Iowa, which I recollect when I interrupted the gentleman from Alabama. It was passed March 3d, 1839. It provides—

"That the sum of $20,000 be, and the same is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated to, to the opening and construction of a road in the Territory of Iowa, from Dubuque, on the river Mississippi, to such point in the northern boundary of the State of Missouri as may be best suited for its future extension by that State to the cities of Jefferson and St. Louis, within the same; that the Secretary of War be empowered and directed to cause such road to be constructed by contract or otherwise."

There is evidently an appropriation without any previous survey or location of the road. A subsequent section of the same act reads as follows:

Sec. 3. And he it further enacted, That the following sums are hereby appropriated to several objects, respectively, which are hereinafter described:

For the opening and construction of a road from Burlington, through the counties of Des Moines, Henry and Van Buren, towards the seat of Indian agency on the river Des Moines, $1,000.

For the improvement of the road from Burlington, in the Territory of Iowa, to De Haques, in Illinois, the sum of $2,500, in aid of a like sum contributed towards the same act by the town of Burlington."

Ob. In this section there is an appropriation of $5,000 for a road which had not been previously surveyed.

Mr. HOUSTON. As the gentleman seems determined to press his point upon me, I will ask him a question. I would like to know whether the gentleman has examined the matter, and can say to the House that this appropriation was not made for a survey?

Mr. HENN. The face of the law shows that it was not.

Mr. HOUSTON. The face of the law shows no such thing. There may have been another appropriation further back for a survey. This law does not show that there was not.

Mr. HENN. There was no appropriation made for these roads prior to that time, and there was no survey made prior to that time.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to give way for a motion to to adjourn.

Mr. BISSELL. With the understanding that I still retain it, I will give way for that purpose.

Mr. STEPHENS. I then move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. McLANAHAN. I ask the gentleman from Georgia to allow me to request the unanimous consent of the House to take up from the Speaker's table a bill from the Senate in regard to the census, in relation to which there is a dispute between the States of South Carolina and California, to which of those States shall be entitled to a Representative upon a fraction. It is necessary that the bill should be speedily acted upon, and I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take it up and refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary.

[Cries of "Agreed!"]
There was no objection, and the bill was accordingly taken up and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. STEPHENS. I now renew the motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and
The House adjourned till to-morrow at twelve o'clock.

PETITIONS, &c.

The following petitions, memorials, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. ROBE: The petition of citizens of Greenwood and Troupsburgh, Steuben county, New York, and from the town of Deerfield, Tioga county, Pennsylvania, for the establishment of a post route from Rough and Ready post-office, in the town of Greenwood, through West Union, at the head of Bennett's Creek, via Joshua Slyers, in the town of Troupsburgh, Steuben county, New York, to the village of Knoxville, in Tioga county, Pennsylvania, by the Brookfield post office, in said State.

By Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi: The petition of Nathaniel Lee, of Smith county, Mississippi, praying for the privilege of changing a land location, made by mistake, in the Augusta land district, in Mississippi.

By Mr. SCIDDER: The petition of Daniel Bassett and others, for a buoy to be placed on the "Lone Rock," near Hyannis harbor, Massachusetts.

By Mr. CLARK: The memorial of James Blake and 55 others, citizens of the county of Clayton, in the State of Iowa, asking that the General Government shall no longer traffic, nor permit traffic, in the public lands; and that they be laid out into farms and lots, for the free use of such citizens as will occupy them.

By Mr. FLORENCE: Three memorials from citizens of Pennsylvania, asking a modification of the revenue laws, so as to increase the duties upon iron.

Also, the memorial of William Scott, praying for an invalid pension from the date of receiving his wounds.

By Mr. ROBBINS: The petition of Miles N. Carpenter and 48 others, citizens of the county of Philadelphia, asking that the act passed September 28, 1850, be so modified as to give to each of the persons intended to be benefited thereby at least one hundred and sixty acres of land.

Also, the petition of William K. Jones and 44 other citizens of Schuylkill county, Pennsylvania, asking a modification of the tariff of 1846, so that the duties now levied on iron shall not, in any valuation that may be put upon it, be less than its admitted proper standard of forty per cent. ad valorem.

Also, the petition of Charles Frailey and 92 other citizens of Schuylkill county, Pennsylvania, on the same subject.

Also, the petition of Milton Cake and 32 other citizens of Pennsylvania, on the same subject.

Also, the petition of Thomas Williams and 40 other citizens of Schuylkill county, Pennsylvania, of similar import to the above.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 20, 1852.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

Mr. SEWARD presented a petition of O. B. Pearson and others, praying that the bill now pending before Congress, granting to every man who is the head of a family and a citizen of the United States, one hundred and sixty acres of land, may become a law; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BORLAND presented a petition of citizens of Clark county, Arkansas, praying the establishment of a mail-route from Achadelphia to Hot Springs in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. FISH presented a petition of citizens of New York, praying that the bill now pending before Congress, granting to every citizen of the United States, who is the head of a family, one hundred and sixty acres of land, may become a law; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SUMNER presented a petition of laborers in Boston, praying that the bill now pending before Congress, granting to every citizen of the United States, who is the head of a family, one hundred and sixty acres of land, may become a law; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SOULE presented the petition of Puig, Muir, & Co., praying that duties paid by them upon American casks and barrels may be refunded; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Also, the petition of Charles Belcher & Co., praying that duties paid by them upon American casks and barrels may be refunded; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DAVIS presented a petition of citizens of Sunderland, Massachusetts, praying that the bill now pending before Congress, granting to every citizen of the United States one hundred and sixty acres of land, may become a law; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CASS presented a petition of citizens of New York, and a petition of Frederick county, Maryland, praying that the bill now pending before Congress, granting to every citizen of the United States, who is at the head of a family, one hundred and sixty acres of land, may become a law; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills were read a third time, and passed:

An act granting the right of way and a portion of the public lands to the State of California to aid in the construction of a railroad from the city of San Francisco to the city of San José, in that State; and

An act to authorize the President of the United States to designate the places for the ports of entry and delivery for the collection districts of Puget's Sound and Umpqua, in the Territory of Oregon.

The title of the last-named act was amended, by adding after the word "Oregon" the words, "and for other purposes."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives was received by Mr. FORNEY, its Clerk, announcing that it had passed a bill, authorizing the Governor of the Territory of New Mexico to call an extra session of the Legislative Assembly of said Territory, should the same be deemed necessary and expedient. It was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

The resolution from the House of Representatives, changing the name of the St. Peter's river, in the Minnesota Territory, was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

RAILROAD IN WISCONSIN.

On the motion of Mr. DODGE, of Wisconsin, the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill granting to the State of Wisconsin a donation of public lands, to aid in the construction of a railroad from the city of Milwaukee to the Mississippi river.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands, to make it conform to bills passed of a like character, was amended and agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was concurred in.

The question was then stated to be: "Shall the bill be engrossed, and read a time?"

Mr. FELCH. I do not wish to interpose any objection to this bill, but to state the facts, upon which the Senate may act as their judgment may direct. This bill was one of the earliest reported by the Committee on Public Lands. Two bills were referred to that committee, both for roads commencing with Milwaukee, and both running to the Mississippi river. The committee reported this bill which left the point open upon the Mississippi river to be fixed by the Legislature of the State. The other bill proposed to commence at Milwaukee, and run to Prairie la Croix, thus fixing the point on the Mississippi river. Both bills provided for roads running from the same point to the Mississippi river—one fixing the point on the river, the other not. Subsequently the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. WALKER,] by an amendment incorporated in another bill, fixed the point on the river at Prairie la Croix. That was adopted by the Senate and passed. That was not, however, reported by the committee. My impression was, that when that was adopted, it would be a substitute for this bill running from the same point. I wish to ask the Senators whether their design is to obtain the passage of two bills for roads, both commencing at the same point on Lake Michigan—Milwaukee—and both running to the Mississippi river; one fixing the point there at Prairie la Croix, and this one leaving the point open to be fixed by the Legislature? The action of the committee was never had upon the other bill fixing the point at Prairie la Croix; that is, it was never reported upon. We thought it better to leave the point upon the Mississippi to be fixed by the Legislature. This seems to be the same route, and I ask the attention of the Senators from Wisconsin to it.

Mr. DODGE, of Wisconsin. I would state, in answer to the Senator from Michigan, that this bill does not designate the point on the Mississippi river. The Legislature of the State have given instruction to their Representatives upon that subject. I will furthermore state, that the road has been commenced, and twenty-eight or thirty miles of it completed. It is, perhaps, one of the best railroads in the United States. It has been graded for a distance of forty or fifty miles. The whole distance is not to exceed one hundred and sixty-three miles. The great proportion of our population is south of the Wisconsin river. A large amount has already been expended upon the road, and they are now running cars upon part of it, and the belief is that it will reach Madison, the seat of government, in the course of twelve months. In my course, I have been governed by the opinion of the Legislature of the State, and by my own views of the propriety of the subject; and I trust the Senate will not, under the circumstances of the case—the road having been commenced, and the grading having been completed for, perhaps, fifty miles—throw it aside, and give the preference to other roads, where the population is sparse.

Mr. WALKER. I should regret exceedingly if this bill should fail. The Senator from Michigan is clearly under a misapprehension about one fact. His opinion is, that the two roads upon which we have proposed legislation conflict with one another. That is a mistake. This bill, as I understand my colleague, and as I always have understood the bill, contemplates a road now in process of construction, from Milwaukee, by way of Madison, in the State of Wisconsin, to the Mississippi river. That road is now partly completed, and much the greater part of it is now under contract. There are trains of cars running upon it regularly some distance further than my colleague supposes. I think the cars are running on it for a distance of about forty-five miles. They are running to the edge of Jefferson county. That road runs in a southwesterly direction from Milwaukee, while the road to Prairie la Croix runs in a northwesterly direction. The northwestern road connects with a stretch of the Mississippi river, which lies in the direction of Milwaukee, for some one hundred and seventy miles, and connects with the St. Peter's river, with the new Menominee purchase, and the new territory which we are about to acquire in the northwest—the Mississippi river connecting with this road, to run in the direction of Milwaukee. It is almost a straight line from Milwaukee, in connection with the route to Chicago, and thence by the Central Railroad to Mobile, in Alabama. It consequently forms an entire connection south, by way of Chicago, Milwaukee, and through this stretch of the Mississippi river in the Northwest, and, as I remarked before, forming a connection with the new country called St. Peter's country. It is an entire mistake to suppose that the grant for the road leading southwest from Milwaukee at all conflicts with it. The points diverge from each other at Milwaukee, the one running southwest, and the other northwest, to the Mississippi river, at Prairie la Croix, connecting there with the river, and also with St. Peter's river.

The Senate need not be a great deal alarmed about this grant, for I think I can assure them that the route through which this road is surveyed is almost entirely sold. If this road would take the alternate sections in any portion of the State, it would be in rather a poor region of country, and would have a tendency, as the bill increases the price of the alternate sections, to bring into notice, and into the market, lands which have been heretofore refuse lands, and which, I have no doubt, will continue so for all time, unless this road should be constructed. I do not think that Congress, even if this was granting an out and out donation, would be granting a great deal; but, as the alternate sections are refuse lands, and will probably only be sold by this means, I think the Government will lose nothing by making the grant. I hope it will be made, and that the bill will pass.

Mr. DAWSON. I think, Mr. President, it is very desirable on the part of the Senate to investigate this question a little more thoroughly. The chairman of the Committee on Public Lands has stated that one of the bills for the State of Wisconsin which has already passed this body, never received the sanction of that committee. It was an amendment, as I understand, presented to the body, and providing for a railroad from Milwaukee to the Mississippi river. This bill proposes another road, to start from Milwaukee again, and to go to the Mississippi river in another direction. It is said that this bill was introduced by the Senator under legislative instruction. Now, sir, is it saying too much on the part of one who feels a deep interest in these public lands, that it seems as if the Senators from the new States are only to introduce bills asking for appropriations of public lands to build railroads, and no investigation whatever takes place? This bill has one thing to recommend it which others have not, making donations of public lands for the purpose of building railroads—it is a railroad already incorporated, I suppose, for the benefit of a private company. Am I right?

Mr. WALKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAWSON. I am correct. This railroad has then been incorporated, and a private company has undertaken its construction. It has not yet completed it, but has in operation about fifty miles of it.

Mr. WALKER. Forty-five.

Mr. DAWSON. And we are now called upon to give to the company the alternate sections for a certain distance on each side of the road, beginning at Milwaukee, until it runs to the Mississippi river, although forty-five miles have already been constructed. The road for which a bill has already been passed, runs, of course, if not parallel, diverging from Milwaukee to the Mississippi. The two roads may start a mile from each other, possibly a hundred yards, or may be from the same depot, and lead to the same stream; and the only suggestion made on the part of the Senator from Wisconsin here, is, that he wants to tap the Mississippi below at one point, and above at another point, in order to avoid the communication between these two points on the Mississippi, which I suppose to be navigable from point to point. I presume there can be no doubt of that.

Then, can we be acting with justice towards the Government and the finances of the country, and with any degree of justice towards the older States, when we thus liberally, and without any necessity whatever, give these public lands, as they are thus asked for? The Senator from Wisconsin, who last addressed us, [Mr. WALKER,] for the purpose of lulling us, and satisfying us that this thing is to amount to nothing, states that the lands along this road are so poor that nobody has settled upon them, and that they never will be settled upon. If that be true, there is no necessity for a railroad there. If the soil be so poor, and the population so sparse, then there is no earthly necessity for it.

Mr. WALKER. I said no such thing. The Senator misunderstood me. I said that the lands remaining unsold were the refuse lands of the country. It is a densely-settled country; but the lands remaining unsold are refuse, such as river bluffs and creek bluffs. I sell the alternate sections for $2 50 an acre, if for anything, more readily by the construction of this road, and consequently the Government will lose nothing.

Mr. DAWSON. All the good lands are sold. Where, then, are you to get the alternate sections to make the complement? You must go off to other portions of Wisconsin to get them.

Mr. WALKER. You cannot get them on this road.

Mr. DAWSON. You cannot get them on this road, but you can get them somewhere in the State of Wisconsin. For the purpose of looking into this matter, and feeling an unwillingness at any time to go against my friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. DODGE;] and because of the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, representing a new State, suggesting that even he thought this ought not to be allowed; and thinking it due to the Representatives of the old States that they should have an opportunity to look into it, I move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow.

Mr. FELCH. Mr. President, my desire was not so much to throw any difficulties in the way of this bill, as to state the facts as they occurred. The committee were disposed to grant to the State of Wisconsin a report in favor of one of the roads across the country, from Milwaukee to the Mississippi river. That was our design; and we said to the Senators from that State that we had no choice, of course, in regard to the route. My impression was, when the amendment was made to the other bill, which passed some few days since, which made the terminus of the route on the Mississippi river, at Prairie la Croix, that it was intended by the Senator to be a substitute for this bill. With that we were content; and I did not think it my duty, when it was presented, to make an explanation, supposing that when this came up it would be satisfactory to all parties not to act upon it.

I wish further to state, that there is an application before the committee for another railroad across the State, from the waters of Lake Michigan to the waters of the Mississippi river, taking a route still further north; and the committee, in acting upon that, if they are to recommend the allowance of two roads, very probably might prefer the route further north, connecting the same waters—the river on the one side, and the lake on the other—rather than have two commencing at the same point. The road proposed in this bill may be laid, consistently with the description of this bill, from Milwaukee to Prairie la Croix—the same route as the other; or it may be laid to some other point. So the Senator is mistaken in supposing that I did not understand the subject when I referred to the point on the Mississippi. Both roads might run to the same point, or they might run to different points. I think it would be well to postpone the further consideration of the bill for some time, so as to permit the matter to be considered.

Mr. HUNTER. I move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until Monday, so that we may take up the deficiency bill.

Mr. DODGE, of Wisconsin. I am perfectly willing.

The motion was agreed to.

THE DEFICIENCY BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th June, 1852."

Mr. HALE. I offer the following as an amendment to the bill:

SEC. — And he it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts authorizing or supposed to authorize any greater compensation to officers of the United States Navy than is provided by the "act to regulate the pay of the Navy of the United States," passed March 3, 1835, be and the same are hereby repealed.

I have some facts which I want to submit to the Senate, in support of the amendment; but there is so much "noise and confusion" that I do not know whether I shall be able to be heard.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will endeavor to put an end to the "noise and confusion" which prevails in the Senate Chamber.

Mr. HALE. If I can gain the attention of Senators, I will endeavor to give them the knowledge of the state of the facts.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will call the attention of the Senator to the fact, that the amendment does not seem properly to come into the bill.

Mr. HALE. I think it does. I suppose the Chair does not rule that as a point of order. The amendment relates to the very subject of the bill now before us; and I think if I can gain the attention of Senators, they will see that a part of the deficiency, which the bill is intended to supply, grows out of what is proposed to be remedied by the amendment. The bill is to supply deficiencies; and I propose to show that some of those deficiencies arise from what I conceive to be the illegal action of the Navy Department, which I want to stop in future, so that there may be no further deficiencies arising from it.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair has no disposition to prevent the Senator from offering any amendment that does not conflict with the rule which has been adopted.

Mr. HALE. This does not make any appropriation.

The PRESIDENT. It does not need an appropriation to make it conflict with the rule.

Mr. HALE. Let the rule be read.

The Secretary read the rule, as follows:

"Rule 30. No amendment proposing additional appropriations shall be received to any general appropriation bill, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or some act or resolution previously passed by the Senate."

The PRESIDENT. The Chair is satisfied. The Senator can offer his amendment.

Mr. HALE. Then I desire to call the attention of the Senate to it.

Mr. HUNTER. I do not rise to make a question of order; but will the Senator from New Hampshire, before he goes into that, permit me to appeal to him to withdraw the amendment, and wait until the general bill comes up? How shall we ever get along with this deficiency bill, if we proceed in this manner?

Mr. HALE. I will make a statement, and then, I think, the Senate will bear me out in the opinion that I ought not to comply with the request of my friend from Virginia. The reason why I offer this amendment now, and do not wait for the general appropriation bill, arises from this fact: It appears, by reference to the Journal of the Senate of last session, that when the general naval appropriation bill was before the Senate, an amendment was proposed to it, by which the pay of two lieutenants in the Navy was to be raised from $1,500 to $3,000 a year. We took a vote upon one of them, and it was rejected. The other, I believe, was put in by the House; and, when we came to vote upon that, there was no time to discuss it, as it had been reported to the Senate but two or three days before the end of the session. There was, therefore, this injustice done: the pay of two naval lieutenants, both put upon special duty, was recommended to be increased to $3,000 a year: to the one, the Senate refused, by a vote of 24 to 16, to give that increase, while the other received it, because we had not time to vote upon it. It will be seen, by the Senate Journal of March 3, 1851, that an amendment was proposed by the committee to the appropriation bill to raise the pay of the lieutenant who had charge of preparing the Nautical Almanac, from $1,500 to $3,000 a year; and that, on the question of agreeing to that, the yeas were 16, the nays 24. By that decisive vote, the Senate refused to sanction this expenditure of the public money. To my astonishment, I learned, since 1852 commenced, that the very lieutenant, whose salary the Senate had so decisively refused to raise to $3,000 a year, had been to the Department and had received, since we have been in session this year, his pay raised to that amount; and not only that, but had it carried back, beginning with the 11th of July, 1849. Although the Senate, by its vote at the last session, refused to raise the salary, the Department has raised it, and carried it back to 1849. Learning that such is the fact, I introduced a resolution into the Senate on the 19th of April last, which passed, requiring the Secretary of the Navy to give to the Senate the names of the officers who were receiving greater compensation than was provided by the act of March 3, 1835, the times they received it, and the law under which it was received. The Secretary answered that, and his report was printed and laid on the table. I find he puts down in it the individual engaged in preparing the Nautical Almanac as receiving $3,000 a year since July 11, 1849; and the authority under which he pays it, he says is the naval appropriation bill of March 3, 1849, and estimates. The act and estimates together form the authority. I looked to see if it could be found in the act of March 3, 1849, and I found this provision:

"That a competent officer of the Navy, not below the grade of lieutenant, be charged with the duty of preparing the Nautical Almanac for publication, and that the Secretary of the Navy may, when, in his opinion, the interests of navigation would be promoted thereby, cause any nautical works that may, from time to time, be published by the hydrographical office, to be sold at cost, and the proceeds arising therefrom to be placed in the Treasury of the United States."

That is the law; and looking to the estimates, I find "for calculating, printing, and publishing the 'Nautical Almanac, including the pay of the Superintendent, the sum of $6,000." The whole of the estimates for the bureau amounted to $64,200, and the appropriation was that sum less $6,000. Failing, then, to find in the law or estimates, any authority for this payment, I addressed a letter to the Fourth Auditor, stating to him, that I perceived by a paper laid on our table by the Secretary of the Navy, that he was paying this officer $3,000 a year, and I said, "You will greatly oblige me by informing me under what provision, section, or clause of the naval appropriation act of March 3, 1849, you find authority for such an allowance; when such a construction was first put on said act, and when application was first made for such allowance, and when an actual payment was first made to Mr. Davis, receiving his salary at $3,000 a year."

The Auditor answered that on May 4, 1852, inclosing various papers. Amongst the rest he gives as authority, in the first place, the following letter from Mr. Maury, in regard to the authority upon which the allowance was made:

NATIONAL OBSERVATORY,
WASHINGTON, January 30, 1852.

I know that it was the object of the framer of so much of the act of March 3, 1849, as relates to the Nautical Almanac, to make the pay of the superintendent of that work $3,000 per annum. I say I know it, because, in my estimate for the support of this office for that year, I asked for $3,000 for commencing the preparation of the Nautical Almanac, and for $3,000 for the pay of the superintendent thereof. The whole amount called for by the various items of the estimate for that year was passed, except an item of $6,000 for the payment of duties on nautical instruments, books, maps, charts, &c. That item was stricken out, and the law of January 26, 1849, passed in its stead, which provides for the admission of all such articles duty free.

M. F. MAURY.

That is one of the papers which the Comptroller of the Treasury sends as aiding him in his decision. But that is not all. There happened to be present in this city at that time a member of the last Congress, and he comes in to certify. Mr. Samuel F. Vinton says, in a letter, as follows:

WASHINGTON CITY, January 31, 1852.

In the estimates of the Navy Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1850, for the support of the hydrographical office for that year, there was an item of $6,000 for preparing a Nautical Almanac for publication; of which $3,000 was for the compensation of the officer having charge of the work, and the remaining $3,000 for other expenses of the Almanac. The whole item was included in the appropriation for the hydrographical office. I was then chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, and in making the appropriation of this item as asked for, it was my expectation, and I have no doubt it was the intention of the committee, that the money should be expended in accordance with the objects specified and recommended in the estimate, and that the sum of $3,000 would be paid to the officer having charge of the preparation of the almanac, as recommended.

SAMUEL F. VINTON.
To Captain CHARLES C. DAVIS, United States Navy.

There is, then, the declaration of Mr. Maury, that he knows what was in the mind of the man who framed the bill; and there is that of Mr. Vinton, who says it was his expectation, and no doubt that of the committee, that the officer should be paid $3,000 a year. But that is not all. Here is a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, addressed to the First Comptroller:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, February 9, 1852.

Sir: It appears from the files of this Department that the estimate submitted for the support of the hydrographical office for the year ending June 30, 1850, embraced an item of $3,000, for the pay of the Superintendent of the Nautical Almanac; that the whole amount called for was $64,200, including $6,000 for the payment of duties on nautical books, charts, and instruments imported by that office for the use of the Navy; that by the act of January 26, 1849,

$4,000 were appropriated for refunding the duties that had already been paid by the office, while a clause was added remitting those duties in future; and that this amount required for the payment of duties being deducted, the whole amount of appropriation asked for was given and passed in the bill making appropriations for the support of the Navy for the year ending 30th June, 1850;—thus showing, in the opinion of this Department, that it was the intention to conform in legislation to the estimates of the Department, and consequently to make the remuneration of the Superintendent of the Nautical Almanac $3,000, in compliance with the estimate.

It is the opinion of this Department that the law of March 3, 1849, entitles this officer to the above salary; and it is the wish of this Department that the office of Superintendent of the Nautical Almanac should occupy the position, and be placed on the footing originally contemplated both here and in Congress.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
WILL. A. GRAHAM.

Upon that letter of the Secretary of the Navy, that certificate of Mr. Maury, and that certificate of Mr. Vinton, the First Comptroller of the Treasury bases an opinion that this officer is entitled, not only during the year 1849, but ever since, to the payment of $3,000 a year; and notwithstanding the Senate voted last year they would not pay it, since we have been in session—last February—that officer, with these papers, has been to the Department and drawn $3,000 a year, commencing in 1849. Now, I have said in the amendment, that I want to repeal the laws that authorize, or seem to authorize, such a payment as this. By the act of March 3, 1835—I think the honorable Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BADGER] will bear me witness to it—Congress have provided as specifically as they can, that the salaries there provided shall be in full of all compensation to the officers of the Navy. The estimates that were submitted to Congress say nothing about it; but the Secretary of the Navy says, "it appears from the files of this Department." There is stowed away in the Department of the Secretary of the Navy, an estimate from Mr. Maury, Superintendent of the National Observatory, putting this sum at $3,000 a year. That estimate was never submitted to Congress. Congress passed the act giving to that Department the sums they required, and thereupon it is solemnly decided that it authorized the Secretary, in the face of the act of March 3, 1835, to raise the salary of a lieutenant from $1,500 to $3,000 a year. To show that I am not mistaken in the facts, I will read from a letter of Mr. Dayton, dated May 4, 1852, in answer to an inquiry. He says:

"Agreeably to the circular of the Secretary of the Treasury of March 19, 1852, I addressed my reply to you, and have the honor to state, that the allowance in question was made by the Second Comptroller of the Treasury upon a reference of the case from this office, and that a copy of the letter containing his decision, and of your communication to this office therein referred to, and of two certificates, (one from Lieutenant M. F. Maury, and the other from the Hon. Samuel F. Vinton,) which were presented by Lieutenant Davis in support of his claim, is herewith inclosed. I believe that the first application of Lieutenant Davis, for pay at the rate of $3,000 per annum, was made in the year 1849 or 1850; but as it was not in writing, I cannot speak with certainty as to the date. He was referred to the then Second Comptroller of the Treasury, who, I think, expressed an opinion adverse to his claim. The construction of the law and estimates relating to the case under which the allowance was made, was first communicated to this office by the Navy Department in the letter of February 9, 1852, of which I inclose a copy, and by the Second Comptroller in the letter of the 17th of the same month, of which a copy is also inclosed.

"The first payment to Lieutenant Davis, at the rate of $3,000 per annum, was made in March last, but it included the difference between the pay he had received and that to which it was determined that he was entitled from the 11th of March, 1849."

"He was referred to the Second Comptroller of the Treasury, who, I think, expressed an opinion adverse to his claim. The construction of the law and estimates was first communicated to this office by the Navy Department, in a letter of February 9, 1852."

Since we have been in session this year, upon an application, and this certificate of Mr. Maury, who says he knows what was in the heart of the man who drafted the bill, and of Mr. Vinton, who says it was his expectation, and the expectation of other members of the committee, that the salary of $3,000 would be paid, they have, since last February, paid that officer, from the year 1849 to the present, at that rate, in the face of the very decisive vote of the Senate, when this thing was directly presented to us. These are facts which appear by documents that have been printed, and are upon every Senator's table.

But to make this a little more plain, I state that which I do not know, but of which I have been advised by a member of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House, who says the application has been made again this session to that committee, and they have expressly refused to sanction it. Here, then, in the face of the fact that the application is made to Congress year after year, and Congress has refused, explicitly and directly, to sanction any such allowance, this claimant goes round, and, by getting a certificate here, and a certificate there, as to what was in the mind of the members of the committee which reported the bill, and in the mind of the draftsman who drafted it, gets the Secretary of the Navy to pay him $3,000 a year. But this is not the worst part of the case, for the Comptroller of the Treasury, in the report which he makes justifying the allowance, does not pretend that there is any express provision of law justifying it; but he thinks that the legislation which has been had heretofore leaves it discretionary with the Secretary of the Navy. I will read it. He says:

"The acts of 1850 and 1851, though they make appropriations for the continued preparation of the almanac, do not, in terms, include in this appropriation the pay of the superintendent; but the provision for the appointment of the officer, contained in the act of 1849, of course remained in force, and the amount appropriated is the full sum called for by the estimates, which did include this item at the same rate as before. If any distinction is, therefore, to be drawn between the act of 1849, and those of '50 and '51, I think the most that can be said is, that the latter leave the payment of the superintendent, as well as the amount to be paid him, to the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy."

Then, what is your act of 1835 worth? What is your provision, that no compensation except what is provided by a certain act, shall be paid to an officer of the Navy, or any other officer, worth, if, upon estimates filed away in his Department, the Comptroller of the Treasury certifies that the officers of the Navy are not entitled to the compensation provided by law, but that it rests in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy whether to pay them or not, an extra compensation? I have no hope to remedy this. Abuse after abuse of this sort may be exposed, and the answer, as the chairman of the Committee on Finance [Mr. HUNTER] well said to me, is, that this is a great country, and it is a small business to be looking after these things. But here is one case which I have brought to the attention of the Senate. I have not brought it upon any doubtful rumors. I have brought it upon official records of the Department, which are printed by order of the Senate, and laid on our tables, by which it seems to me, in contempt of the legislation of Congress—not only in violation, but in contempt of it—money is taken from the Treasury and paid out; and the officer who is set there to guard the Treasury, instead of enforcing the provisions of the act limiting the salaries, comes to the conclusion that it rests within the discretion of the Secretary to pay such a salary or not.

Mr. HUNTER. Did the Senator state that I said this was a small matter?

Mr. HALE. No, sir, I did not say any such thing. If the Senator had listened to what I said, he would have found that it was complimentary. I said the Senator from Virginia told me, in a private conversation that I had with him, that the common answer to such things as this would be, that this is a great country; and they could not be corrected. That is what I said.

But if the construction which the officers put on the act be true, the salary of this officer is $4,500 a year, for the estimate justifies it, because it says, $3,000 a year for paying the superintendent. Well, sir, the superintendent is lieutenant in the Navy; his salary is $1,500 a year. An estimate is put in for his payment as lieutenant, and $3,000 for the superintendent. Then his salary is $4,500 a year, instead of $3,000. But compromise is the order of the day; and he being entitled by law to $1,500, and an attempt made to complain of it, they take a middle course, and give him $3,000, which is neither justified by law nor by the estimates.

But I want to call the attention of the Senate to this matter, because it seems to me to involve a most dangerous and alarming principle; for estimates may be placed upon the files of a Department, and when they come and ask for a greater compensation than is provided by law—ask Congress to put the appropriation for an increase of salary in the law, and Congress refuse to do so, the head of the Department may pay it by virtue of the estimates! What, then, becomes of the provision of the Constitution, that no money shall be paid out of the Treasury except by a provision of law? This payment has not gone through the forms of law. It has the sanction of the Comptroller of the Treasury; but let it have the sanction of as many officers as it may, I ask every Senator to look at it, and see if it is not as flagrant a violation of the Constitution as could be perpetrated.

My amendment goes further. I want to cut off all extra compensations. If you look at the document, which has been laid on our table, you will find that every gentleman receiving extra compensation has it by a provision tucked into a general appropriation bill. One had his salary raised from $1,500 to $3,000, by the naval appropriation act of August 3, 1848; another had it raised from $1,500 to $3,000 by the naval appropriation act of March 3, 1849, and estimates; another had it raised from $1,500 to $2,500 by the naval appropriation act of March 3, 1851; another had it raised from $1,500 to $3,000 by the naval appropriation act of March 3, 1851; and so on. All were tucked into these bills. Nobody knows anything about it; and thus these subordinate bureaus are multiplying on your hands. The whole thing is unjust and wrong. It is wrong to the other officers of the Navy. Those officers who go abroad, leave their families, and leave their country, to do foreign duty and sea service, ought to be the ones, if any, who should receive extra compensation. But these provisions are made in the first place as a matter of favoritism. An individual does not want to go to sea; he may be infirm, and for that or for some other reason, gets shore duty; and the next thing is, he is stuck into an appropriation bill, and his salary raised, by a general law, to an equality with some of the bureaus, until it turns out that we have three officers on shore receiving $3,000 a year, one $2,500 a year, and three receiving $1,500 a year, which is more than the pay allowed them by the act of March 3, 1835. It is to remedy this that I have submitted the amendment.

Mr. BADGER. I have a very decided objection to the amendment which the honorable Senator from New Hampshire has proposed to this bill; but the objection which I have to the amendment is very feeble and small compared to the objection which I have to the style of argumentative denunciation with which he has supported it. That Senator seems on every occasion, on any subject before the Senate, whether it relates to the Navy or not, to seize on every occasion, in season and out of season, to cast imputations on the administration of that Department, under the charge of every gentleman who has had the superintendence of it. It is not long since he entertained the Senate with an account of the wonderful, gross, abominable, and outrageous increase affixed to the pay of officers in violation of the act of 1835, and he asserted over and over again, that the particular thing to which he referred was the increase of the compensation of officers, in direct defiance of and contrary to the law, without any sanction or support whatever. I believe it was pretty evident, at the time of the discussion on that occasion, that the Senator was entirely mistaken. The Senator seems to think, or at least he argues as if he thought, that the act of 1835 had become, by the subsequent legislation of Congress, a constitutional provision, and that because that law declares that the compensation then given to the officers of the Navy should be in full for all their services, and no extra allowance should be made to them, it was therefore incompetent, forbidden, wrong, an abuse, that any subsequent act of Congress should authorize anything to be done which could not be lawfully done under the act of 1835.

Now, I think I shall be able to show that the Senator's assault to-day, upon the administration of the Navy Department, is but very little better founded, if at all, than the assault which he made with regard to the furniture of the Government houses. What is the state of the case? If the Senator had read, as I asked him to do, the very clear, though very brief and satisfactory opinion of the Comptroller, if he had read the whole of it, the statement of that officer would have refuted, completely refuted, the argument he has urged, and the objection he has made.

Now, allow me to read it:

"I have examined the question involved in the claim of Lieutenant Davis, superintendent of the Nautical Almanac, and am of opinion that his salary should be allowed at the rate of $3,000 per annum."

"In the naval appropriation act of March 3d, 1849, it is provided 'that a competent officer of the Navy, not below the grade of lieutenant, be charged with the duty of preparing the Nautical Almanac for publication.'"

"The bill also contains an appropriation of $6,000 for the purposes of the Almanac, 'including pay of superintendent of the same.' The estimates for this item called for the exact amount appropriated, specifying $3,000 as the proposed salary of the superintendent."

"It is very clear that this bill provides for the appointment of an officer of the Navy as superintendent, and also contemplates that he should be paid as superintendent, and not as an officer. And though the amount of his salary is not specified in the act, yet, as the appropriation followed the estimate in amount and particulars, and the estimates included this salary at $3,000, it is proper to infer that the 'pay' mentioned in the act was intended to be the amount called for in the estimates; or, at all events, that it was intended to leave the amount to be paid the superintendent to the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, within the limits of the sum appropriated. And, as appears from the letter of the Secretary herewith, the allowance of $3,000 for this salary has been approved by him."

Now, sir, a little attention to, and amplification of this condensed and brief argument of the Comptroller, will be sufficient to show that in the allowance of the salary he acted rightly, and that there is no ground for the objection taken by the Senator from New Hampshire. In the first place, an estimate was made by the Department, calling for an appropriation for the preparation of a Nautical Almanac, and proposing the sum of $3,000 as the amount of compensation to be paid to the officer who should have charge of it. In the naval appropriation bill, following out this estimate of the Department, it is provided that a competent officer of the Navy, not below the grade of lieutenant, shall be charged with the duty of preparing such almanac, and an appropriation of $6,000 is made to meet the expenditure thus incurred, including the pay of the superintendent of this work. It is demonstrable by this provision, that Congress intended that this officer should be paid as a superintendent of this work, and not merely as a lieutenant. That is clear; because the appropriation for the pay of the officers, included in the same bill, embraced the pay of every officer in the Navy—every one of them; and the act which has been referred to, expressly directed that an "officer of the Navy," and no other, should be selected to superintend the preparation of the almanac, and then makes an appropriation to pay him as a superintendent. I say it is therefore demonstrable that Congress intended that he should be paid in his character of superintendent. Why? Because if he received nothing but his pay as an officer, then the appropriation to pay him as a superintendent was entirely useless. There was already, in the general appropriation bill, an appropriation for paying him as an officer, as well as for paying every other officer in the Navy. If, therefore, that provision was not intended to authorize his payment as a superintendent, no appropriation at all should have been made. It should have been simply provided that the Secretary of the Navy should assign to some competent officer the discharge of this duty, and that for the incidental expenses so much money should be appropriated. But what is the language of the act? It is that "the Secretary of the Navy shall appoint an officer of the Navy," for whose services the amount of pay is mentioned in this very bill; and the sum of $6,000 is appropriated for the purpose of having this almanac made, including the pay of the officer who was to superintend it.

Now, I undertake to say, that by any other interpretation, so far as I am able to see, this provision is absurd, and would impute to Congress the gross ignorance of not knowing that, when an officer was assigned to a particular duty, it is not necessary to make an appropriation to pay him, because there is already in the general appropriation bill, an appropriation for the express purpose of paying every officer of the Navy. Again: the Secretary was not limited to the corps of lieutenants for the selection of this officer; he had the right to select a commander; he had the right to select a captain; therefore, when this act provides that he shall select an officer, not below the grade of lieutenants, to take charge of the preparation of the Nautical Almanac, and makes a specific appropriation of a certain sum to cover the expenses, and to cover the pay of the superintendent himself, as superintendent, it is demonstrable that it was intended that—all these officers, commanders, captains, and lieutenants being already provided for in the specific appropriation for this purpose—the person selected for this duty was to be paid as superintendent, and not as an officer of the Navy

There was an extreme propriety in this. The duty with which this officer was to be charged, is not a duty of an officer of the Navy. A man may be a most admirable officer of the Navy, and yet be totally disqualified to discharge this duty. I question whether any of the captains who signalized themselves, and covered the country with glory in the late war with England—I question whether any English Admiral, Vincent or Nelson themselves—would have been competent to discharge the duty of superintending the preparation of this Nautical Almanac; it is a matter of science; it is a matter of skill; it is a matter requiring large attainments, in a department not necessarily connected with the ordinary duties of a naval officer. The intention of Congress, when it passed this act, therefore, was, that the Secretary of the Navy should look through all the various grades, from a lieutenant up, and find the man that had the necessary scientific attainments, which would enable him to discharge this high and important duty; and then it made an appropriation to pay him as superintendent only, in order that he might be respectably and sufficiently remunerated.

Now, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] says that, acting on the process of interpretation here, this lieutenant ought to have been paid $4,500. How does he make that out? Why, as this very respectable and intelligent gentleman has stated—and this is the first paper of his I ever saw—it was the clear intention of Congress that he should be paid as superintendent, not as an officer of the Navy. Although he retained his commission, he was, for the time, detached from the performance of the functions of an officer of the Navy, and placed in the discharge of the scientific function of superintending the preparation of this almanac; and in this capacity he was to be paid, and not otherwise. The whole argument, then, comes to this: Congress did not think it was right or generous to require a highly-scientific and accomplished officer of the Navy, when placed in the discharge of this duty, to throw up his commission in the Navy. It would have been an affront on his honor to propose it. Now, in a time of peace he might, without any imputation of being derelict to the duty which he owes to his country, devote himself to the discharge of this great scientific duty; but if a war were to occur, he would, no doubt, as every gallant officer would, prefer his claim to be employed in his proper and appropriate vocation: to sustain the honor, and to vindicate the rights of his country. And Congress intended to leave him in that position; not only to be employed as a scientific man, as the superintendent of this nautical work, but still liable to be called on to do duty on the ocean, in the maintenance of his national rights, and to discharge what he would consider, as every high-minded officer does, not merely a duty, but a privilege.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] speaks of these estimates as being stuffed away, or some such expression, in the Navy Department; as being concealed, unknown, uncommunicated. What is his authority for that statement? None, sir, none. The Comptroller, therefore, as I think, was not only fully justified, but required, to put this interpretation on the law. He was compelled to say that this appropriation was intended to cover the pay of this gentleman as superintendent; that he could not be confined to his pay as an officer, because that was provided for in the bill, and in this view, this provision would have been superfluous. Being withdrawn from the performance of his duties as an officer, it was in the contemplation of the law that he should be paid as superintendent of this work, just as if he had been a private citizen. This involves no violation of the policy of the act of 1835. Not at all. In passing that law, we did not surrender our right to judge whether, in any particular instance or case, it might be proper to assign any other duties to an officer. It was intended to cut off those extra allowances which were ordinarily made in the Departments; some in the exercise of the departmental authority, and others under general laws, and to fix a scale of compensation that should stand in lieu of these allowances. That was all. Congress, therefore, from time to time, have permitted officers to receive such additional compensation as they deemed to be right. The evil to be remedied in the Departments, was the receipt of these allowances without authority. That was the evil.

Mr. HALE. Exactly.

Mr. BADGER. The Senator on one side, and the Comptroller and myself on the other, are at issue as to what was the intention and meaning of this act. The Senator has failed, I think, to make it appear that it was merely intended to pay Mr. Davis as an officer; and until he has succeeded in showing that, it is in vain for him to allege that it is an abuse that this sum should have been paid.

So much in regard to this subject of discussion. This amendment, I think, is highly objectionable. It seeks at once to strike off this additional compensation from certain officers of the Navy, to whom, I believe, everybody, with the exception, perhaps, of the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE,] thought that the additional compensation was just and proper. Here is a distinguished gentleman now at the head of the Observatory. I believe there was no difference of opinion in the Senate on the proposition to give him a compensation suitable to the post that he occupies, and the high and important duties which he discharges—duties to which very few men in this world are competent, and which he has discharged with so much honor as to give a just consciousness of pride to every American, while he has placed himself, and with himself, his country, in a higher position, scientifically, than it ever occupied previous to his discoveries. So, also, with regard to Mr. Dahlgren, a gentleman who received his allowance by the express vote of the Senate; that is, by a refusal of the Senate to strike out the allowance which had been inserted by the House of Representatives. Why should this compensation now be taken from him? Why should it be taken from the gentleman charged with the superintendence of the Nautical Almanac? He is one of the most gifted and scientific men in this country. Why should we, under the general idea of breaking a lance against abuses, strike off allowances of this kind, which are not abuses? allowances made with the sanction of Congress; allowances which are highly useful and serviceable to the country, and which furnish the only means by which we can accomplish two objects of great importance in a country where naval promotion is so exceedingly slow—to furnish to those gifted men in the Navy, who have high and distinguished powers, the means of exerting them with credit to the country, and to furnish them a reasonable compensation while doing so?

I hope the Senate will not concur in the amendment.

Mr. HALE. If the honorable Senator from North Carolina supposes that I entertained the remotest idea that I could make any impression upon his mind, to induce him to go with me to reform what I believe to be a most palpable abuse, he is exceedingly mistaken; I had no such vain hope. The Senator undertakes to illustrate the absurdity of my position by alluding to a former effort which I made to correct another abuse, and he says that he believes when that discussion ended, it ended in my discomfiture, because everybody was satisfied that I was entirely wrong. Now, I do not know how anybody felt after that discussion, except the Senator from North Carolina and myself. I was satisfied that I had exposed to the Senate a most glaring abuse. I know I did not satisfy the Secretary of the Navy of it; I know that the Senate did nothing but to ratify that abuse, knowing that it had existed for years. I was not, therefore, astonished to find that the Secretary of the Navy was raising the salaries by his own mere motion, from $1,500 to $3,000 per annum, and that the Comptroller of the Treasury has sanctioned the proceeding. But when the Secretary of the Navy, in a communication addressed to the Senate in answer to a resolution of inquiry, gravely tells the Senate that the authority on which he is paying the $3,000 a year, is not founded in any law—for he does not point you to any law—notwithstanding the provision of the Constitution, that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury except by law, and notwithstanding the act of March, 1835; but instead of pointing you to any law to show his authority, he points you to estimates.

Mr. BADGER. Does the Senator say that that money was not appropriated? Does he understand, when he speaks of an appropriation, what is meant by that, and that the money is placed under the control of the Navy Department, by the act which makes the appropriation? It is put in the charge of the officer at the head of that Department, not in payment, but as the Senator from Michigan [Mr. Cass] expresses it, in application of the money to the object designed.

Mr. HALE. Very well. Suppose the Secretary of the Navy should send in to Congress an estimate for the pay of the officers of the Navy. He does not stop to go into very minute calculations as to the amount required, as some deaths may occur, and there may be some resignations; and suppose Congress should appropriate $100,000 more than was necessary by the provisions of the act of 1835. Then, according to the doctrine of the Senator from North Carolina, Congress having appropriated the money for the compensation of the officers, the Secretary of the Navy must sit down and make a distribution of it pro rata, because it has been appropriated. That is the conclusion to which he would come.

But I disclaim all idea of making any attack upon the Navy Department, or anybody else. But I will go further, and I will say that the poor excuse of this being in the estimates has no foundation in fact—not at all. I hold the estimates in my hand. The estimate is: "For calculating, printing, and publishing a Nautical Almanac, including pay of the superintendent of the same, $6,000." Whether the pay was to be one hundred or one thousand dollars or three thousand dollars did not appear by the estimate. But the estimate goes further than that, and expressly negatives the idea that is claimed, that any lieutenant is to receive more than $1,500, except Lieutenant Maury, who is at the head of the Bureau. Here, with this estimate of $64,000, is a list of the officers to be paid, and among them is one lieutenant, at $3,000. That lieutenant is the distinguished officer whom the Senator from North Carolina has complimented so highly, and so justly, Lieutenant Maury, and he was to receive it by the existing law. These estimates, instead of expressly stating that Lieutenant Davis was to have $3,000 a year, do expressly exclude him in such a manner as to leave but one to receive that sum, viz: Lieutenant Maury.

The honorable Senator from North Carolina asked me on what authority I said these estimates are filed away in the office of the Navy Department, and kept secret? Why, sir, I go into these, [holding up documents,] the documents of Congress. They are my authority; and here you will perceive, that in a letter of the Secretary of the Navy to the Comptroller, in which he tells him it is his opinion, that this salary ought to be paid, and that it is the wish of this Department that the Superintendent of the Almanac should be placed in this position, he says: "It appears from the files of this Department, that it was estimated," &c., &c. And well he might say so; because the estimates submitted to Congress, and printed, do not contain any such specification of the money that was appropriated. This estimate specifically asks, in the gross, for the sum of $6,000, for preparing a Nautical Almanac; and it also gives a list of the officers to be employed; and in the list given, one single lieutenant—Lieutenant Maury—is to receive $3,000 a year; so that instead of justifying the conclusion that anybody else was to receive $3,000 a year, it excludes that conclusion.

This high talk, Mr. President, about the value of these officers, and about the great good they are doing to the country, may all be well enough when an appeal is made to Congress to induce them to alter the law in favor of increased salaries; but in the very document which the Secretary of the Navy has submitted to Congress, he tells you that when this appropriation was passed, Lieutenant Davis applied to the Navy Department, and then to the Comptroller of the Treasury, (who, I venture to say, was one of the most faithful, and intelligent, and incorruptible officers who ever presided at the head of that department—I mean Governor Parris,) and he decided that to pay this $3,000 was not according to law. And what did Lieutenant Davis then do? Why, sir, he came to Congress. And what did Congress do? They refused to grant his appropriation. How idle, then, is it to get up here and say that Congress intended this payment, when both the Executive Department and Congress decided that it was not authorized, and especially after the party subsequently came to Congress, and Congress said "No." Even after that, an appropriation was again made, and the committee refused to insert it in the appropriation bill; and then after all that, sir, a new appropriation is made to the Department, and they go back and pay this $3,000 a year from the year 1849 up to this time.

Then, sir, it is denied that this is an abuse, and I am put under censure for bringing such matters before the Senate, as though I had committed an impropriety against the head of a Department in undertaking to call the attention of the Senate to these things. If I understand the Senator from North Carolina to-day, he does contend that it was within the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy; and if this construction is true, the design clearly was to pay these men at the rate of $4,500 a year. Sir, when we want to know how our money goes, and for what, what are we to look to? Are we to look to the law? No, sir; it seems that we are to go to the Departments, and to the documents constituting part of the archives, and to the estimates submitted to Congress, and they say nothing about it; but, in the language of the Secretary of the Navy, it appears from the files of this Department; not from the printed documents—not from the estimates submitted to Congress, but from some pigeon-hole in the Navy Department, that there were estimates in 1849, putting this salary at $3,000. It is true, sir, that the officer then in the Department refused to pay it; application was made to Congress year after year, and Congress refused to pay it; and still, in the face of these refusals, application is made again to a more pliant officer, who not only puts the salary now at $3,000, but goes back and reverses the decisions made for years before. This is the case as it stands—this is the fact which here presents itself.

But, sir, was it ever heard of before, that the head of a Department, in deciding what was the true construction of an act of Congress in regard to the salary of an officer, should not only go beyond the law, but should call upon the draftsman of the bill to know if it was the object of the framer of the law to give a salary of $3,000, but also to Mr. Dayton, who submits his own opinion as a matter confirmatory of the right of the officer to receive that salary? And besides all that, sir—that not being enough—you have the opinion of an ex-member of Congress, and an ex-member of a committee, (Mr. Vinton,) and he tells you that it was his expectation, and he had no doubt it was the expectation of the rest of the committee, that this amount of salary was to be paid. Thus, by the expectation of what were the intentions of a past committee of another Congress, a salary is raised by the head of one of the Departments from $1,500 to $3,000, when year after year the party had been asking Congress to do it, and Congress had refused to do it.

Now I ask, if Congress is not willing to sink and submerge themselves in entire subserviency to these officers, that they will vindicate the law from such—I will not call them abuses—but from such constructions of the law as this. I call upon Congress when they appropriate money, to see that the purse-strings are not held so loosely as to allow by a loose construction of the law, upon estimates and specifications filed away in the dark pigeon-holes of the Departments, the payment of money which they know nothing about. Now, if this construction of the law was good for anything, it could not go back beyond the year 1849. This is simply a requisition in the law that the Secretary shall appoint some person to discharge a certain duty, and $6,000 are appropriated in the whole for a particular object. I do not want to dwell upon this subject any further. No adjectives which the Senator from North Carolina can apply to so humble an individual as myself can strip this thing of the prominent features which it presents, or cover up the facts as they exist. Here is an appropriation, not saying a word about this officer; not specifying him at all. He thinks it applies to himself, and authorizes him to receive a greater salary. He applies to the head of a Department, and his application is negatived. He then comes to Congress, and Congress says "No;" and he then comes again to Congress, and Congress still says "No." But while this Congress is in session, and after these repeated refusals of Congress and the Department, payment is made, going back to 1849 and coming up to this time.

Every word is here printed. There is no idle rumor, no doubt, no mistake, no misapprehension about it. But I say to Congress, if you will sanction this you do not know the salary of a single officer. Congress cannot look into the minutiae of every salary included in the provisions of a general appropriation bill.

I know when the bill in which the appropriation was made, which I have been commenting upon, was brought up for consideration, it was not more than forty-eight hours previous to the adjournment of Congress. I asked to have the bill read through once; and half a dozen members came around me, and although it was a bill appropriating an enormous sum of money, they asked me not to insist on having the bill read, because the hour of adjournment was so near that there was great danger that the bill would be lost, if time was taken to read it once. This amendment then came up, to increase the salary from $1,500 to $3,000 a year. The Senate refused to agree to that amendment. Then the other case of Mr. Dahlgren came up, and I moved to strike it out, so as to put him on the same footing, and the universal cry was, "there is no time, there is no time!"

One word as to the general features of this bill. I have no objection to paying Lieutenant Maury every cent that his services are worth. I think no man can complain of me since I have had a seat on the floor of either House of Congress, that I have raised my voice against paying any public officer liberally. I am willing to pay them liberally; but what I object to, is this system of putting amendments to general appropriation bills, for the purpose of compensating them; and passing them when nobody can see them. In this way they creep in, and you soon have a number of subordinate bureaus, without examination or knowledge on the part of Congress of what you are doing. That is the evil which I wish to wipe out, so that we may have a general system of compensation; and that an officer who has too low a compensation may have it raised; but do not leave it to the discretion of Secretaries—do not leave it to the doubtful construction which is to be given to certificates of ex-members of Congress—do not leave it to the doubtful construction of affidavits of gentlemen who happen to know what was in the brain of others—do not leave it to estimates, not printed and before Congress, but filed away in the Departments. Go back to the Constitution, to its plain, explicit, and express provisions, so that no money shall be obtained from the Treasury except by virtue of an appropriation made by law.

The Senator from North Carolina says that I regard the law of 1835 as possessing the virtue of a constitutional provision. That is not what I complained of. What I complain of is, that while the law is so plain and specific in its provisions, its administration and execution is such as to suffer the payment of more than is provided. I have no personal interest in this matter. I do not know Mr. Davis. He may be more learned than all the sages of Greece—he may be a walking compendium of all the knowledge to be obtained by gazing at the stars from now till the end of time—and his Nautical Almanac may embrace all that Newton ever dreamed of. I do not know anything about that. If his salary is not sufficient, raise it; but do not suffer such a plain and clear provision of a law to be violated. Wipe out what authorizes, or seems to authorize such a construction of this law; and, when an officer is deserving of a higher compensation, let him go before the proper Department, and then bring his claim to Congress, properly recommended; and while I have the honor of a seat on this floor, I will be one of the last to object to his increased compensation.

Mr. BADGER. I am not in the habit of using adjectives, particularly those of a denunciatory character. It is, therefore, hardly necessary for the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Hale] to say that no adjectives I could apply to him would strip this matter of the features it presents. I should consider myself, if I were to use any epithets of denunciation on the present occasion, to be encroaching on the honorable Senator's manor; for he seems, whenever anything respecting the Navy comes up for consideration, to be in possession of a large stock of epithetical expressions which are anything but complimentary. Nor can I hope, by anything that I can urge, to reason or to persuade the Senator into taking a fair and candid view of anything pertaining to that Department. I believe the only class of officers in the naval service which, in his opinion, does not receive adequate compensation, and which ought to be additionally remunerated, is that corps of reverend gentlemen called chaplains. In this view, I confess, I am ready to concur; but I regret that the charitable feelings of the Senator are so stinted as to embrace but one class of persons connected with that service.

I do not mean to enter into an elaboration of this matter, but I wish to submit two observations to the Senate. As the Senator from New Hampshire set out by stating that he could not hope to convince me, so I will observe, with equal truth, and with much greater foundation for the assertion, that neither I, nor anybody else, ever need hope to convince that honorable Senator. I submit what few observations I have to offer to the Senate. In the first place, the Senator seems to think it a matter of extreme impropriety, and entirely without precedent, that any inquiry for the purpose of elucidating a particular provision contained in a law, as to the views and notions of those who were concerned in its passage, should be referred to. Permit me to say, that I do not concur in the opinion which the honorable Senator has so expressed. I deceive myself greatly if, in courts of justice, it is not allowed in regard to provisions of doubtful statutes to recur to the opinions entertained or expressed by those concerned in passing them, or those who were contemporaneous with them. There can, therefore, be no reasonable objection to an attempt to ascertain what was the true intention of this provision of the law.

Now, the honorable Senator may think that these references were not entitled to a certain amount of weight, but that is a question for the Senate to decide. Whatever else they were, they were regular and legitimate sources to which to refer, in endeavoring to fix what was the meaning of Congress in passing that law.

One other remark, and I have done. Upon the Senator's own system of interpretation, it is clear and evident that this gentleman is entitled to receive $3,000 per year. He rejects the interpretation put upon this clause of the law by the Comptroller, and which I think is a just and reasonable one—that this, $6,000 being appropriated, among other objects, was to pay this amount to the superintendent, and the superintendent being directed to be selected from the officers of the Navy, it was the intention of Congress that he should be paid as a superintendent, and not as an officer of the Navy. The Senator rejects that interpretation. Very well, sir. Now, how do we stand? In the appropriations contained in that same bill for the payment of all the officers of the Navy, is included the payment of this gentleman (Mr. Davis) as a lieutenant. Then Congress puts an additional appropriation into the bill. A lieutenant might be selected for the performance of this duty, or some other officer. It was to be performed by an officer not below the grade of a lieutenant; and, for the purpose of making this arrangement more clear, we may suppose that the name of Mr. Davis had been put in, and then there is an appropriation of $6,000 for the expenses of the almanac, including the pay of the superintendent, Mr. Davis.

Well, then, here are undeniably two appropriations to pay Mr. Davis—one under the general appropriations, he being an officer of the Navy, and one under this special appropriation; and the Senator says that under this second appropriation, he was to receive nothing but his pay as an officer of the Navy. Then, Mr. President, by the Senator's own showing, there was a double appropriation in each case to be regulated by his pay as an officer of the Navy. Independently of his pay as an officer, he was entitled to $1,500. As a superintendent, he was entitled to receive an additional sum as an officer of the Navy superintending. Then you only have $1,500 more, making $3,000; so that stripped of all technicalities, and with a fair and reasonable interpretation of this law, the same result follows; and unless Congress had made a general appropriation, and then made a special appropriation for his benefit, the intended special appropriation would amount to nothing.

Mr. HUNTER. I would suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire, that perhaps this amendment is broader than he designs to have it? Does he mean to say—

Mr. HALE. With the leave of the Senator I will withdraw it, and offer a substitute.

There being no objection, the following amendment was proposed as a substitute:

And no estimate or appropriation of money, in any bill making appropriations, shall authorize the payment of any increased pay, allowance, or compensation in any form whatever, beyond the amount prescribed in said act of March 3d, 1835, in any case, unless there shall first be a specific direction for such extra payment, designating the names of such officers to whom such extra payment shall be made.

Mr. HUNTER. It strikes me that is right, but I would like to hear it read again.

Mr. HALE. I will modify it by striking out the words "act of March 3d, 1835," and inserting the words "prescribed by law."

Mr. BADGER. Is it in order to offer an amendment to that amendment?

The PRESIDENT. Is that which the Senator from New Hampshire has presented to be added as another section?

Mr. HALE. It is.

The PRESIDENT. Then it will be in order to offer an amendment to it.

Mr. BADGER. I move to amend the amendment by adding at the end of it the words, "except the Superintendent of the Nautical Almanac, who shall be allowed the sum of $3,000."

Mr. HUNTER. I believe that the gentleman who has the superintendence of this almanac ought to receive $3,000 a year; but I also believe that heretofore he has not received it according to law. I am in favor of the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, and I should be willing to add to it something which expressly appropriates $3,000 a year to this officer; but I cannot agree to an amendment inferring that he has heretofore received it according to law. I think he ought to have that sum, and I shall vote for his receiving it.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would inquire whether this is a substitute for a section, or an additional section?

Mr. HALE. I offered an amendment some time ago, which I now withdraw, and offer this as a substitute.

The PRESIDENT. Then it is to come in as a section by itself.

Mr. HALE. It comes in as a section by itself.

Mr. BADGER. I propose to put my amendment in the form of a proviso, so as to add to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire the following:

Provided, That nothing in this section contained shall apply to the Superintendent of the Nautical Almanac, who is hereby allowed a compensation of $3,000 per annum.

Mr. BORLAND. Why say that it may not apply to him? Why not leave it a simple appropriation?

Mr. BADGER. I wish to except him from the amendment.

Mr. HUNTER. I would suggest to the Senator from North Carolina an alteration of his amendment. It is to make it say simply:

Provided, That the Superintendent of the Nautical Almanac is hereby allowed a compensation of $3,000 per annum.

If it were put in this form, he would get rid of the difficulty suggested by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. HALE. I would suggest to the honorable Senator from Virginia that, as he thinks the Superintendent of the Nautical Almanac has been receiving $3,000 a year contrary to law for two years, it will be time enough to put in this proviso two years hence, when his account will be square. Let us not make an exception in the case of the only one of those officers who has been receiving an illegal compensation.

Mr. BADGER. I will modify my amendment so as to meet the suggestions of the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Virginia. I will modify it so as to read:

Provided, That the Superintendent of the Nautical Almanac is hereby allowed a salary of $3,000 per annum.

Mr. HALE. As this is a question which was tried two years ago by the yeas and nays, I ask now for the yeas and nays upon the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina to the amendment which I have offered.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BADGER. I hope the Senate will indulge me in a few remarks. As the honorable Senator from New Hampshire has so often referred to the vote of the Senate at a former session on this subject, and as his remark is calculated,

I think, to give a mistaken idea of the motives which influenced the Senate in refusing to ingraft into the naval appropriation bill of last year a provision giving this superintendent $3,000 per annum, I wish to say that that vote furnishes no evidence at all of the view of the Senate as to the propriety of allowing that compensation. We were then warned of the danger of making amendments on account of the short time that we had, and the fear of losing the bill altogether. I recollect very well that the honorable Senator from Kentucky—who has been so long, and is now so unhappily confined by disease—voted, with the Senator from New Hampshire, against the proposed amendment, and voted also against the proposition to strike out the allowance of $3,000 to Mr. Dahlgren, and on the ground that he was unwilling to make any amendments to the bill which could possibly have the effect of sending it back to the House of Representatives.

The question being taken on the amendment to the amendment by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 35, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Bell, Berrien, Borland, Brooke, Butler, Cass, Clarke, Davis, Dawson, Downs, Fish, Geyer, Houston, Hunter, James, Jones of Tennessee, King, Mangum, Mason, Miller, Morton, Pearce, Rusk, Sebastian, Seward, Shields, Smith, Soule, Spruance, Sumner, Toucey, Underwood, and Wade—35.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Bradbury, Chase, Clemens, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Hale, Hamlin, Jones of Iowa, Norris, Walker, and Weller—12.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. RUSK. There is in the bill this provision:

"For running and marking the boundary line between the United States and Mexico, according to the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, $80,000."

I move to amend it by adding to it this proviso:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to sanction a departure from the point on the Rio Grande north of the town called "Paso," designated in the said treaty.

I will explain very briefly the reason why I offer this amendment. The treaty is very distinct and clear, that the boundary line shall leave the Rio Grande where that river intersects the southernmost boundary of New Mexico, north of the town called Paso, which was to be computed according to a map attached to the treaty—Disturnell's map. That map shows the southern boundary of New Mexico to begin immediately north of the town of El Paso. There has been some misunderstanding between the commissioners on that subject. Our commissioner agreed to go about half a degree above that point, and established the initial line in the absence of the surveyor, who was a part of the commission. When the surveyor arrived, he protested against the act of the commissioner; in consequence of which that line was suspended, and remains now suspended. The commission then proceeded from the Rio Grande to survey the Rio Gila, and are now going on with the latter; but the line between the Rio Grande and the Gila remains suspended. What I desire is, that there shall be nothing inferred from the making of this appropriation which shall sanction the line proposed by the commissioner on the part of Mexico, and agreed to by our commissioner, but to which our surveyor refused to agree.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I would suggest for the consideration of the mover of this proposition, that the amendment, as it seems to me, involves the construction of the treaty. This question of boundary must be settled under the treaty. It cannot be settled except by the treaty. It cannot be settled by any construction which Congress may give to it.

Mr. RUSK. I do not propose that we shall give any construction to it.

Mr. DAVIS. If, by this proviso being attached to the bill, it should be an attempt on the part of Congress to locate the line contrary to the true construction of the treaty, it would be a violation of the treaty.

Mr. RUSK. If the Senator will read the amendment, he will see that I require that the initial point shall not be any other than that provided by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. I ask that the amendment may be read, so that the Senator from Massachusetts may see what it really is.

The amendment was read accordingly.

Mr. DAVIS. Then the provision seems to me to be wholly unnecessary, because, after all, it comes to that point. The treaty must settle the question, and no interpretation or construction given to it here can decide or settle where that line shall be. If the proviso means nothing more than that we will adhere to the treaty; why should we adopt an amendment in regard to the matter? It strengthens nothing; it weakens nothing; but it is an unnecessary act of legislation.

Mr. RUSK. I do not want to raise any discussion upon this subject, but I will say that the commissioner upon the part of the United States has acted in violation of the plain provisions of the treaty, and has agreed to establish the initial point thirty miles above the place where, according to the treaty, the line should leave the Rio Grande. I am prepared to go into a full investigation of the subject whenever it may become necessary. All that I want now is, to prevent Congress, by making the appropriation for this survey, to sanction this departure from the principles of the treaty—from the plain words of the treaty itself. That is all that I ask.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not see any impropriety in adopting the amendment. I apprehend that the object of my friend from Texas is a very legitimate and proper one. We are about to pay for services performed in doing this labor, and his object is only to say that, whilst we pay for the service, this payment shall not be construed as sanctioning the manner in which the work has been done, or as sanctioning any departure from the principles of the treaty. I do not see that there can be any impropriety at all in that. If you pay this money without saying anything in regard to the matter, perhaps hereafter, when the dispute as to the proper position of the line on the Rio Grande comes to be agitated between the commissioners appointed by Mexico and by our country, the Mexican commissioner may say, "You ought not to object to this line—it has already been partially run, thirty miles above the true point; you have paid for the work, and the service, without objection; your Congress allowed it to pass without any comment at all; and therefore you cannot object to this line." I do not see anything but a precautionary movement in this proposition of the Senator from Texas; and it seems to me to be not at all improper. It does not give any construction, as I conceive, to the treaty. If I understand it, it merely provides that nothing herein contained shall be construed as authorizing a departure from the treaty. We do not undertake to say by the amendment, as I understand it, that the place where, it is said, the commissioner proposes to locate the point upon the Rio Grande, conforms to the treaty, or departs from the treaty. It merely says that the payment shall not be construed as sanctioning a departure from the treaty. I see no impropriety in that, and therefore I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. CLARKE. Mr. President, I have no objection to any provision or proviso that the honorable Senator from Texas may deem proper to make, so far as it regards the treaty with Mexico, if it is proper for the Senate to adopt an amendment which can strengthen or take from the effect of that treaty. But, sir, in the course of the explanation which my honorable friend from Texas has made, he has chosen, in my humble opinion, to reflect upon the conduct of the United States Commissioner, appointed to run the boundary line between this country and Mexico. I am not prepared, at this time, to go into that subject fully. I had supposed that, at a proper time, the official conduct of that officer would be brought up for consideration, and that, at that time, I should be prepared to go into an investigation of the manner in which he had proceeded with his duties.

Mr. WELLER. That time will come.

Mr. CLARKE. If, in the examination of that matter, it shall appear that his duties have been correctly and properly performed, I, at least, shall be ready to advocate and to defend his course. The question that has arisen, in regard to the treaty with Mexico, is simply on account of the provision of the treaty, that the line should be run according to Disturnell's map, which was, at that time, almost the only map known of that country, or at any rate the only one known to me as applying to that country particularly. The treaty designated that the line should be run according to Disturnell's map. The map was adopted, as is alleged, as a part of the treaty. The line upon the Rio Grande, and the initial point from which they ware to start, to arrive at the head-waters of the river Gila, were, according to the construction of the treaty, to be regulated and governed by Disturnell's map. Now, I understand that, when this Commissioner arrived at the Rio Grande, he found, in the course of his topographical and astronomical surveys, that the Rio Grande, by Disturnell's map, was placed three degrees east of where it really was.

Mr. RUSK. Is there a word said in the treaty about degrees?

Mr. CLARKE. Nothing is said about them in the treaty. But here comes the difficulty. The treaty refers to Disturnell's map. That map is shown to have been a mere matter of compilation, without any investigation of the territory itself; probably manufactured, or made, perhaps, in the city of New York—at any rate, in this country. It was a compilation from other maps. When the commissioner, with his scientific corps, went there, in order to ascertain where was the initial point upon the Rio Grande from which the line should commence, he found that by Disturnell's map the Rio Grande was in such a longitude; and, on taking the longitude of the Rio Grande, he found that it was three degrees west of where it was placed upon Disturnell's map. There is the difficulty in this case. The commissioner supposed that he was bound to go by the true latitude and longitude. If he was bound to take the degrees of latitude and longitude according to Disturnell's map, he must have gone three degrees east from the Rio Grande; and, then, of course he would have departed from the treaty, because by it he was obliged to start from the Rio Grande. He has been governed, if I understand the matter aright, by his own observations and the observations of the scientific corps with him—by the actual longitude, where the Rio Grande was found. On ascertaining the longitude and the latitude, he agreed with the Mexican commissioner to establish a certain point as the initial point of the line. The question is, whether Disturnell's map, erroneous as it is, shall be considered as governing, ruling, and controlling the treaty, or whether the treaty shall be executed according to the intention of the parties; and that is, that they were to start from a certain degree of latitude and longitude. At this moment I am not prepared to go into all the points of the question as I shall be prepared to do at a future day. I say now most emphatically, not only to my honorable friend from Texas, for whom I have a very high estimation, but to other honorable gentlemen who have given indications of a desire to discuss this question, that at a proper moment I shall be ready to defend the position that has been taken by this commissioner. From the moment of his embarkation upon this expedition, he has not only met with more difficulties than any individual before employed upon such a service by any Government in the world, but he has been pursued with more malice, even to the latest extremity, than was ever known to follow an individual of no more consequence than himself. But upon this question I only ask that whatever may be the amendments proposed by my honorable friend from Texas, it shall be so worded as not to involve the Senate in the declaration of a principle that shall commit it to standing by the latitude and longitude that is marked upon Disturnell's map, in contradiction, violation, and opposition to the actual astronomical surveys which have determined that latitude and longitude. Now, let the right be established. If the intention of the United States, when they made that treaty with Mexico, was that they were to start from the Rio Grande as it was marked on the map no matter whether it was right or wrong, and from thence go to the head waters of the Gila, and thence follow the Gila to the junction of the Colorado, and thence to the Pacific three degrees below San Diego, let that be done. But if Disturnell, who made that map—the correctness of which was unknown to the commissioner who negotiated the treaty with Mexico, as well as to the Mexicans themselves—committed a mistake, and placed El Paso some thirty or forty miles below where it actually was, and placed the Rio Grande three degrees east of where it actually was, let not that error, into which all the parties fell at the time of making that treaty, be insisted upon by the Senate as operating against that justice and fairness which has hitherto governed the United States in all their relations with other nations.

I simply ask that nothing shall be done in this proviso to commit the Senate and the House of Representatives to the declaration or maintenance of a principle which, in justice and fairness, should never be maintained by a Congress governed by the principles of propriety and liberality towards a neighboring nation. If the commissioner has erred, let him be condemned. If he has exhibited a want of knowledge, let that fact be shown, and let him be recalled from his duty. But, if he has acted properly; if he has made the proper use of the scientific corps that was given him by the Government, in establishing the initial point, let not any proviso we are to adopt be made to condemn him in advance, before he, or his friends, have had an opportunity to put before the country his defense. As to this proviso, I care nothing about it beyond this, that I wish it so worded as not to condemn the commissioner in advance.

Mr. HUNTER. I rise to make an effort to prevent, if possible, a long and unnecessary debate upon this subject. I want (if I may be allowed to use the term) to "keep the peace" of this deficiency bill, if it be possible to do so. I am afraid that we are about to embark in a discussion, not only in relation to the propriety of the initial point of the boundary line, as fixed, but also in relation to the propriety of the conduct of the present boundary commissioner. I hope that may be avoided. I hope that we may get rid of all such debate. It is not necessary now. If I understand the amendment of the Senator from Texas, it is designed merely to exclude a conclusion. It does not commit the Senate, either to the propriety or impropriety of the initial point, as fixed. I confess it does not seem to me to be very useful. I do not see much necessity for such an amendment. But, inasmuch as it does no harm, and would gratify the Senator from Texas, I am disposed to vote for it. I think, however, that it concludes no question. It merely excludes a conclusion; and, out of abundant caution, the Senator from Texas, representing, as he does, the State of Texas, desires that we should not be concluded as to the proper point for fixing the initial line. I see no reason why we should not gratify the Senator; and I hope we shall be saved from a debate in relation to the propriety of the conduct of the boundary commissioner, or of the accuracy of the survey.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My object in trying to get the floor was precisely that which has animated the gentleman who has just taken his seat. I do hope that the honorable Senator from Texas will not go into this matter, either one way or the other. I hope we shall get clear of all unnecessary debate.

Mr. RUSK. Mr. President, I drew up the amendment expressly for the purpose of not raising any question on the treaty, or as to the conduct of the commissioner. It was my object to reflect on nobody; not that I am not prepared to maintain certain points when the proper time arrives. I know that this is a deficiency bill, and that if we pass this appropriation as it is, without such a proviso, it might be afterwards said, and the opportunity would be seized by Mexico, to say to us, that "You, by this appropriation bill, agreed to the initial point sanctioned by your commissioner—an initial point different from the one named in the treaty." It is simply to avoid that conclusion that I offered this amendment. I am prepared with documents to go into the question of the conduct of the commissioner; but unless I am provoked, I will not now do so. I am prepared to do justice to everybody, but first of all, I wish to do justice to my own country, in a matter of this kind. All that I ask—all that I want, is the exact line agreed to by the treaty, and that I mean to insist upon as long as I can.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am very happy to hear the declaration of the Senator from Texas. I think the amendment, as it has been prepared by him, contains no reflection on the commissioner. I think his conduct is not involved in it; and I hope his friends will not be disposed to make points for the purpose of drawing from the gentleman from Texas an argumentative speech, which perhaps might lead to days of discussion. I hope, therefore, that the question may be taken immediately on the amendment.

Mr. SEWARD. I would like to know how much better off we shall be when we adopt the amendment. If we do not pass the amendment, will there be any different conclusion left? I do not see any necessity for adopting the amendment.

Mr. BADGER. I confess that I am in the same happy state of ignorance.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It can do no harm.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BELL. Mr. President, I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to offer an amendment to the bill. It is to insert the following:

For payment to the assignees of the contractors for the removal of the Choctaw Indians from the States of Alabama and Mississippi, a balance of a claim on account of said removal, included in the estimate of the Indian Bureau, and an appropriation for the payment of which passed the Senate at the last session of Congress—$37,422.

The PRESIDENT. The impression of the Chair is, that this amendment provides for a private claim.

Mr. BELL. The amendment is founded upon an estimate sent from a Department.

The PRESIDENT. Private claims are expressly excluded, whether they are estimated for or not.

Mr. BELL. I offer this amendment under the direction of Committee on Indian Affairs.

The PRESIDENT. That does not alter the case. Private claims are expressly excluded, whether estimated for or not, or whether reported by a committee or not.

Mr. BELL. I ask for the reading of the rule.

The 30th rule was accordingly read, as follows:

"No amendment proposing additional appropriations shall be received to any general appropriation bill, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or some act or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session, or moved by direction of a standing committee of the Senate, or in pursuance of an estimate from the head of some of the Departments; and no amendment shall be received whose object is to provide for a private claim, although the same may have been previously sanctioned by the Senate."

Mr. BELL. I think the President is mistaken in the construction which he gives to the rule. I hardly think this is, strictly speaking, a private claim. This is a claim for an Indian removal. It is founded upon an act of Congress. The removal of these Indians was expressly provided for by an act of Congress; a contract was made for their removal in pursuance of that act; and now, an estimate has been sent by the proper Department, for the payment of the expenditures incurred in consequence of it. I do not wish to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair, but I submit to the consideration of the President, whether it is not going too far to exclude such a claim as this on the ground that it is a private claim.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. President, it seems to me that this is a private claim, strictly speaking. The fact that it is estimated for by a Department does not prove that it is a public claim. I understand that the Indian department has received instructions that, whenever the officers think there are just claims arising out of Indian transactions, to estimate for them. That is the instruction, I believe, under which the Indian department now acts. It is their belief, that if, in the opinion of the officers, there are any of these claims which should be paid, it is their duty to estimate for them. The fact, therefore, that this claim has been estimated for, does not prove that it is not a private claim. What is it? It is to compensate a contractor, or two contractors, for consequential damages which they claim to have incurred on account of the mode in which the Government paid these Indians. I believe that is the nature of the claim, and it seems to me that it is a private one.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will again read that portion of the rule relating to this subject. The Chair has certainly no desire to exclude this amendment from every consideration—from his local position, as well as from the interests of those concerned. On the contrary, if he were to consult his own wishes, he would receive the amendment; but, as long as he presides, he will endeavor to enforce the rules. The 30th rule provides, that—

"No amendment shall be received whose object is to provide for a private claim, although the same may have been previously sanctioned by the Senate."

Mr. BELL. I think the decision of the Chair in relation to this is a new one. I believe that this question was submitted to the Senate at the last session, and that an appropriation for this purpose was then included in the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. HUNTER. It may have been put in by the Senate. I do not remember it; but I think no such appropriation was reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BELL. My recollection is, that the provision was inserted on a motion made under the direction of the Committee on Indian Affairs. The Senator from Missouri can set me right, if I am mistaken. I think he will bear me out, that the claim of William B. Hart, assignee of the contractors to remove the Choctaw Indians, was included in the Indian appropriation of last year.

Mr. ATCHISON. I think it was.

Mr. CLARKE. It was included in that bill.

Mr. BELL. That is my understanding of the matter. I think the decision of the Chair on this question is certainly a new one. This claim has been presented, and has been pending for some years before Congress.

Mr. RUSK. This amendment has been recommended by a committee, and hence comes within the provisions of the rule.

Mr. BADGER. The rule expressly excludes private claims, although they may be reported by a committee.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I rise merely for the purpose of stating to the Senator from Tennessee, that I can supply him with the information about which a moment ago he appeared to be at some loss. The claim of Mr. Hart was recommended by the Committee on Indian Affairs at the last session of Congress, and was ingrafted upon the general Indian appropriation bill as an amendment by the Senate, but was lost by a disagreement between the two Houses. This is the position in which it received the sanction of the Senate at the last session of Congress. It was an amendment adopted on the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. BELL. I dislike to press any question of this description, but certainly I am correct, according to the statement of the honorable Senators who have spoken, in saying that this is a new position in reference to this claim; for the Senate has heretofore considered it, not as a private claim which was excluded, but such a one as could come in under the standing rules of the Senate, as an amendment to an appropriation bill.

Mr. HUNTER. Perhaps the question was not raised at the last session.

Mr. BADGER. I rise to assist my friend from Virginia in endeavoring to "keep the peace" of this bill. Do not let us take up the whole day in discussing the question whether the amendment be or be not in order.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair has no recollection of what took place with regard to an amendment of this character at the last session, or whether the question was then raised. The simple question now to be decided is, whether this is a private claim or not.

Mr. SEWARD. I am at a loss to conceive how this amendment differs in principle at all from the amendment we have just adopted, directing the sum of $3,000 per annum to be paid to a lieutenant of the Navy for superintending the Nautical Almanac. To be sure, in one point of view, this seems to be a private claim, but in another view it is an appropriation of money to pay for services actually performed, and is precisely in the same category with the case to which I have referred. I do not think that the rule was intended to embrace a case of this kind, where a service was contracted for by law, and where a Department seeks to obtain the money for the purpose of paying it. The rule was never intended, in my opinion, to apply to such a case.

Mr. ADAMS. It occurs to my mind that this amendment is precisely in the same condition, and in the same class, with the Collins line appropriations. We yesterday agreed to make an additional appropriation to that line for transporting the mail. Here it is proposed to appropriate for expenses incurred in the removal of Indians. That was an appropriation made to individuals for complying with a contract made with the Government. This is an appropriation to pay a contractor. If this amendment is out of order, then a large portion of the appropriations which are usually offered as amendments to such bills are out of order, and I shall insist in future upon the point of order.

The PRESIDENT. The amendment in regard to the Collins line of steamers stood in a very different position from this. According to the rule, estimates are required to be furnished. In that case the Senate decided that the estimate presented with regard to that line was sufficient to justify the amendment under the rule. The rule extends further, and provides that when a committee directs the offering of an amendment, it is to be received, although there is no estimate. But there is an express exclusion by the rule of all private claims, whether there is an estimate sent for them from the head of a Department or not, or whether they have been reported by a committee or not. The rule expressly and positively excludes all private claims. The simple question now is, is this a private claim? The Chair was under the impression that it was a private claim, and that it would, therefore, be excluded under the rule. Now, if the Senate, from hearing the nature of the claim, and understanding what it is, are prepared to say that it is not a private claim, and that this is a proper amendment to be offered, inasmuch as it comes from a standing committee, the Chair, in order that his opinion in regard to its being a private claim may not prejudice it, will submit the question to the Senate, whether they consider that this is a private claim. If they do so consider it, then it will be excluded under the rule as an amendment.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. President, I thought the other day, when I raised the question with regard to the amendment for the Collins line, and insisted that it was not in order under the rule, that the action of the Senate had settled the question; at least it did to my mind, that this bill was an omnibus, to which anything might be offered as an amendment; especially did I think so when I saw that we entertained an amendment making an appropriation for sufferers by Creek depredations. This amendment, it seems to me, is to provide for a similar class of cases. It is true, this money is to be paid to a single individual, but he is the assignee of a number of individuals. But whether the money is to be paid to one individual, or to many individuals, the character of the claim is precisely the same. It is to pay for certain expenses incurred by the Government in connection with the removal of these Indians. If we could put into this bill an appropriation paying forty or a hundred individuals $350,000, it seems to me that when an amendment is offered for paying an assignee of a number of individuals nearly $40,000, it must come precisely within the same rule, and be admitted upon the same ground.

Mr. BELL. I will not argue this question, but I wish to say that this appropriation stands precisely, in regard to its admission under the rule, on the footing of the amendment which I offered the other day under the instructions of the Committee on Indian Affairs, to provide payment for depredations committed by the Creek Indians. I cannot discriminate between the nature of the two claims as to whether one be a public, and the other a private one. For myself, I cannot see any difference in the nature of them. I will not debate this matter. I simply rise to say that I act under the directions of the Committee on Indian Affairs. In all these cases in which I have presented amendments under the orders of the committee, I have not the slightest feeling connected with them. There is no person whom I wish to benefit by this amendment. It is not particularly in my charge in any form or manner, except as I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to offer it. When that committee come to a conclusion in which I concur, I generally earnestly attempt to carry out their directions. That is all the interest that I have in this matter.

I think we cannot well discriminate between the nature of this claim and the one which was received the other day in regard to the Creek Indians; but if it be the pleasure of the Senate to lay down a rule in this particular case which shall be the governing principle for their conduct hereafter in reference to all analogous cases—if we here see clearly that there is a necessity for laying down such a rule, although I should regret that it was thought proper to apply it just at the moment when this claim was presented, after having been pending here so long, and having received favorable consideration so often, yet, if there be any great object to be answered by excluding this, and fixing the rule at this point of time, I shall have no objection, but shall submit with great cheerfulness to whatever the Senate shall decide.

Mr. BADGER. I do not mean to say anything upon the question before the Senate. I merely rise to give notice that to-morrow I shall lay on the table of the Senate a resolution to rescind so much of the rule as excludes the offering of amendments providing for private claims to appropriation bills. I shall do it, not from any particular objection to that provision as it stands, but because it will be tolerably manifest, before we have been long acting under the rule, that we shall take up as much time in discussing what is to be a private claim as would be necessary to investigate its merits, and either adopt or reject it. To obviate that, I give notice that I shall to-morrow submit a resolution rescinding that portion of the rule.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will submit to the Senate the question, whether this is a private claim. The Senator from Tennessee offers an amendment, to make provision for paying an assignee under a contract for removing the Choctaw Indians from Mississippi and Alabama. Under the rule, no private claim can be offered to an appropriation bill, as an amendment; and it is simply for the Senate to decide whether this is a private claim which is excluded from being offered as an amendment under the rule. As it is a very difficult and delicate matter to distinguish in all cases whether a claim is a public or a private one, the Chair, wishing the Senate to decide the matter for themselves, will leave it to them to say whether it is a private claim which is excluded by the rule.

Mr. CHASE. I would ask whether this amendment may not be considered by unanimous consent, notwithstanding the rule?

Mr. BADGER. It certainly cannot.

Mr. CHASE. I believe this is a very meritorious claim, but still my conviction is very clear, with the Chair, that it is a private claim. At the same time, it seems to me, we might, by unanimous consent, consider it, notwithstanding the rule.

Mr. PEARCE. I cannot conceive how this claim can be viewed in any other light than as a private claim. I believe it is set up by certain contractors who engaged to remove the Choctaw Indians. They stipulated with the Government to convey those Indians to their new homes in the West, at a certain price per head. It seems that there were difficulties in the way of their emigration. The Indians refused to go, because they were not furnished with a certain amount of scrip which they wanted, before they started, to pay their debts. They did not, therefore, go when they were expected to go, and the contractors lost money in consequence of their refusing to go at that time. I think that is the foundation of one part of the claim. The Government did not contract to pay these persons the money which they now ask. We appropriated for them the money which the Government contracted to pay. But they say that the Government failed to do something else, which was necessary to enable them to carry out their contract without loss, and therefore they ask to be indemnified. Then again the contractors were called upon by the Indians to furnish them with certain articles necessary for their comfortable removal, which were not included in the contract, but were beyond it. We were informed that the Indians would not have gone, if they had not been furnished with those articles. The contractors furnished them, relying on the justice and liberality of the Government to reimburse them. All this constitutes an equitable claim (if it is anything at all) to reimbursement from the Government; but, if it does not constitute a private claim, it seems that to me there are no such things as private claims. Hence I would have felt bound to sustain the decision of the Chair against the reception of the amendment; but as the Chair has submitted the question to the Senate, I feel bound to declare by my vote that this is a private claim.

Mr. MASON. I do not entertain a doubt but that this is a private claim; and yet I feel myself constrained to vote to admit it as an amendment to this bill. I do so because I understand that the Senate, by a formal vote a few days ago, declared that claims of this character, although they were private claims, do not come within the rule which has been read. When another amendment was offered by the Senator from Tennessee, to pay to certain individuals claims which they had against the Government for alleged Indian depredations, the same objection was made, but it was overruled.

by the Senate, and the amendment was received, although it was afterwards rejected. I feel myself bound to acquiesce in that construction which the Senate has placed upon its rule; though I do not entertain a doubt that this is a private claim, yet I am reluctant to mete one measure to one set of claimants, and another measure to another. I feel bound to say, therefore, that although it is a private claim, I do not think it comes within the rule as the Senate has construed it.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will put the question to the Senate to decide, whether it is or is not to be construed as a private claim, which is excluded under the rule. Those who consider that it is a private claim, which is therefore excluded by the rule, will say "Aye."

Mr. BELL. If the Chair will pardon me, I would suggest that it would be better to submit to the Senate, the question whether they will entertain this amendment?

The PRESIDENT. The Chair has to conform to the rule.

Mr. BELL. There has been some discussion with regard to the nature of the claim. Gentlemen have undertaken to define what is a public and what is a private claim. It is a very difficult undertaking to draw the line between them. I think the chairman of the Judiciary Committee would find some difficulty in laying it down correctly. But I trust that, under all the circumstances of the case, this claim will be considered. It has been before the Senate so often, that it can be acted upon immediately and without debate. If it is not, in the opinion of the Senate, well-founded, it can be rejected. I do not care now to go into the nature of the claim, but I wish to say a word as to the remarks of the honorable Senator from Maryland. He has stated some points of the case, but not all of them.

Mr. PEARCE. It was not necessary to state all.

Mr. BELL. I understand that the honorable Senator thinks this is a private claim, and that he also supposes that a large portion of the amendments which the Committee on Indian Affairs are in the habit of offering to these appropriation bills are for private claims. Others entertain a different opinion. Many Senators think that they are public claims, and as well entitled to be received and acted upon as any other case where an appropriation is made. This claim arises under a law of the United States providing for the removal of these Indians. What the honorable Senator from Maryland said, was well enough so far as it went. Whilst these gentlemen were in the midst of the performance of their contract, the Government of the United States thought proper to change the law in regard to the right of these Indians to certain compensation to which those gentlemen looked at the time for their remuneration.

The Indians relied upon scrip for one half the reservations which they sold on the Mississippi, which were to be paid to them on their arrival at their new homes. While these gentlemen were performing the contract, after they had removed perhaps some ten or twelve hundred of the Indians, and were in the process of removing some six or seven hundred more, Congress provided that no such payment should be made to the Indians. I simply state this in order that the Senate may see the ground upon which the claim stands. I hope that we shall admit the amendment, and allow the claim.

Mr. CASS. In addition to what was said by the honorable Senator from Virginia, I merely wish to remark, that I understood the proposition precisely as he did. It seems to me, that the Senate the other day, by a solemn vote, put a construction on its own rule, which necessarily includes this claim. I was among those who voted with the minority on that occasion. I think the yeas and nays were taken on the point, whether an amendment to appropriate $350,000 for Creek depredations was not a private claim? The Senate decided that it came within the rule. And now I should like to know what distinction can be drawn by which a claimant for $10,000 for Creek depredations comes within the rule, and a claimant for relief under the Choctaw treaty does not come within the rule. The Senate has put a construction on its own rule. It admitted that proposition as being in order. I then voted in the minority; but I have no disposition to set myself up in opposition to the decision of the Senate. I am not willing to make one measure for one man and another for another.

The PRESIDENT. Whatever may have taken place heretofore is another question. The rule is positive, as the Chair has stated. If this is considered to be a private claim, it cannot be received under the rule; but if it is not considered as a private claim, it is a proper amendment to be offered. It is for the Senate to say, after hearing the discussion with regard to the nature of the claim, whether they so consider it. The Chair is unwilling to exclude anything that may be properly offered, no matter what his individual opinion may be. He submits the matter to the Senate to say whether they consider this such a private claim as is excluded under the rule, or whether it is such a claim as is justified in being provided for by an amendment.

Mr. CASS. I had not the slightest idea of impugning the decision of the President. I think he is perfectly right. I voted so the other day. I think this is a private claim; but I think the Senate has put a construction on its own rule by which it is bound to admit this. A majority of the Senate have determined that cases like this are not to be considered as private claims; and having so decided, I am unwilling to make a difference between those cases and this.

Mr. BUTLER. My friend from Tennessee has made allusion to me as chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary. He thinks that the distinction between a private and a public claim is not very definite. I think that in some respects this is so; but I think that this clearly falls within the class of what would be called private claims. I concur fully with the Chair in that respect. If you are to make this bill a vehicle for all the claims that may be attached to it, of course, as my friend from Virginia says, it is an impediment thrown in the way of business that may prevent the bill passing within the time that it is called for. As regards the opinion which has been supposed to exist heretofore in the Senate, it cannot control me in the vote that I shall give. I think the Chair, on all these questions, ought to have his independent opinion.

Mr. MASON. The honorable Senator from South Carolina stands in the relation of law adviser to the Senate, being chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary. I should be very much disposed to be governed in my vote by his opinion on such matters. I have taken the same view of this question with the Senator from Michigan. I do not entertain a doubt that this is a private claim. That is my individual opinion. But I put this question to the honorable Senator from South Carolina, whether the construction placed upon a law by a tribunal competent to place such a construction, does not become a part of the law itself? Now, if the Senate have determined that claims of the class to which this belongs are not private claims, then it is a part of the law that they are not private claims, and of course they do not come within the rule. That is the consideration which governs my vote.

Mr. BUTLER. If the judgment of the Senate has been given upon a similar question, of course we ought to be controlled by that judgment. I do not know how far this is distinguished from the question which has been heretofore decided by the Senate, and therefore I cannot answer my friend. I have not had the benefit of the discussion on that subject. So far as regards this question, I have no difficulty as to my judgment. How far it should be controlled by the decision of the Senate on another question, I am not prepared to decide, for I have been absent from the city, and have not heard the discussion and decision.

Mr. CHASE. I have only a single suggestion to make to my honorable friend from Michigan, and that is, whether the devotion which he now avows to a single precedent of the Senate is quite consistent with the great law of progress. [Laughter.]

Mr. CASS. I take it, that this is not a precedent at all. It is the established rule of the Senate, affirmed by a solemn vote. If a year or two had intervened, so as to allow a little progress, the point of the Senator might be well taken; but in the progress of a day I have not much faith.

Mr. BELL. I wish to call the attention of the honorable Senator from South Carolina to exercise his acumen in seeing whether I am right or wrong, in what appears to me to be the fair construction of this rule. The rule provides:

"No amendment proposing additional appropriations shall be received to any general appropriation bill, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or some act or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session, or moved by direction of a standing committee of the Senate, or in pursuance of an estimate from the head of some of the Departments."

An amendment proposing additional appropriations is in no case admissible unless in one of these excepted cases. Then the rule proceeds—and this is the point to which I wish to call the attention of the honorable Senator:

"And no amendment shall be received whose object is to provide for a private claim, although the same may have been previously sanctioned by the Senate."

I think this restriction clearly shows that if such an amendment be moved by direction of a standing committee, it is not excluded. I leave it to the honorable Senator from South Carolina to say whether there is any such limitation. There are in the first clause of the rule three or four cases of exception. The second part provides that no private claim shall be received as an amendment, although it may have been previously sanctioned by the Senate. That is one of the exceptions in the first clause of the rule. It seems to me, then, that a private claim can be moved as an amendment by direction of a standing committee, or in pursuance of an estimate. I think the restriction only applies to where such a claim has been previously sanctioned by the Senate. The rule does not preclude private claims moved by direction of a standing committee, or in pursuance of an estimate by the head of one of the Departments.

The PRESIDENT. The rule excludes private claims altogether.

Mr. BUTLER. I cannot agree with my friend from Tennessee in the construction which he has given to the rule. I have my own opinion in regard to the matter. I understand him to go so far as to say that an amendment may be offered even for a private claim, provided it has received the sanction of a standing committee, and that any private claim can be incorporated into this bill, provided it has the sanction of a previous estimate, or was moved under the instruction of a standing committee. I cannot go that far. I think the Chair in this respect is certainly right. The latter clause is a perfect exclusion of all private claims from bills of this kind. It excludes them in all cases. In that view, I think the Chair is correct.

Mr. BADGER. Mr. President, if a word were necessary to show that my friend from Tennessee has fallen into an entire mistake in his interpretation, I think it will be evident from this fact. According to his interpretation, if a gentleman introduces a bill for paying a private claim, and the Senate unanimously pass that bill, and it goes down to the other House, the Senator admits that if an appropriation bill comes up, you could not move that provision as an amendment to it; but if an amendment is reported by a standing committee, or if a member of a standing committee is directed to move an amendment, for the purpose of paying it, then he says the subject is in order to be considered by the Senate. Now, that cannot be a just rule of interpretation which makes the direction of a standing committee superior to the decision of the Senate.

The meaning of that exclusion to which the Senator has referred, was to show that a private claim should not be moved as an amendment under any circumstances; and for the purpose of showing that it could not be moved under any circumstances, the highest and most consequential and influential circumstance was specified, to wit: when the private claim had received the sanction of the Senate.

I would not have ventured to make these suggestions but for the fact that the Chair has submitted this question for the opinion of the Senate, and hence it seems to be proper that we should, all of us, seriatim, say what we think of it.

I am clearly of opinion that if the Senate has ever passed a private claim since I have been a member of the body, this is a private claim. If the Senate has never passed a bill providing for a private claim, then I admit this is not a private claim.

I do not exactly agree in the reasoning of my friend from Virginia, [Mr. MASON,] that because the Senate, as he supposes, in a certain instance, voted a claim to be a public claim which was really a private one, we are therefore to repeal that rule; for that is his argument—that is the position to which his argument leads. According to it we can never correct a misapplication of a rule. But I do not hold, with the Senator, that the Senate has decided that any claim parallel with this is a public claim. The distinction between the case which has been referred to by my honorable friend, and the case now under consideration, is obvious. This claim is private in all its parts; and, as I have said, if it is not a private claim, then we have never passed one.

I am for repealing that part of the rule relating to private claims; and I have given notice that I shall offer a resolution for that purpose. But I do not wish it to be understood that I am going to repeal it by a vote that is not in force. I wish to have it repealed by the regular action of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will put the question in this form: Senators who consider that the amendment can properly be offered under the rule will say "Aye;" those who think that, being a private claim, it cannot be offered under the rule will say "No."

The question being taken, there were—ayes 18, noes 19.

So it was decided that it was not in order to offer the amendment.

Mr. BADGER. I wish to submit an amendment to this bill, and I will offer one word of explanation. I think that the Senate will immediately see the propriety and necessity of it. It is to come in at the end of the appropriation paying for the floating sectional dock contracted for in California. The dock will shortly be delivered there. The question is still pending before Congress, whether Congress will have the appendage of a pier or of a basin and railway. That question is undecided. Whichever may be adopted, two or three years must elapse before they will have either. In the mean time, it is necessary that some measure should be adopted for preserving and taking care of the dock. In the act of 1850, which made an appropriation for a dock, basin, and railway, the Secretary of the Navy was directed to authorize the proprietors to use the dock, when it was not needed for the public service, for private purposes. In a communication, addressed to the Committee on Naval Affairs, he desires that Congress would direct him to take what measures might be necessary. It is for Congress to decide how the matter shall be disposed of. It is necessary to make some provisions for the security of the dock until the Government shall have its own establishment there. To accomplish that purpose, I move to insert the following amendment:

And the Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to permit the contractors for the erection of the said dock, for such term of years as he may deem expedient, to use the same on their own account for repairing merchant vessels, when not required for the use of the public vessels of the United States. The said contractors agreeing, in consideration thereof, safely to keep the said dock, and to indemnify the United States against any injury to the same, except the natural decay of the materials, while used by them; and to surrender the same at the expiration of the term in good order and condition, and also giving such security and in such form, for the faithful performance of the agreement, as may, by the said Secretary, be deemed proper.

Mr. DAWSON. This is an important amendment, involving a principle upon which I would like to have an opportunity to reflect. I may be in favor of it; but I wish to look into it. It seems to me to involve the principle of farming out the public property by contract for a length of time. In order to have an opportunity of examining it, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. BADGER. If my friend will withdraw the motion for a moment, I wish to say a word.

Mr. DAWSON. I will withdraw it.

Mr. BADGER. I have not the least desire in the world to press the amendment upon the Senate. I brought it forward because the Secretary of the Navy had thought proper to submit to the Committee on Naval Affairs the fact, that when the sectional dock gets to California, there will be no place to take care of it; and unless some place is provided, or some provision of this sort made, it will be ruined. Having offered the amendment, I care not one copper what is done with it. If it is lost, it will be through no agency of mine. I think that when the Government has paid three quarters of a million of dollars for a structure, it is worth while to make some temporary arrangement for its reception. But I do not want to delay this bill; and as gentlemen seem disposed to talk on this proposition, I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. SHIELDS. I wish to offer an amendment, which I think will give rise to no discussion.

Mr. BADGER. You are mistaken about that. I thought my amendment would not be discarded.

Mr. SHIELDS. I wish to get rid of it at any rate. I have had it in my hands for some time ready to offer. The Committee on the District of Columbia have directed me to offer an amendment to appropriate a sum of money to repair the Long Bridge, which has been swept away by the late flood, in a temporary manner. The object is to place it in such a condition that it may be passable until action can be taken in regard to a permanent bridge, or some other structure. An estimate has been made, at the request of the committee, stating that it can be done for $12,000. I hold the estimate in my hand. It is somewhat lengthy, pointing out all the particulars. If there is any objection to the amendment, I shall not press it to-night. But I hope there will be no objection to it.

Mr. BADGER. I have a very decided objection to it.

Mr. SHIELDS. The amendment which I am instructed to offer is the following clause:

For the repairs of the Long Bridge, across the Potomac, a sum not exceeding $12,000; to be expended under the direction of the Commissioner on Public Buildings.

On motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 20, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill for the construction of military roads in Oregon Territory.

Mr. McLANAHAN here obtained the floor.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I wish to make an inquiry of the Chair—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McLANAHAN] rises to address the Chair. The Chair does not know what he proposes, and will hear him.

Mr. McLANAHAN. I wish to make a statement to the House. The first Monday in June is the day fixed by law for holding the district court in the District of Columbia. The chief justice of the circuit court is the judge of the district court, and of course possesses original jurisdiction. It is well known in this House that the chief justice of the circuit court, from protracted illness, and from the infirmities of old age, is not able to discharge his official duties.

Mr. ROBINSON. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. McLANAHAN. I will occupy but a moment, and I hope the gentleman will not raise a question of order. On the first of this month a bill passed the Senate, to provide for the holding of the district court of the District of Columbia, in cases of sickness or other disability of the district judge.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would ask if the permission of the House has been given for this speech.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McLANAHAN] is called to order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It will take the entire week to dispose of the territorial bills. No other time, I am satisfied, will be set apart for the disposition of these bills; and I want to make an inquiry of the Chair. Is it now in order to move to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to take up that business? and if so, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole, what will become of the territorial bill now before the House? When will it come up again?

Mr. McLANAHAN. I have the floor, I believe, and I have not yet indicated to the House what is my desire.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is the question I make upon the gentleman.

Mr. McLANAHAN. I am sure if the gentleman will listen to the suggestion I was about to make, he will not raise the point of order, but allow this bill to be taken up and passed. It is a matter of pressing public necessity.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McLANAHAN] asks the unanimous consent of the House to take up the bill indicated by him, providing for the holding of the district courts in the case of the sickness or other disability of the judges.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I object.

Mr. ROBINSON. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report a bill relating to the territorial business, now under consideration before the committee. It is in relation to the ports in the Territory of Oregon, and is a report from the Committee on Commerce, who have had that subject under consideration. The bill is to designate the ports in the district of Oregon, and to fix the compensation of the collector at Astoria.

No objection being made,

Mr. SEYMOUR, from the Committee on Commerce, reported "A bill to authorize the President of the United States to designate the places for the ports of entry and delivery for the collection of the district of Puget's Sound and Umpqua, in the Territory of Oregon, and to fix the compensation of the collector at Astoria, in said Territory," which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SCUDDER. I ask the consent of the House to make a report, if the gentleman from Illinois will yield me the floor for that purpose.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts for that purpose.

Mr. SCUDDER, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Territories a bill to provide for additional clerks, and to extend the sessions of the Territorial Assembly of New Mexico; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RICHARDSON] submits a motion that the rules of the House be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the special order. The Chair must say to the gentleman that the business first in order is, the bill which was under discussion yesterday for the construction of military roads in Oregon; and that the gentleman from Illinois, his colleague, [Mr. BISSELL] was upon the floor, and is now entitled to the floor on that bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The question I wish to get at is this: If we go into the committee this morning, does not the bill now before the House, as unfinished business, come up to-morrow, or any subsequent morning, as the first business in order?

The SPEAKER. It is the first business in order, and the gentleman's colleague [Mr. BISSELL] is entitled to the floor, and cannot be deprived of it by a motion to go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ROBINSON. I desire to ask whether the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RICHARDSON] can make the motion to go into the committee if there is any objection?

The SPEAKER. It would be perfectly in order if the gentleman can get the floor to make the motion, but he cannot do it while his colleague [Mr. BISSELL] is upon the floor upon the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. BISSELL. I yield the floor to my colleague to make the motion.

Mr. STUART. I wish the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RICHARDSON] for a moment. It is perfectly obvious, in the present condition of things, that we can do nothing in the Committee of the Whole upon the territorial business, until we come to some understanding with gentlemen in the House; and, unless we can get such understanding, we had better discuss all these measures in the House. I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RICHARDSON] to allow the discussion to go on in the House until such a state of things can be arrived at.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is my intention, upon getting into the House, to endeavor to obtain the floor, and move to terminate debate upon each of the bills as they come up, and thus restrict the debate to the merits of the bill, under the five minutes rule.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. RICHARDSON, and it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the special order, (Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee, in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. The first business in order before the committee is House bill No. 41, "granting the right of way and making a donation of the public land to the Territory of Minnesota, to aid in the construction of a railroad from the Falls of the St. Louis river to St. Paul, on the Mississippi river."

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is a bill that ought to be discussed, and I have no doubt that gentlemen desire to discuss it upon its merits. I ask that it may be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk was proceeding to read the bill when—

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, (interrupting,) said: I understand that it is not the intention of the friends of this bill to press its consideration now. It does not, strictly, come within the range of territorial business; and I propose that it be passed over informally.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move to lay that bill aside, and that we take up the next bill on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. It can be passed over informally, by unanimous consent.

No objection was made, and the bill was informally passed by.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE TERRITORIES.

The CHAIRMAN. The next bill in order before the committee is House bill No. 252, "to authorize the legislative authority of the several Territories to control the appropriations to be made by Congress for the support of the government of said Territories."

The bill was read by the Clerk.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move that the committee rise, with the view of closing debate.

The question was taken on the motion, and it was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman of the committee reported, that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, had had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the special order, being House bill No. 252, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move that debate upon House bill No. 252 be terminated within ten minutes after the committee shall have again resumed its consideration.

The question was then put, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. STUART. I move that the rules of the House be suspended, and that the House again resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the special order.

The question was then put, and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of House bill No. 252.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The bill under consideration explains itself, I think, pretty much by its reading. The best explanation I can give of it, is to let the Clerk read it, and let the committee give their attention to that reading.

The only object of this bill is this: The Department find some difficulty, when appropriations are made for the purpose of defraying the expenses of their Legislature, in settling their accounts. Under the practice now, I believe the Secretary of the Territory goes on and makes his purchases of stationery and such things as that. We propose to change that by giving to the Territorial Legislature the power to direct the mode and manner in which such purchases shall be made. They have not the power to divert the appropriation from the object intended by the Government in making it, and they cannot exceed the appropriation. This is the whole object of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no amendments to this bill it will be laid aside to be reported to the House.

Mr. CARTTER. Let the bill be read.

The bill was accordingly read by the Clerk.

Mr. FOWLER. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Territories, who has control of these funds, as the law now stands?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman repeat his inquiry? I did not hear it.

Mr. FOWLER. I understand that the object of this bill is to give the Territorial Legislature the control of the funds appropriated by Congress. My inquiry is, who has that control as the law now stands?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Under the construction of the law, a question has arisen in some of the Territories, as to who has the control.

Mr. FOWLER. That is my inquiry. Who has the control as the law now stands?

Mr. SIBLEY. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RICHARDSON] will allow me to answer, I will state the matter in a few words. There is now a question between the Secretaries of the different Territories and the legislative authorities of those Territories, as to who has the right to control the disbursement of those moneys, and the mere object of this bill is to set that question at rest.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I stated in the outset that the object of this bill is to place these appropriations for the necessary expenditures of the Territories under the control of the Legislatures of the Territories.

No amendment being offered to the bill, it was laid aside to be reported to the House.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS IN MINNESOTA.

The next bill in order before the committee was House bill No. 253, making an appropriation for the completion of the public buildings in the Territory of Minnesota; which was read by the Clerk.

The bill appropriates $25,000 for the completion of the public buildings in this Territory.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move that the committee rise, with a view to terminate debate upon this bill.

The question was put on the motion; and it was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman of the committee reported, that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the special order, being House bill No. 253, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move that all debate in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon House bill No. 253 be terminated within ten minutes after the committee shall have again resumed its consideration.

The question was then put, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the special order.

The question was then put, and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly again resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of House bill No. 253.

Mr. STUART. It is not necessary to detain the committee in explaining the objects of this bill. I will simply state, that from the report of the Governor, it is understood the sum of $25,000 will be sufficient to complete these buildings. The bill is very specifically drawn, and explains its own objects, which are, the completion of the State buildings and the penitentiary in the Territory of Minnesota.

Mr. HOUSTON. How much has been already expended on these edifices?

Mr. STUART. The original appropriation, I understand, was $20,000.

Mr. HOUSTON. Twenty thousand dollars have been expended for these two edifices.

Mr. SIBLEY. The original appropriation was $20,000 for each object. There is still an unexpended balance.

Mr. STUART. It has been expended, or will be expended.

Mr. HOUSTON. What is the unexpended balance now on hand?

Mr. CARTTER. The honorable gentleman [Mr. STUART] derives his authority from the representations of the Governor of the Territory, who has reported the deficiency required to be made up. I wish he would communicate that document to the committee, so that we may understand it.

Mr. STUART. I have not the document here, but it can be sent for.

Mr. SIBLEY. I have to state that the whole of the accounts for this expenditure were presented in the report of the Governor, which was sent to the committee, and they acted upon that report. All the items of expenditure required by law to be made, are under the direction of the Governor and Legislative Assembly. They are required to make all the appropriations to carry out the objects of Congress in making the grant.

Mr. CARTTER. Was the original appropriation supposed to be sufficient to complete the building?

Mr. SIBLEY. No, sir.

Mr. FOWLER. I wish to make an inquiry of the honorable gentleman, their Delegate from the Territory. I perceive that this bill proposes a sum of $25,000, part to be laid out in the completion of the capitol at St. Paul, and the remainder to the completion of the prison buildings at Stillwater.

Mr. STUART. You are right.

Mr. FOWLER. I wish to ask whether this sum is supposed to be sufficient to complete both sets of buildings?

Mr. SIBLEY. If the gentleman will allow me, I will state to him that I have a letter from the Governor, in which he gives it as his opinion that the sum of $25,000 will be sufficient to cover all expenses in the completion of these buildings.

Mr. FOWLER. At both places?

Mr. SIBLEY. Yes, at both places.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no amendments to be offered to this bill, it will be laid aside to be reported to the House.

No amendment being offered, it was laid aside.

SALARIES OF TERRITORIAL OFFICERS.

The next bill in order before the committee, was Senate bill No. 175, entitled "An act relating to the salaries of officers of the Territories of the United States," and to repeal the proviso in the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1852, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1851.

The bill was read by the Clerk, as follows:

Be it enacted, Sec. 1. That if any officer of any Territory of the United States shall hereafter absent himself from such Territory, and his official duties, for a period exceeding sixty days, in any one year, without leave of the President of the United States, he shall not be paid any salary for the period of such absence, unless good cause for such absence shall be shown to the satisfaction of the President.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the proviso contained in an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the payment of the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and fifty-two," approved March third, eighteen hundred and fifty-one, relating to the payment of the salaries of the officers of the Territories of the United States, be and the same is hereby repealed; and the salaries of said officers which have heretofore accrued, shall be paid, anything in said proviso to the contrary notwithstanding.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee on the Territories have proposed to amend the bill by striking out all after the enacting clause, to the end of the bill, and insert the following, viz:

That whenever any officer of either of the Territories of the United States shall be absent therefrom, and from the duties of his office, no salary shall be paid him during the year in which such absence shall occur, unless good cause therefor shall be shown to the President of the United States, who shall officially certify his opinion of such leave to the proper accounting officer of the Treasury, to be filed in his office.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the proviso contained in an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the payment of the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government, for the year ending the thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and fifty-one, relating to the officers of the Territories of the United States," be and the same is hereby so modified, as to authorize the payment of the salary of any officer therein named, notwithstanding such officer may have been absent from such Territory, and his official duties, for more than sixty days: Provided, The President of the United States shall certify officially his opinion that the absence of such officer has been for good and sufficient cause.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move that the committee rise, with a view to terminate debate upon this bill. I will state, Mr. Chairman, that I shall not propose to limit the debate upon it so soon as I have upon the others; but I wish the debate limited so that we may not be again engaged in the discussion of national politics.

Mr. GORMAN. I have an amendment to propose before the gentleman makes that motion. The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order at this time.

The question was then put on the motion, and it was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman of the committee reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the special order, being Senate bill No. 175, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move that all debate in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon Senate bill No. 175 be terminated in one hour after the committee shall have resumed its consideration.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to strike out "one hour," and insert "three hours." This is a bill of considerable importance. It is one involving the question, whether you will pay the territorial judges and officers when they absent themselves from their posts.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will accept that amendment, for I think the matter should be debated.

The question was then put on the adoption of the resolution as modified, and there were, on a division—ayes 73; noes not counted.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House again resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question was put, and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly again resolved itself into committee, and resumed the consideration of Senate bill No. 175, in regard to the salaries of the territorial officers.

Mr. SIBLEY. It is not my intention, sir, to make any long explanation of the bill now before the committee. I wish to remark, however, that during the last Congress it was found necessary, in consequence of the continued absence of the officers from Minnesota and Oregon Territories, that some measure of a stringent character should be adopted by Congress, with a view of keeping those gentlemen at their posts. The honorable member from Tennessee, [Mr. GENTRY,] who is not now in his seat, moved that clause in the appropriation bill, which provides that if any officer shall absent himself from his post, for a longer period than sixty days at one time, he shall lose his whole salary for the year. I consider that a very proper provision, although it doubtless might operate unequally and perhaps unjustly in particular cases. Most legislation of a general character, is necessarily attended with injustice to individuals, but when such a case arises, Congress should promptly redress any such injury.

The bill which passed the Senate at this session, and is now before the House, contains provisions which do not meet with my approbation. That bill effectually annuls all the previous legislation on the subject. It provides that every officer who absents himself for a period of sixty days, or more, from his post during the year, shall not lose his salary for the whole year, but merely the pro rata compensation for the period he may be absent. That I contended against as not sufficiently precautionary in its character. I stated to the Committee on Territories that I did not believe it would have the effect to keep territorial officers at their posts. The Committee on Territories, at the urgent solicitation of the Delegates of the Territories, have replaced that clause in its original form. They now provide if an officer is absent any time—there is nothing about the restriction of sixty days—from the field of his official duties, he shall lose his salary for the entire year, unless he can procure a certificate from the President that he had good cause for his absence. I regard this as absolutely necessary for the protection of the public interests of the people of the Territories. Gentlemen may differ, and do differ, in regard to this particular power proposed to be placed in the hands of the President, to grant officers of the Territory certificates for their absence for causes satisfactory to him. I, myself, have no opinion to express on that subject.

The honorable Delegate from Oregon [Mr. LANE] asked that his Territory should be made an exception, and the President, by the amendment which, probably, will be offered to this bill, will have no such discretion given him in regard to the Territory of Oregon that he has with reference to the other Territories. The Delegate stated it was a matter of great importance to the people of Oregon that that clause should be made imperative in its character—that no power should be left to the President, and the committee, at his earnest request, made it a special exception. I did not ask that to be done. I was perfectly willing to leave it to this House and the other branch of Congress to say whether they were willing or not to place this discretionary power in the hands of the President. My own view of the matter is, that if officers accept office in the Territories, for which they are well paid by the Government, they ought to be willing to remain there, and discharge the legitimate duties of the office. There are a great many gentlemen who are perfectly willing to accept those offices, who are capable of discharging properly their duties, and who will consent to remain there. But the Delegate from New Mexico [Mr. WRIGHTMAN] stated that if this clause was made imperative in its character, it would operate with great hardship upon some of the officers of his Territory, who were anxious to come to the States for the purpose of taking out their families. I was not willing to make Minnesota a special exception, as the Delegate from Oregon has done. I wish any law that may be passed by Congress to be general in its operation. I hope that the features of the bill sent us from the Senate will be modified so as to conform to the original clause. I am in favor of making the provision as stringent as is consistent with justice to all, and if the officer does absent himself without at least showing good cause therefor, he should not be paid one dollar of his yearly salary.

I do not know exactly what will be the effect of bestowing upon the President the right to make exceptions for cause. I think the bill, as now submitted to the committee, in other respects, and perhaps in that also, is proper and just—just to the people of the Territories, and just to the Government and its officers. If I could suppose that the discretion contemplated to be given to the President, in the substitute offered by the Committee on the Territories, would be abused by favoring those officers only who can bring political influence to bear upon him, I would certainly be very averse to granting even to the President any such power. But, as I before stated, I am willing to leave that question to be settled by the two Houses of Congress, who can decide it better than I can. I am only anxious that the provisions of the bill may be made sufficiently stringent to secure the people I have the honor to represent here against the evils of a continued absence of the judicial and other officers of the Territory. I have now stated all I desire to in regard to the character of this bill, and I will not now consume the time of the committee by a further discussion.

Mr. STUART. Mr. Chairman, I think that the amendment of the Committee on the Territories, as printed and laid on our desks, requires to be amended so that, after the word "opinion," there be inserted these words: "That the absence of such officer has been for good and sufficient cause."

Mr. GIDDINGS. The amendment reported by the committee was written in a very bad hand, and the word "cause," in consequence, has been printed "leave." If the word cause be substituted, it will render the proposed amendment to the amendment unnecessary.

Mr. STUART. That will answer my purpose. I move to strike out the word "leave," and in its place to insert the word "cause."

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I will suggest that that will not entirely secure the object desired to be accomplished. It seems to me that with the word "cause," substituted for "leave," all that will be required to enable the absenting officer to receive his salary is to get the President to officially certify, in his opinion, there was cause, without at all stating whether the absence was for good or bad cause.

Mr. STUART. I think I can satisfy the gentleman by reading the section. It is as follows:

"That whenever any officer of either of the Territories of the United States shall be absent therefrom, and from the duties of his office, no salary shall be paid him during the year in which such absence shall occur, unless good cause therefor shall be shown to the President of the United States, who shall officially certify his opinion of such cause to the proper accounting officer of the Treasury, to be filed in his office."

It expressly provides that the absence shall be for good cause shown to the President, and he is to certify his opinion that it is for good cause.

Mr. PHELPS here made a remark which was inaudible at the Reporter's desk.

Mr. STUART. Now, the proviso which is sought to be modified by this bill contains the provision that for an absence of more than sixty days by any territorial officer, from the Territory, and the duties of his office, he shall forfeit his salary for the entire year. That is the provision of law as it now stands; but the committee propose in this bill to modify that only so far as to allow any such officer to satisfy the President of the United States that he has good cause for such absence, and upon the official certificate in writing of that cause, and not otherwise, is the pay to be obtained.

Mr. PHELPS. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Michigan, whether the officers are not paid quarterly, and if so, whether, after serving three quarters the officer should absent himself the remaining one, we could recover the three quarters' salary which had been paid?

Mr. STUART. If the gentleman wishes to provide against any such contingency as that, there is no objection to the insertion of such an amendment in the bill. There is no such provision of law now. The proviso which the bill from the Senate seeks to repeal forfeits the salary for the year. The Committee on Territories thinks that that forfeiture is correct, unless good and sufficient cause can be shown therefor. Now, I apprehend there is no difficulty on the part of the officers who pay these salaries to see this law well executed. I know some of the territorial officers complain that they cannot get their pay under it, and, therefore, I think the law is being executed.

Mr. PHELPS. The gentleman certainly does not recollect the proviso to the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, which it is proposed to repeal by the bill now pending.

Mr. STUART. The Senate bill proposes to repeal it, and for that the Committee on Territories propose a substitute, merely modifying the proviso of the law as it now exists.

Mr. PHELPS. They propose a modification for it prospective, and not retrospective.

Mr. STUART. Both.

Mr. PHELPS. I will now state that the officers, during the time of their absence, cannot receive their pay; and if they do not remain there for the period of three months they are entitled to no pay, for their salaries are paid quarterly. I will refer to a provision in the civil and diplomatic bill:

"Provided, That the salaries specified above for any of the officers of any of the Territories of the United States shall not be paid in any case where any of said officers shall absent themselves from said Territories and their official duties for a period of time greater than sixty days."

I am, therefore, opposed to any further legislation upon the subject. I think the provision in the civil and diplomatic bill is amply sufficient to prevent them from receiving any portion of their salaries during the time of their absence, provided that absence shall be for a period longer than sixty days.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will state in regard to that provision, with the permission of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. STUART,] that the subject came up before the Committee on Ways and Means, and my impression is, that that committee were unanimous in its construction of the law as provided in the civil and diplomatic bill. I believe our construction was as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PHELPS] has stated it. I never for a moment believed that that law was intended to take from the officers of the Territories a year's salary; and when I heard it stated a few days ago, when that bill was up in the Senate, that such was the construction, I confess I was astonished. The Committee on Ways and Means had inserted in the civil and diplomatic bill of this session, what they considered was intended to be provided in the law, which is now in the hands of the gentleman from Oregon, [Mr. LANE.] That is, they have inserted that proviso, but in a more definite form. They have made it precise in its language, so as to provide that they shall not receive compensation for the time they may be so absent. The committee were unanimously of the belief that that was intended to be the law. That, in my opinion, is the true construction of the law, and for one reason at least as presented by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PHELPS.] This is the objection to the law as it is proposed—to the provisions reported by the Committee on Territories as an amendment to the Senate bill. The officers of the Territory enter upon the discharge of their duties, for instance, on the first day of the fiscal year. They remain there one, two, and three quarters of the year, and receive their salaries at the end of each quarter. That is the way our officers are all paid. They receive at the end of each quarter their respective salaries for the quarter; but if they absent themselves from the Territories at the end of the third quarter, unless they get from the President of the United States a certificate of good character, or of absence for good cause, then they forfeit the whole year's salary, and your bill does not provide any mode, any means, or any process, by which they are required to pay back to the Government the three quarters' salary which they respectively may have received. When they have it in their pocket, how are you to get it back?

Mr. STUART. I do not want the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] to be making a speech in my speech. I think it is a bad practice. I have very great respect for the legal opinion of the gentlemen constituting the committee of which the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] is the chairman, but I have been unable, from an inspection of the proviso, or from the speech that the gentleman has just made with my leave—which I understood was to be a speech explanatory of that opinion—to come to the same conclusion as that committee, and the gentleman, that the true construction of the law is, to withhold the salary for the time of absence merely. Here is the law:

"Territory of Oregon—For salaries of governor, three judges, and secretary, $10,500.

"Territory of Minnesota—For salaries of governor, three judges, and secretary, $8,700.

"Territory of New Mexico—For salaries of governor, three judges, and secretary, $8,700.

"Territory of Utah—For salaries of governor, three judges, and secretary, $8,700.

"Provided, That the salaries specified above for any of the officers of any of the Territories of the United States, shall not be paid in any case where any of said officers shall absent themselves from said Territories, and their official duties for a period of time greater than sixty days."

The construction which has been given to this proviso by the Departments is, that you cannot pay a man any of his salary for the year, if he is absent more than sixty days from the Territory, and the duties of his office. That is the literal meaning of the proviso, and it is as plain as anything is susceptible of being made by the use of English language. It does not say for the time he is absent, but it says, "provided the salary specified above shall be paid," &c. What is that? It is the whole salary of each one of these officers. I say that the proviso forfeits the entire salary.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a simple question? He says under that proviso, if these officers absent themselves longer than sixty days they forfeit the entire year's salary. But suppose they remain at their posts, discharge their duties for the first three quarters of the year and get their pay, and then, as soon as they have pocketed it, they should leave and be absent the fourth quarter?

Mr. STUART. The only difficulty with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] is, that he is talking about one subject and I another. I am answering the argument of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON,] that, by the construction which this proviso has received from the Committee on Ways and Means, it does not apply to any time, except the time during which the officer is absent. I say it is not susceptible of any such construction, and nowhere else has it received such construction.

Mr. CARTTER. Does the law provide for the payment of these salaries quarterly?

Mr. STUART. I understand it does; and gentlemen all around me seem to think so. I wish to say a word upon that point. I said to gentlemen some time ago, if there was supposed to be a practical difficulty in carrying out the provisions of this law, it was very easy to obviate it by proposing a further amendment to the bill. There is no difficulty in doing that. These objections, which have been urged by gentlemen around me, do not affect at all the construction of the law of which I speak. If the salaries are payable quarterly, so that a man may draw three quarters of a year's salary and be absent sixty days, and only loses the remaining quarter of the year, why let the law be amended; and if no other gentleman will do it, I will propose an amendment myself, which will carry out that object. The amendment which I have offered to the first section of the committee's amendment, to insert the word "cause" for the word "leave," is amply sufficient to carry out the objects intended by the committee, unless there be a difficulty, such as is suggested to me, about the time at which the salaries are respectively paid. I do not wish to consume the time of the committee. I will simply state, that among the delegates who represent these Territories, there is no difference of opinion as to the propriety of this law. So far as the law extends there is no difference of opinion among them. The gentleman representing the Territory of Oregon wished an exception to be made as to that Territory, in reference to any officer leaving at all. He objects to any officer leaving that Territory, even with the consent of the President of the United States, and the committee have acquiesced in his request, and they have made that Territory an exception.

Mr. LANE. It is not in the bill.

Mr. STUART. The Territory of Oregon is to be made an exception by the agreement of the committee. I confess that, so far as my own judgment goes, I think the Delegate from Oregon is right. I think the officers should stay there, or not go there. The committee, finding that the Senate of the United States have passed a bill containing provisions which they think are not proper, have reported this bill, throwing upon the President of the United States the responsibility of the execution of these laws. If any discretion is to be given at all, it should be given to that officer. It is his duty to see that these laws, among others, should be faithfully executed. Cases may arise—cases perhaps have already arisen—where the absence of the territorial officer was necessary and proper. The President can be satisfied of that necessity. Being so satisfied, the amendment proposed by the committee requires him to certify it officially to the proper accounting officer, so that his opinion shall be so clearly stated as to rest entirely in the first place upon his responsibility. In the next place, it is to be filed with the proper accounting officer, so that at any time, and at all times, the propriety of that opinion can be ascertained by the legislative authority of the country. And if this discretion is to rest anywhere, I doubt not it is properly vested by the provisions of the amendment which the Committee on Territories propose to this Senate bill. That under the circumstances such a provision should exist, a majority of that committee were satisfied. A further amendment being necessary to this bill, in order to accommodate the views of the Delegate from Oregon, I propose to do what the committee did, but the amendment seems not to have been printed. The committee, in regard to these provisions, introduced an exception—"except as to the Territory of Oregon."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman having offered an amendment to the amendment, he cannot offer this.

Mr. STUART. I shall propose it, then, at the proper time.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. With the permission of the gentleman, I will state, that this question is brought here in consequence of certain judicial officers leaving the Territory of Utah. It is to relieve those officers, and give them the salary which the accounting officers of the Treasury, in their construction of that proviso, will not pay to them. It seems that the original proviso under consideration, involves the condition that these officers shall not be paid where they are absent from the Territories for more than sixty days. I wish to inquire of the gentleman, who is a member of the Territorial Committee, if he is aware of the fact, whether those judicial officers ever did go to the districts to which they were assigned in the Territories, and actually entered upon the discharge of the duties of their office, or did they merely go into the Territory of Utah, to the city of Salt Lake, and there, for certain reasons satisfactory to themselves, determine to leave the country, without ever going to their districts, or entering upon the duties of their offices?

Mr. STUART. I will answer the inquiry made by the gentleman from Tennessee, as far as I understand that subject. Perhaps I ought to say, that I am not aware that the Committee on Territories are possessed of any information that has not been open to everybody, connected, at least, with the Congress of the United States.

As I understand this subject, the territorial judges of the Territory of Utah never did enter upon the discharge of their duties, and never did go to their respective districts; and, so far as I know, at the time they were there the Territory had not been divided into districts.

This subject of the territorial judges of Utah is one which the Committee on Territories thought ought not to be decided by Congress. My own opinion upon this question it is not necessary to state. But I take this view: that it is a question to be decided peculiarly by the Executive. The duty of the Executive of the United States is very plain. If these officers discharged their duty properly, or if they used every effort incumbent upon them to discharge those duties, and were prevented by any local cause, from doing so, they ought to be paid. If, however, they did not discharge their duty, or did not make a sufficient effort to do so, then it is equally clear that they ought not to be paid. They have made their report to the President of the United States, and the Governor of Utah has made his. It is the peculiar province, as I have before remarked, of the President to see the laws faithfully executed. He nominates these officers, and appoints them, by the consent of the Senate. They are held to be subject to his control, as far as removal is concerned. He has exercised that control; and, as I understand, has notified these officers that they must return to their duties.

Now, if there be any cause sufficient to justify the payment of these officers, what tribunal under our institutions so well understands the extent of that cause—who so competent to decide it as the President of the United States? Certainly, he should decide it. It is a responsibility that belongs to his office. It is one that, in my judgment, can be better exercised by him than by Congress itself. Therefore, sir, I very much prefer the amendment proposed by the Committee on Territories of the House, to the repeal of the proviso. I think the proviso should not be repealed. The effect of adopting the Senate bill and repealing the proviso would be to pay these officers without any inquiry as to whether they have properly absented themselves or not. The effect of the amendment proposed by the Committee on Territories would be to refer it to the President of the United States to decide whether they have absented themselves for good and sufficient cause. If they have done so, then they ought to be paid.

Now, sir, I am opposed to the Senate bill. I was opposed to it the other day. When it was brought into the House, I objected to it and moved its reference to the Committee on Territories for the purpose of considering it. I am as clear now as I was then that this proviso ought not to be repealed. Such an unqualified repeal would produce the effect to which I have just alluded; it would pay these officers without any further inquiry, which in my judgment should not be done.

The Committee on Territories, as will be seen, has carefully refrained from expressing any opinion which might prejudice this question one way or the other. If, however, the House differs with us; if the Committee of the Whole sees fit to retain the proviso as it stands, without any qualification whatever, or if they see fit to adopt the Senate bill repealing it, the whole subject is open before us and we can act upon it as we please.

I have thus stated, as briefly as I could, the grounds upon which the Committee on Territories have acted, and the reasons which have governed us in reporting this amendment to the House. I have also stated another amendment which ought to have been printed with this bill, in regard to the Territory of Oregon, and I will not trespass longer upon the attention of the committee.

Mr. WASHBURN. Mr. Chairman, I am of opinion that there will be time enough for gentlemen to discuss the question particularly under consideration, as much as they desire, and I will therefore occupy a few minutes of the time of the committee upon other subjects.

[Loud cries of "Oh! no."]

Mr. WASHBURN. I understand that it has been the universal usage of the House, when in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to permit great latitude of debate.

Several MEMBERS. Let the discussion of the bill go on.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I make the point of order, and I intend to insist upon it, that the gentleman is not in order in discussing other questions, not now before the committee.

Mr. PHELPS. I appeal to the gentleman from Maine to allow the discussion of the bill to proceed. The debate can only last two hours longer, and there are several gentlemen anxious to discuss the bill. I hope he will not occupy the time in discussing other matters.

Mr. WASHBURN. If I supposed that I could obtain the floor again, and that the two hours would be occupied without going into the discussion of political matters, I would very willingly waive my right to the floor for the present. But if I should yield the floor, it is quite likely that some other gentleman would take it, and make a political speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must arrest this debate. No debate is in order on a question of order. If the gentleman from Illinois insists on his question of order—

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do insist on it. I gave notice yesterday that I should do so.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the Chair is obliged to decide that remarks, such as the gentleman from Maine proposes to make, are not in order.

Mr. WASHBURN. From that decision I appeal, because I understand that it has been the universal practice to allow great latitude of debate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the question of order, that the remarks proposed to be made by the gentleman from Maine—the nature of which he has stated—not being at all applicable to the bill, are out of order. The Chair decides that such debate is out of order, and from that decision the gentleman from Maine appeals.

Mr. ORR. I believe that it has been the uniform practice of the House to allow general debate upon these—

Mr. STUART. I call the gentleman from South Carolina to order. The appeal is not debatable.

The CHAIRMAN. No debate is in order on a question of order.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. One of our rules expressly declares that when a gentleman is called to order in making a speech, the question shall be decided without debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is aware of that rule, but if the gentleman from South Carolina has a suggestion to make the Chair will hear it.

Mr. ORR. I desire to make a single suggestion to the gentleman from Maine. Whilst I do not concur in the opinion of the Chair, I hope the gentleman from Maine will not take up the time of the Territories, which is very limited. He can make his speech at the beginning of next week or at the conclusion of this. But by going on now, he may do great injustice to the Territories.

Mr. WASHBURN. I should be happy to yield the floor now, if I could have any assurance that I should get it again the last of this week, or the first of next.

Mr. STUART. The gentleman can easily do it, for the territorial business closes this week.

Mr. ORR. These Territories are dependent on us for their entire legislation.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If I was not compelled to do it, I would not make the point of order on the gentleman from Maine, and would permit the general discussion to go on. But these bills ought to be considered; they ought to be passed or defeated, and there is only this week to do it. I am afraid that even if there is no political discussion—if we discuss the questions legitimately—we cannot get through all the territorial business that ought to be done.

Mr. ORR. There are only two days left for it. Mr. WASHBURN. Since it seems to be the general opinion of the committee that I ought to postpone the remarks which I propose to make, I will do so, with the hope that I may be able to obtain the floor again before long. I withdraw the appeal.

The appeal was withdrawn.

Mr. CARTER. A proposition is now pending before the committee—if I understand the bill under consideration—to repeal a provision which I will presently read, and substitute in its place a forfeiture of current salary for sixty days. The reason assigned for doing that is, that the provision proposed to be repealed forfeits the salary for the entire year.

As I understand it, a difference of opinion has arisen respecting the construction of the section. It is agreed by all, I believe, that the provision is a salutary one, provided it does not operate as a forfeiture of the year's salary. What is the provision? After enumerating the salaries of the officers, the proviso proceeds to recite, "that the salaries specified above for any of the officers of any of the Territories of the United States shall not be paid in any case where any of said officers shall absent themselves from said Territories and their official duties for a time greater than sixty days." Now, I assume to say that the language of that provision is limited to the time of the absenteeism more than sixty days, and that there is nothing in the language of the law that conflicts with this construction of it, and that the reason of the rule is with that construction. What is the provision of the law? That the officer shall receive a certain salary, say one thousand or fifteen hundred dollars a year, and that that salary shall be paid to him quarterly. The proviso does not relate to money that has been paid to the officer, or the repayment of money that has been advanced to him for his salary, but to money to be paid to him. He shall forfeit the money that would be due to him on the quarter of his absence, in the order of its payment—an absence preceding the order of its payment. You can put no other construction on the provision.

Mr. STUART, (interrupting.) I submit to the gentleman from Ohio whether this is or not the plain reading of the law, although not perhaps the precise language—"Be it enacted, that each of the judges of the Territory of Utah shall receive for the current year a salary of $1,500: Provided, that such salary shall not be paid to either of said judges if he shall absent himself from said Territory, and from his official duties, for the space of sixty days."

Mr. CARTER. No such thing. I am endeavoring to show that that is not the right construction. If that had been the construction of the law, their salaries would have been made payable at the expiration of the year, and not quarterly. But the gentleman's conclusion involves an absurdity. It says you shall not pay the money which is paid under the law, without any provision for the reimbursement to the Government of the moneys advanced by the Government, or paid in virtue of the law.

But another reason given for the introduction of the provision to remodel this law, is the absence of the officers of the Territory of Utah, as I understand it. It is said that the Department has refused to pay their salary. Now, this construction of duty on the part of the Department may be right. If so, it is very easy to rectify the difficulty by making an especial provision for the payment of their salary, or by providing an amendment to this proviso, such as shall meet the case, by adding "voluntary absence from the Territory for ninety days;" that would remove the difficulty, and, at the same time, retain the salutary provision of the law, which ought not to be blotted from the face of the statute-book. I will read this proviso again, with a view to show what real necessity there is for carrying out the recommendations contained in the report of the Committee on Territories:

"Provided, That the salaries specified above for any of the officers of any of the Territories of the United States, shall not be paid in any case where any of said officers shall absent themselves from said Territories, and their official duties, for a period of time greater than sixty days."

"Shall absent themselves," is the language of this proviso. Now, I hold that the rational, reasonable, and authorized interpretation of the phrase is, that they shall not absent themselves without cause. The obvious intention of Congress, in making the proviso, was to avoid the voluntary abandonment of duty. That was the intention. It did not contemplate any application to those whom necessity shall compel to leave their posts for a time. The language is, "shall absent themselves," which means, under a reasonable, rational construction, when they shall leave the Territory of their own voluntary choice, upon their own free will. And I hold that the Executive branch of the Government would have been acting within the pale of their duty, if, when these officers had been driven from the Territory, it had paid their salary; and I further hold, that it was an act of pusillanimity and cowardice upon their part, in not paying it. Here is the report, and it is the only evidence I have seen, touching the conduct of the officers in the Territory of Utah. That report was made to the Executive, and by him communicated to this House. That report sets forth that the government of Utah, created by the Administration, in the first place, employed itself in desecrating all the names honorable and noble, in the United States, and all of the officers of the United States, residing in their polluted society. After that, these men were subjected to threats and violence, and obstructed in the discharge of their public duty. In fact, they never entered upon their duties at all, because they could not. But this territorial government, constituted by the Administration, for Utah, set at open defiance the organic laws of the Territory. They paid no respect to the provisions of that law, in the election of their representative in this Hall, or in reference to any of the functions enjoined upon them by the organic law. These officers—United States officers—set forth that personal peril compelled them to leave the Territory. According to that report, which, in its historic account of the conduct of that people, is unfit to be read even in this House, because it is too obscene a record—this Governor Young, this inspired prophet of hell, [laughter]—this appointee of this pusillanimous Administration [laughter] not only condemned the Government of the United States to hell, but everybody in the Government. He abuses them—I will not read from the reports—but he abuses them in language of excessive profanity and obscenity—not respecting even the forms of decency—the official functionaries whom we sent there; and not acknowledging their responsibility to the Federal Government.

Under the influence of this exhibition, these men were compelled to come back. And who doubts that they were compelled to do it out of respect to the Government? Would you wish your public officers, then, on the fourth of July, to be compelled silently to sit by and see the flag of the United States danced into the dirt under the feet of ruffians? For this is what they report. Would you wish to have them sit silently by and hear the institutions of the country derided and blasphemed, in language of the most vulgar profanity, by this appointee of this Administration? This is what the Administration calls absenteeism upon the part of these officers! Is it such? Why, if there was a citizen of the United States appointed to an office of authority in that Territory who would not leave the filthy, polluted ground under circumstances like these, he ought to go unrewarded for absenteeism of manhood. [Laughter.] He could not do otherwise. But still I understand the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. STUART] to complain because they did not stand abuse enough.

Mr. STUART. I have no disposition to interfere with the episode the gentleman from Ohio is making upon this bill. But I rise for the purpose of correcting the gentleman. I stated distinctly that the Committee on the Territories had refrained, carefully, from expressing any opinion at all on the subject of which he speaks. I would not give my own opinion, and I did not give it.

Mr. CARTTER. Then all I have to say is, that this Committee on the Territories is following the illustrious example of this Administration. They bring in a report here from the Territory, and the Committee on Territories refrained from giving their opinion upon the subject, though all the world are advertised of the facts.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman allow me to make a single remark? The committee which drafted this bill did not think it came legitimately before it. For myself, I wish to state most distinctly that I have no opinions to conceal in relation to this matter. I do not think these officers could have remained there and maintained their own self-respect or a respect for the Government.

Mr. CARTTER. I was aware of the opinion of the honorable and manly Representative from Illinois [Mr. RICHARDSON] upon this subject; and I presume my honorable friend from Michigan [Mr. STUART] entertains the same opinion. But there is a strange delicacy of sentiment upon the subject. What is the condition of that country? Here is the appointee of this Government, with fifteen harlots around him, polluting the very atmosphere in which he lives, in broad daylight, and in open defiance of all the outward ceremonies of common decency; and yet that man is retained as Governor of that Territory. The men whom we have sent out there to administer the laws of the country are driven home by this ruffian, and yet gentlemen feel a great delicacy in reference to expressing an opinion before this body upon the subject, and of the Administration. I do not know what strange influence it is that produces it. I do not think it would have occurred in any other quarter of the Republic—never where law and a respect for common decency obtains. My own judgment is, that if the same exhibition of profligacy on the part of a public functionary, accredited by this Administration, and under its appointment, had manifested itself in any other latitude of the country, he would have been officially beheaded as soon as the lightning tracks could carry the intelligence of his infamy.

But here three young men, of good character and deportment, who entered upon their duties with the honest purpose of discharging them, under the authority of the United States, and not under the "Latter-day Saints"—with a responsibility to the United States, and not a responsibility to a degraded fanaticism—because they would not enter into the common prostitution of others, because they would not stand by, defenseless as they were, and see the Republic and its Government abused and condemned, and returned to testify to the Government the scenes of violence and outrage that transpired, amounting, in all the theory on the subject, to treason, were dismissed by this Administration. And this Governor, who set the whole authority of the Federal power at defiance, is retained there to fester and rot down the fabric of a new State in its infancy, and to make a burlesque of the power that made him. I want just to enter my protest against this business. I think the Government ought to respect its authority in the Territories. I believe the Government ought to respect the common sensibilities of civilized life in the functionaries it places over that government. I believe the Government, instead of attempting, by its own act, to disgrace these very men, ought to have sent them back with a force sufficient to protect them and the majesty of the Federal power there. And I think the Committee on Territories would not have been in advance of their well-known modesty, if they had reported to this House the suggestion that it would be well enough to protect the Federal Government in these Territories.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is truly unimportant for any purpose, except, perhaps, to place myself right, that I should make the short statement which I propose to make. I did propose in the Committee on Territories to change the existing things in Utah. I proposed to place power sufficient in the hands of the Administration to execute the laws there. That proposition failed in the committee in consequence of a tie vote. My proposition was this: I did not feel called upon to propose to send an armed force there. It was to make the marshal summon juries, and thus place in the power of the appointing power here the means by which the law could be executed, we having the appointment of the Governor, marshal, judges, and all the officers there, and whenever that officer, in the discharge of his duties, was arrested, the power of the Government could be brought to bear to execute its laws.

Mr. GIDDINGS. If my colleague [Mr. CARTTER] will permit me, I wish to say a word or two. I feel very much deterred, Mr. Chairman, in making any particular remarks concerning the morality of Utah. I had some very strange sensations come over me while my colleague has been alluding to certain usages in Utah in regard to that government. If I understand him, he objects to the morality of the Utah Governor, and alludes to a plurality of women.

A VOICE. Wives.

Mr. GIDDINGS. No, not wives. Within the last few days, Mr. Chairman, we have seen here in this city, in a leading print, notice given of an accomplished and handsome ladies' maid to be sold for money. To that my colleague takes no exception.

Mr. CARTTER. I beg the gentleman's pardon, I must—

Mr. GIDDINGS. I want to go through upon this question very much.

Mr. CARTTER. I cannot see the application of the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. GIDDINGS. My colleague will see the application when I get through. I know my colleague [Mr. CARTTER] agrees with me in sentiment.

Mr. CARTTER. I cannot consent to yield the floor, after the committee has treated the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WASHBURN] as it has, in excluding irrelevant matter from the debate upon this bill. I submit that I would be doing injustice to the committee to yield the floor for detailed remarks upon any other subject.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I am not going into details. It is only to great principles that I intend to allude.

Mr. CARTTER. Very well, I have but a few remarks to make, and the result of all this is—

Mr. GIDDINGS. Then I understand my colleague not to permit me to make the explanation which I desire?

Mr. CARTTER. I will permit my colleague to make any explanation pertinent to the subject under consideration, with great pleasure, as he well knows.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Of that pertinency I suppose I am the judge.

Mr. CARTTER. Rather than to be put in a false position, or rather the committee, in reference to an arbitrary objection, I will yield for his explanation.

Mr. GIDDINGS. It does appear to me that this question of the morality of that western people does not come legitimately before us. I protest against it. It is no part of our purpose here to investigate the morality of this distant people. I am acquainted with that people. I know what they were formerly. I was acquainted with many of their leaders, and I am, perhaps, in my capacity as a citizen, united with my colleague in the view which he takes of the morality of their habits and customs. But, sir, it is well known that here, things far transcending anything ever witnessed in Utah, are permitted by our own organization and by our own laws and authority—that here women are reared for market—

Mr. CARTTER. I cannot submit to this general discussion.

Mr. GIDDINGS. And I protest that while we are beholding such practices here—

Mr. CARTTER. I take the responsibility of resuming the floor. I was going to remark, in reference to this question between the Administration and the Governor of Utah, that we are reduced to this precise result, that the Governor there has set the Republic and its functionaries at defiance, and the Administration here has yielded to it, and Brigham Young is now in sovereign power in Utah, and to all this exhibition of insult and open defiance we are in submission. Now, that is the present attitude of the Government in its connection with Utah, and it is a humiliating result.

The only member of the court sent out to Utah that remained, was a Mormon, and he pronounced the legal decision—if the papers published it correctly—that a murder committed within the Territory of Utah, was a murder committed beyond the jurisdiction of the United States.

I do not understand that he has been removed. I mean Mr. Snow, and I believe another Mormon judge has been added to the list. A government in open outrage upon your Government, a Council or Legislature elected in defiance of the territorial organization, and a court pronouncing them beyond the jurisdiction of the United States! Now, sir, I blush to acknowledge the humiliation forced upon the Government under these circumstances. I look upon the plurality of their wives as the least of the evils, and that is enough to make a Sodom of Salt Lake City. It is the disrespect and defiance in this Territory of the power of this Government, that we are appointed here to protect, that constitute the chief evil in the manifestation of their conduct; and instead of making it necessary for these judges to have appealed to this House to be paid their salaries, the Executive ought firmly to have met it, and sent with them a guard to meet the treason, openly avowed, in the Territory from which they were driven. That is what should have been done—that would have been the Andrew Jackson way of doing it—and you would have heard no more about this contempt of authority. We would have had a report from the Committee on the Territories—they would have been disposed to make one.

Mr. STUART. I did not hear what the gentleman said some time ago, which called out the chairman of the Committee on Territories, as I was engaged at the time.

Mr. CARTTER. My remark was that a due respect for the well-known modesty of the committee—

Mr. STUART. The gentleman from Ohio just stated that, under other circumstances, the Committee on Territories would have made a report to this House. Now, sir, if the gentleman will allow me, I would like to state, in a very few words, what I think is the truth in regard to this matter, and not in reference to the domestic affairs there at all, because I have listened to the gentleman with considerable patience, to see what his argument had to do with the business now under consideration—

Mr. CARTTER. I have listened to the gentleman long enough, with patience.

Mr. STUART. I will state what the Committee on Territories have done. They have proposed by this—

Mr. CARTTER. I know what the committee have done. They have reported that bill proposing to repeal the payment, or the forfeiture, as they call it, by which they avoid the responsibility of speaking loud and plain upon the subject. That may not be the purpose, but it is whispered that as the Administration would take no responsibility about this matter, there had better be no responsibility taken in this House over the matter. That is what is whispered about, but I understand from the chairman—

Mr. RICHARDSON. Not upon the question of pay, but on another question.

Mr. STUART. When the gentleman gets through, we will be permitted to state what is the condition of things. I can state it plainly, if I have an opportunity.

Mr. CARTTER. The gentleman will be much more intelligible if he succeeds in doing it than he would be in the construction of the law; for the construction of the law provides no forfeiture. What is our duty as a House? My judgment is that it is to refer this subject back to the Committee on Territories, and to instruct them, under their discretion and wisdom, to report a measure to protect the sovereignty of this Republic in that Territory, and to set violence, defiance, and treason at rest there; or not to close this Congress without an acknowledgment that Brigham Young is more potent within the jurisdiction of the United States than the Constitution and its functionaries. I hope this may be done, or at least we may draw out some of the apologists for the conduct of this officer in that Territory, that they may let us know where the excuse for that conduct is to be found; and, if anybody is a liar in relation to it, to report what has transpired there, that we may know who the liars are. Let us have daylight upon the subject, and not blink the whole question by leaving an accused Governor in power there, and anarchy in triumph, and the Republic debased and degraded.

Mr GIDDINGS. Every member of the committee is aware of the proviso in the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill of last Congress. I will only say here that in the Senate, and among a portion, I think, of this House, the construction of that proviso did go to cut off the entire salary of the officer for the year, when he was absent from his duties. In accordance with this construction, the Senate enacted a bill providing that if he should be absent more than sixty days, he should incur certain forfeitures, unless the President should judge that he had good cause. In looking over the subject, the Committee on Territories, so far as my knowledge extends, came to the conclusion that the construction of this proviso was, at least, a matter of doubt. Some gentlemen would give it the construction that my colleague has, while others would give it the construction that the Senate has put upon it. It was thought best that this should be made clear and fixed, so that every territorial officer of the Government shall know what we mean by our laws. And here let me say, in reply to my colleague, [Mr. CARTTER,] that I will not take issue with him and say that he is entirely incorrect, nor with the Senate, that they are entirely incorrect. My own opinion is, that it is a doubtful question. If the officer be absent the first quarter of the year—and the accounting officers know that fact according as I understand the practice, they regard the salary as forfeited for the year. In other words, they regard the salary as an entirety for the whole year. This I believe to be the construction given by the accounting officers of the Government.

Now, sir, it is also true that if he be at his post, and draw the three fourths of his salary, and then absents himself during the balance of the year, the remaining quarter, you cannot get back the salary that has been paid. That may be the case; and so far as one member of the Committee on Territories is concerned, I, myself, and I think some other gentlemen agree with me, thought that it was better to have this thing distinctly understood, and to frame our law so plainly that both the officers of the Territory and the accounting officers should give the same construction. This was the object in reporting this amendment to the bill.

Now, one word, and only one word, in reply to my colleague concerning the people to which he has alluded in such terms of harshness. I do not believe that it is the best policy of this Government, or of Congress, to treat that distant people in the manner my colleague has suggested. Who is ignorant that that people have received abuse at our hands? that the people of our country have treated them badly, with cruelty, and that they have driven them from our borders? I do not wish to cast any imputation upon gentlemen from those Western States in which these Mormons resided; but we know that some of their people were murdered by lawless mobs, for which our State governments are responsible. In this way they were driven from our borders. They were compelled to leave, and they have gone into that far-distant wilderness. In my opinion, they did carry with them some of the feelings to which Brigham Young, in a very improper manner, gave expression, as alluded to in the report of these judges. I do not justify him, nor do I justify those feelings; but if we are to reconcile that people to our Government—if we ever intend to make them good and respectable citizens; we must treat them with kindness, with forbearance, with gentleness, and with justice.

With this view I dissent from the expression of feeling on the subject. I do—and I say it unhesitatingly to my colleague here—I dissent entirely from the proposition which he made of sending a military force there. No, sir! I believe an appeal to their feelings—an appeal to their patriotism, to their judgments, and to their conscience, would be more potent in bringing them to the condition of good and respectable citizens of this Union, and to qualify them to come into it as a State. It is in this manner we are to improve their morals, to which my colleague made such a feeling allusion; but I here take no issue with him on that point. All I object to is the extent of the philanthropy, and not to its principles. I want him to look nearer home. I wish to raise no question of ill-feeling or ill blood, but I want him to see and understand distinctly, that while we authorize the sale of women here in this city, I am not to be told that we shall punish the Mormons for deeds of less enormity. This thing is not well. I will not bring it up here, but we have as much right to bring them up in this connection as my colleague has in connection with the Mormons; and if we are going into the cruelty of the thing, let us look through the whole Republic, and not make examples of that far-distant people, of whom I have some knowledge, as many of them went originally from my own district.

Now, sir, let me say that the President of the United States is placed in office to wield the Executive power of the Government. I stand not here to justify that gentleman. He was not elected with my voice—with my support—with my influence; but, nevertheless, he is the President of the United States, and being in the discharge of these duties, I will hold him responsible for it. I will treat him as I would any other President, and having appointed Brigham Young to office, I will hold him responsible before the people. He has appointed those judges, and let him be responsible for their conduct; and in order to carry out that responsibility, and to permit him to discharge the duties of his office, I will give him the power to determine whether those judges were improperly absent from their duties—whether they can show good cause for leaving the Territories—and I believe they can do it to him, far better than they can to this body. He will be a far better judge than this House, or the two Houses, composed as we are of such numbers as to disable us from a full investigation. With this view, as one member of the Committee on Territories, I gave my voice for the bill which has been reported from the committee, to have our laws fixed—to place this responsibility upon the President. I have no fear that he cannot discharge it. These judges are the creatures of his appointment, and let him pass judgment upon them.

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Chairman, I see no necessity for further legislation than there has been upon this subject. From the discussion this morning, it appeared that the members of the Committee on Territories were in doubt whether the salaries of the territorial officers were paid by the year, or quarterly. Had they examined the acts establishing the territorial governments of Utah, New Mexico, and Minnesota, they would have found a positive enactment, that the salaries should be paid quarterly. I say, then, under the proper construction given to the existing law, if the officers are absent from these Territories for a period longer than sixty days, they would not be paid for the time they were absent. How are these officers paid? The Secretary of the Territory is the disbursing officer, who is furnished with the money to defray the expenses in the Territories; and if I am not mistaken, he pays the salaries of the civil officers.

Mr. SIBLEY. The Secretary of the Territory has nothing to do with the salaries of the other officers. They are paid upon the certificate of the comptrolling officers of the Treasury, and the drafts for their salaries remitted them from this city.

Mr. PHELPS. Perhaps I may have fallen into a mistake, in confounding these expenses with the legislative expenses of the Territory. The salaries are payable quarterly; therefore, so soon as the officer has remained in the Territory one quarter of the fiscal year, he may prepare his vouchers, upon which his salary may be paid to him, and he may thereafter absent himself from the Territory, and continue his absence from the Territory for more than one year, and the law provides no way for the recovery of the money thus paid. Hence, I say that the only proper construction which can be given to the existing law is, that the salaries of these officers shall not be paid, where their absence continues for a length of time from the Territory, or the discharge of their official duties, if more than sixty days. I am satisfied, in my own mind, we would have saved the trouble of considering this bill, if it had not been for the purpose of obtaining the payment of the salaries of these officers who have fled from the Territories.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTTER] seemed to think that no officers had left the Territories, but the officers of Utah. Was he not aware that the chief justice of New Mexico, Grafton Baker, had been in this city this winter, and absent from that Territory ever since some time in the month of September last? He is still absent, and not at his post to which his duty calls him, and yet he is to be paid, under the provisions of this bill, as well as the judges of Utah. It seems to be peculiarly unfortunate that any officer of the Territory of New Mexico should have absented himself, for the last advices from that Territory show that the people of Santa Fé at that time believed that an insurrection was about to take place, and they had received the information, that upon a particular day, an attack was to be made upon the "Exchange," in the city of Santa Fé. I happen to have received this morning the St. Louis Republican, containing information brought in by express from Santa Fé. It appears, that previous to this time, Governor Calhoun, of New Mexico, had issued an order releasing every prisoner in the jail in Santa Fé. He suggests to the authorities of Santa Fé, that it is better for them to prepare to guard and protect their property.

But I will read a short extract from that paper.

"The Santa Fé Gazette publishes a letter from Governor Calhoun, addressed to Thomas Ortiz, Prefect of Santa Fé county, which certainly exhibits a curious state of affairs in New Mexico. It is in these words:

"EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
March 31, 1852.

"SIR: Moved by a regard for the protection of property, I would respectfully recommend that you establish a temporary police. For the want of funds to maintain them, and upon the representation of the proper officers, that the prisoners now in jail are in a starving condition, through a humane feeling towards said prisoners and community, I have granted them a conditional pardon. This release may render precautionary steps advisable for a few nights. Respectfully, J. S. CALHOUN."

"The people of Santa Fé were much excited by apprehensions of insurrectionary movements, and it was even said that the night of the 11th was assigned for an attack upon the 'Exchange,' as the commencement of these proceedings. The military officer, in command of some thirty men, was, however, acquainted with their plans, and was prepared for them."

Here you have one of the judicial officers of that Territory, absenting himself from that Territory since some time in the month of September last—if I am not mistaken as to the date—up to the present time, and it is now rumored that perhaps he will return to that Territory; and yet, by the provisions of this bill, it is left discretionary with the Executive, whether the salary of that officer shall be paid during the time he has thus absented himself from the discharge of his official duties. I am unwilling to place the Executive in that position, that he shall have persons beseech him to give a certificate that the officers have been absent for good cause, and that he would recommend the payment of their salaries, because gentlemen may come here without leave of absence, and may obtain a powerful political influence to be exerted upon the Executive, which he can hardly withstand. Upon this bill, I am not intending to discuss the propriety of the payment of the salaries of judges in Utah, nor the propriety of the payment of the salary to Judge Baker. I say there is no necessity for further legislation upon the subject.

The second section of the amendment, as recommended by the Committee on the Territories, I remark, has entirely a retrospective action. That second section is the only portion of the bill which may be considered as worth anything to those territorial officers. It provides, that the payment of the salary of any officer therein named, that is, named in the civil and diplomatic bill, notwithstanding such officer may have been absent from said Territory and his official duties for more than sixty days, may be paid, provided that the President of the United States shall certify officially his opinion that the absence of such officer had been for "good and sufficient cause." Now, if it be right to pay these officers, why go forward and attempt to change an existing law, merely to suit the case of these officers? Why not introduce a bill appropriating to these men a certain amount of money for the time they have absented themselves from the Territories?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to say, by way of reply to the interrogatory which he has put, that the committee did conceive that a change was necessary. I may as well state here, that in a portion of the Territories the law as it now exists can be evaded. A judge from Minnesota can be absent fifty-nine days, then go back, and it does not affect him. He can thus absent himself nearly the entire year by getting back within the limited period of sixty days. The officers of the other Territories cannot do so. As to the objection raised by the gentleman, that if you leave this matter with the President of the United States, a political influence can be brought to bear, causing him to make an improper official statement, I think it is sufficiently met when we say that we commit to his hands great interests belonging to the Government with which we are willing to trust him. Yet gentlemen are not willing to trust him with the duty of making an official certificate in relation to the performance of duty by the judges.

Mr. PHELPS. As to the last answer of the gentleman, I have this to say, that the President shall officially certify his opinion, according to the provisions of this amendment, that the absence of such officer has been for good and sufficient cause. We know in regard to these certificates, and for the purpose of obtaining them, that legal evidence will not be presented. It will be based on letters of gentlemen who desire to benefit their friends. Perhaps the gentleman making the statements may not believe it would be beneficial to the interests of the Territory that the judge should absent himself, but that the private business of the officer would call him from the Territory for some time; perhaps the plea of ill health may be used in order to justify an absence. The writers of such letters will care nothing for the interests of the people of the Territories, and the letters will express more than they would be willing to verify by their oaths. The President will perhaps give too great credence to it. Aye, both may overstrain the mark, the gentleman in making the statement, and the President in basing his certificate upon it. In reply to the remark of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. RICHARDSON,] that officers might evade this law by being absent fifty-nine days, I know that this may occur; and I presume that the person who drafted this provision in the civil and diplomatic bill had reference to laws already existing upon your statute-books, which provided that the salaries of Indian agents shall not be paid during the time they absent themselves from the discharge of their official duties, provided that absence shall be for more than sixty days. Many of these agents live directly upon the borders of the State, where they may absent themselves fifty-nine days, as the gentleman himself has supposed, and still, if they are not absent sixty days at any one time from their posts, they are entitled to their salaries during the whole period of time. We have that provision upon our statute-book. If it be right to modify the law applicable to the officers of the Territories, I ask, if it is not right to change the law relating to Indian agents? I know it is not a matter under the jurisdiction of the committee.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That question of Indian affairs has not engaged our attention. I will state to the gentleman, I believe it is necessary that this provision of the law should be made applicable to all the officers of the Government of the United States; that you should keep them at their posts, and at their duty. I do not know how an Indian agent can transact the business connected with his agency by spending the winter in Washington. I understand that this is done in many instances.

Mr. STUART. I wish to make a suggestion, which the gentlemen of our committee will recollect. This very subject of the Indian agents was brought to our attention, and we decided that it was a subject with which the Committee on the Territories had nothing to do.

Mr. PHELPS. I only referred to it by way of illustration, not as a matter over which you had control or jurisdiction. If it be the object of the gentleman to change the law, and make it better, why not then do, as is the wish of the delegation from some of the Territories upon this floor, and forfeit the salary of the officers during the whole year, if they shall absent themselves? The Territory of Oregon has suffered materially in consequence of the absence of their judges. I recollect, not long since, seeing the statement of the length of judicial service performed by the three judges. I believe that, in some eighteen months, or two years, there should have been from four to six years of judicial service, counting the three judges as one, and that Territory had only about one year's service of her entire judiciary.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The difficulty that has been suggested by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PHELPS,] has been suggested by several gentlemen. I wish to reply to it; and if I am able to do so, I will endeavor to satisfy those gentlemen. They think the difficulty arises in this way. The judges receive their salaries quarterly.

Mr. PHELPS. Such is the law.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Suppose an officer draws three quarters of his salary, and then leaves the Territory. There is a method by which we can reach this matter by amending the bill; and that is, when an officer leaves the Territory, let it work a forfeiture of his office. That is one way in which you can frame a law to meet the case supposed by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PHELPS,] where a judge receives three quarters of his salary, and, at the end of nine, ten, or eleven months, absents himself and retains his salary. Adopt an amendment providing that in such a case it shall work a forfeiture of his office, and no evasion will be attempted.

Mr. PHELPS. I think myself, there is no necessity for any amendment. I think there is no necessity of any legislation upon the subject. I am endeavoring to show that we should be in as much perplexity after the passage of the bill as amended by the Committee on the Territories, as we are now. We are to make this measure carry through a bill to pay these judicial officers. In my humble opinion, we should never have heard of this bill if it had not been that one of the provisions of the bill sent down to us from the Senate, expressly provides that the salaries of officers which have been heretofore withheld by virtue of that provision in the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, shall be paid to them, any law to the contrary notwithstanding. That was the legislation in the other branch of the Capitol, and that is why we are asked to pass this bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. My own opinion is, that by lodging the power in the hands of the Executive, you would have more uniformity in the decisions than you would have if you left it to Congress to pass bills for the relief of each particular officer who has to leave the Territory, and I apprehend that in some instances, it is necessary for them to leave. Now, we all know that it is not always the most meritorious claims that pass Congress first, or at all. Kissing goes a good deal by favor here, in the passage of claims.

Mr. PHELPS. The officer absenting himself from the Territory, should forfeit his office. I believe the President of the United States has exercised the power of removing the judge of a Territory. If I am not mistaken, he exercised it not long since in the Territory of Minnesota. When, therefore, you find a judicial officer pursuing the course suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, and absenting himself repeatedly—remaining in the Territory barely a sufficient length of time to prevent his salary being stopped—there is a method by which that evil can be reached. Let the Executive do his duty—remove the officer, and appoint in his place some man who is willing to reside at the post assigned to him, and perform the duties of his office. I do not believe that in selecting officers for these Territories, it is right to send out broken-down politicians from the States, and pension them upon the Treasury of the United States—men who have no sympathies with the people of the Territories, and who do not stay there except for the purpose of drawing their salaries. I was speaking just now of the fact that the Executive has removed a judicial officer of the Territory of Minnesota; and, if I mistake not, the nomination of his successor is now pending at the other end of the Capitol. I do not expect, if you provide for the forfeiture of office, it will entirely cure the evil. If it be the construction that these officers are judges of the United States, and must hold their offices for a period of four years, or during good behavior, the insertion of this provision in the bill that they shall be removed from office on this account, does not remove the constitutional objection, and therefore the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Illinois is nugatory, and cannot be adopted.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will state to the gentleman from Missouri, that when this question of the power of the Executive to remove was mooted in the Territorial Committee, there was no difficulty about it. He has the power, and he has exercised the power, but you cannot compel him to exercise it. You may, however, provide by law that the officer, by doing a particular act, shall forfeit his office. The power to remove can still be exercised by the Executive. We did not deem it necessary, however, to provide for a forfeiture of office.

Mr. PHELPS. Then I understand that the gentleman from Illinois concedes that the Executive has the power to remove these territorial judges.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. PHELPS. But yet, the gentleman is willing to let these judges absent themselves, and to leave it to the President to decide whether they shall receive their salaries during the time of their absence. He says that the existing law, the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, is objectionable, because the officer may leave the Territory, and be absent fifty-nine days, returning in time to prevent his salary being stopped, and that the President will not discharge his duty by removing the officer who thus seeks to evade the law of the land. Now, I am for the existing law. I want no new law passed upon this subject. At any rate, I want none in the form of the provisions now presented.

I know nothing of the difficulties which have arisen in regard to the payment of these Utah officers. My impression is, that they were only in the Territory some two or three weeks, and that their salaries did not commence until they reached Utah. I doubt, myself, whether any of these judges have made application to the accounting officers of the Treasury for the payment of their salary for those few weeks. If the accounting officers of the Treasury have made the decision in this case, which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. STUART] has stated, I should like very much to see that decision. Did the gentleman make the statement merely upon rumor, or has he seen the decision?

Mr. STUART. I will state to the gentleman that all I know about the decision of the Department is what I have been informed of. I have no certificate from them.

Mr. PHELPS. Does the gentleman say he has no information from them?

Mr. STUART. The gentleman's question, as I understand it, is whether I know that the accounting officers have decided that this proviso forfeits the salary for the year.

Mr. PHELPS. I understood the gentleman to have received some information on the subject.

Mr. STUART. I said that I understood it from conversation.

Mr. PHELPS. From rumor?

Mr. STUART. No; from the officers themselves.

Mr. GORMAN. I can say to the gentleman from Missouri, that I am the attorney for one of the judges in New Mexico in drawing his salary, and know all about what the Department have decided. They require the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. WRIGHTMAN] and myself, to certify, from information and correspondence, that the judge to whom I allude—Judge Watts—has not been out of the Territory for the length of time specified in that appropriation bill—sixty days. They require that proof, and they have decided that absence exceeding that time forfeits the year's salary.

Mr. PHELPS. That decision I do not approve of. I do not concur in the opinion of the accounting officers. But I do not think it necessary to legislate in every instance where the decision of the accounting officers may be wrong.

Mr. HENN. With the permission of the gentleman from Missouri, I would inquire of the gentleman from Indiana, whether the salaries are paid quarterly?

Mr. GORMAN. The accounting officers pay me quarterly, upon the drafts of Judge Watts.

Mr. PHELPS. The laws establishing the territorial governments of Utah and New Mexico, provide that the salaries of the governor, the judges, and the secretary, shall be paid quarterly.

Mr. STUART. I propose to state, in a few words, in reply to the gentleman from Missouri, why the Committee on Territories think that legislation is necessary.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I dislike to interrupt the gentleman from Michigan, but he has occupied the floor once already, and I desire to say a few words upon this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan having spoken once upon this bill, the gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor. The Chair gave the floor to the gentleman from Michigan, because no other gentleman claimed it at the time.

Mr. STUART. If any other gentleman desires to speak, of course I yield the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with some attention to the whole of this debate, and I confess that I cannot concur in voting for either the Senate bill or the amendments. In my judgment, the true course is to repeal the proviso at once, which I look upon as somewhat degrading to our statute-book. What are the facts? The facts are these: the President of the United States appoints the territorial judges; he is responsible for their appointment, and he is responsible for their continuance in office. If they neglect their duty or abuse their trust, he has full power to remove them without assigning a cause, and to appoint their successors. Now, the other officers of this nation, appointed by the President of the United States—for instance, the judges of the districts of the States—are required to occupy in the discharge of their official duties but a certain portion of the year—many of them, perhaps, not half of it. It is not expected that they will stay in their districts for the balance of the year. If, when they have discharged their duties, they choose, for profit or for pleasure, to travel over these United States, they have a right to do so, and it would be degrading to them and to the country to pass a law to imprison them. But you apply a different rule to the Territories. The number of judges in Minnesota and Utah is three; and I understand that all the duties there can be performed in six weeks. At all events, considering the number of inhabitants there, surely the judicial duties can be discharged by those judges in three or four months. They have their regular terms. If they attend those regular terms, and discharge the duties of their offices, are not they to be permitted during the balance of the time to travel, as other citizens of this country do? Are they not to be permitted to go to the watering-places if they please, or to visit their friends for a portion of the time? Are these judges supposed to be made of that stuff, and to be selected of that material by the President, that they are to be absolutely imprisoned within certain boundaries, and, if they exceed those boundaries, are to have a forfeiture inflicted upon them, as was the case when prison bounds were in force? In Vermont they had prison bounds at one time, and they have now. They allow a prisoner to go within those bounds—sometimes a mile, sometimes a township—if he gives bonds; but if he goes beyond those boundaries—if his family live beyond them, and he goes at night to see them, he forfeits his bonds. So it is with the judges of these Territories.

Mr. RICHARDSON, (interrupting.) There is a necessity for the judges remaining in the Territories during the entire year. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is aware that there are many duties that a judge has to perform, besides those that he discharges while holding the terms of the courts.

Mr. STEVENS. Is not it so with every judge and every judicial district in the States, and yet who ever heard of passing a law impounding your judges, and keeping them in prison? You have three judges in each Territory. But one is needed except in court time; and the others may be absent without prejudicing materially the interests of the Territory. But if your judges are unfaithful, you have a remedy. Turn them out, and appoint others in their places. It has long been a settled law in this country that the territorial judges, the Congressional judges—I do not speak of the constitutional judges—are removable at the pleasure of the President, without giving his reasons therefor. But if the President will not remove them when they abuse their power, or when they neglect to discharge their duties, he is responsible.

A MEMBER. Upon what authority can he remove them?

Mr. STEVENS. A gentleman inquires upon what authority he can remove them? I have stated that precedents and practice justify it. It has been so decided, and that decision has never been reversed; and silence must give it sanction. It has been decided in the only place where it can be decided. These officers are appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

A MEMBER. The Attorney General has given the same opinion.

Mr. STEVENS. I know the Attorney General has given his opinion, but I do not consider that of any higher authority than that of the President and the Senate. If the case were a new question, I might doubt. But I have so high a respect for the authorities when a question is once officially decided, I bow to it whether I consider the position right or wrong. Well, then, I say that, the President having the power, it is his duty to remove an unworthy or negligent judge. And if a President failed to remove such a judge because he was a favorite, I believe he would certify a good cause for his absence, when that absence was a fact, whether a necessary fact or not.

Now, I believe the best method is to repeal the proviso altogether. Until 1851, I believe we never had any such law upon our statute-books. I could repeat the cause which gave rise to this law. But I will not, because its recital might bring the gentleman into some discredit at home perhaps. I believe, however, it was occasioned by the misconduct of a judge, which was sufficient to have caused his removal; and that would have been the proper remedy. Then you would have got out of the evil. Now you will have, perhaps, an unworthy judge, traveling backwards and forwards, and obtaining, whether with truth or not, a certificate of good cause for absence. Now, let us put these judges upon the same ground with the judges for the States. If one of the three judges in Minnesota, for instance, desires to travel during the summer months to the old States, to visit his friends during vacation, I do not think he ought to be prohibited. I do not know how many sessions there are held in that Territory in the year.

Mr. SIBLEY. There are two in the year, besides the supreme court.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman says there are two; well, suppose a man goes to visit his friends in the old States during the three summer months, when he can be spared as well as not, what objection is there to it? Why shall he not be treated like other citizens? Can you find a man in any of the States, of a high legal character, who will take the judgeship when thus degraded? I know you can find men to fill the places. I believe you can find men who would take any office, upon any terms. But I do not think you can find men of the character and attainments requisite to fill the office who would accept the judgeship under this law, when there is such a restriction in it.

A MEMBER. The same restriction also applies to other territorial officers.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, I am now speaking particularly of the judges, and what I say is intended for them.

I propose, and I do not know whether it is now in order or not, to strike out the whole, and insert a simple repeal of the proviso of 1851. If that is in order, I now send it to the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. There is already an amendment to an amendment pending, and the amendment of the gentleman is not therefore in order.

Mr. STEVENS. I then send it to the Chair, and ask that it may be read for information. If the amendments pending should not be adopted, I will then offer it. I intend it as a substitute for the whole.

It was then read by the Clerk, as follows:

Be it enacted, That the proviso contained in an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the payment of civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th day of June, 1852," approved March 3, 1851, relating to the payment of the salaries of the officers of the Territories, be and the same is hereby repealed, and the salaries of said officers which have heretofore accrued shall be paid, anything in said proviso to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. STUART. If the gentleman will turn to the Senate bill, he will find that the second section repeals the proviso.

Mr. STEVENS. But the first section is different.

Mr. STUART. We can reject the first section and adopt the second.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, I do not care how you get at it, if it is done. I ask the Chair if I cannot offer it now as a substitute for the whole bill?

The CHAIRMAN. Not now, for the reason that there is already an amendment to the amendment pending.

Mr. STUART. But I thought it was in order to offer a substitute, nevertheless.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The gentleman can move to strike out the first section and insert his in lieu thereof, and then we can strike out the second.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks an amendment to the original bill, by way of perfecting it, would be in order.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I move to strike out the first section of the original bill, and to insert my proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman's amendment is not in order in the form in which he offers it. It is word for word the same as the second section of the original bill. The same object would be obtained if the gentleman would move to strike out the first section of the bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I move, then, to strike out the first section.

Mr. STUART. I rise to a question of order. The amendment proposed by the Committee on the Territories proposes to strike out the first section of the Senate bill, and to substitute two others in their place. I submit, therefore, that it is not in order to offer the gentleman's amendment to that original bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it has been the uniform practice in committee and in the House, when a substitute has been offered for a whole bill, as is the case in the present instance, as the proposition is to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert a substitute, to allow amendments to be made to the original bill, by way of perfecting it before the vote is taken upon striking it out.

Mr. STUART. There is no doubt of that. But I understand the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] is to strike out the first section.

The CHAIRMAN. That is an amendment to the original bill, and is therefore in order. The Chair overrules the point of order raised by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. STUART.]

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois. I only desire to say a few words in regard to this matter. I confess there is something uttered in the general sentiment of the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] which meets my approbation. I feel that there is something repugnant in having a legislative wall erected around our judiciary, either in the States or in the Territories, placing limits to their liberty and freedom of action. But I still think there should be something to impel these functionaries to discharge the duties which the law requires they shall discharge, and which the public have a right to expect of them.

Now, I conceive that there is a very wide difference between that class of officers in the Territories and the same class of officers in the States. It is this: In the States public officers are appointed in the neighborhoods, in the counties, or in the districts where they are in the habit of residing. It is their home, and they desire to remain there. When they are called away, it is only for a very short period of time. But in the Territories it is very different; appointments are made in the States to govern the Territories. Some of them—indeed, I might say all of them—are very distant from their places of residence, when the appointment is made, and from which the appointee is taken. They are in the habit of taking the appointments merely to discharge the duties of office without discharging any of those of the citizen. They go there without their families, which they leave in the States. They come to the Territories to hold their courts, and as soon as the term expires they return to the States and make them their place of residence, till, perhaps, the next term; and if it is a little inconvenient, they let that term pass, and perhaps do not return till that time the next year. This is a grievance, and a great one, to the citizens of the Territory. The same difficulty does not occur in the States, because the judges have their place of residence there. They have their homes where they are required to discharge their public duties, and for that reason they are rarely ever absent when the regular terms of their courts are required to be held.

I do not see that analogy which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has drawn, in his speech, between the judge in the States, and the judge in the Territories. If there can be a law made—and I think it would be a just one—providing that no man shall be appointed to a judicial office in one of the Territories, who was not a resident of that Territory, there would be no necessity for the restrictions which the bill under consideration provides. We always find men in these Territories competent to the discharge of the duties of this office. Nay more, any man who will go to these Territories for the purpose of residing there, for the purpose of making a home there, and for the purpose of building up his own fame and fortune, is always more competent than the individual who goes there with a commission in his pocket. I think that if the rule should be confined to making the appointments from the Territories, the necessity for the enactment, in this law, of the clause now under consideration, would be wholly and entirely obviated. I know, sir, in the Territory contiguous to my own district—the Territory of Minnesota—there has been great complaint made, because the officers were not, in fact, residents of that Territory. They could not be called citizens of that Territory. True they might hold a court there, and leave it, when their terms had been held, for their homes, or spend their winters in Washington city, engaged perhaps in some political purpose, or in perfecting some political scheme to carry out the wishes of the appointing power, and he might, probably, very consistently with his own views, consider that a very good cause for their absence over sixty days. Besides, sir, I hold it necessary for a man to reside in the Territory, to become acquainted with the people, if you desire to administer the laws of the country as they should be administered. You must know something about the people, amongst whom you are administering and executing the laws. You ought to understand their courts and institutions. And the judiciary should be able to give tone to the institutions of a new Territory, in order that when it becomes a State, it may have all the benefits derived from this kind of early education. Take men foreign to their feelings, who know nothing of their institutions, who go there merely for the purpose of discharging the duties within the limits of the law, and then go home to their families; and perhaps in vacation when they are most needed, application is made in chancery, or for a writ of habeas corpus, and you find they have appointed a commission, a kind of substitute, who knows nothing about the law, for the purpose of supplying their places, and discharging duties which the law requires them to discharge.

I trust, then, sir, that the proposition proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STREVEN] will not prevail. As long as the Executive will continue to appoint his friends residing in the States to go to these Territories to discharge duties which the citizens of the Territories are far more capable of discharging, let us have some law that will compel them to remain there.

Why, sir, in the Territory of Oregon, I have known judges to leave that Territory and not return for a whole year. What becomes of their courts? what becomes of their districts? What confidence have the people in a judge who will thus neglect to discharge the sacred duties which the functions of his office require him to discharge? From cases of this kind the people acquire a disrespect for even the forms of law which their courts are called upon to administer. I trust, then, sir, there will be something of a compulsory character adopted at this session of Congress which will compel these judges to do their duty. That is all the law seeks in this case. It is all that this bill proposes.

Mr. GORMAN. I want to propose an amendment to this bill; but as this is not the proper time—a gentleman preceding me having offered one—I will make an additional remark upon the subject of the repeal of this proviso. Those who were in the last Congress remember that this proviso was put in there because of a rumor current in the city of Washington that some of the judges in Oregon had left their posts and gone to dig gold in California. I apprehend it was not contemplated that it would affect any other persons than the persons then in the eye of the members of Congress. That was the rumor, and I presume that was the cause of the provision. Whether it was true or not, I cannot tell; but that was the rumor, and that was the cause, for I heard that given as the reason at the time.

I have an additional remark to make in relation to one of the judges of New Mexico, for of one only do I speak. One of the judges of New Mexico went out when he was appointed by the President. That judge resided in the town where I do. He has written to me to get leave of the President to return; but his convictions of duty, and his fidelity to the public trust is of such a character, and he is so conscientious upon the subject, that he would not leave that Territory for a day, because he regards his duty before he would take into consideration for an hour, or a day, the amount of money he would lose or gain. He intends to remain there, sir. He wants to come home to take out his family. He writes to me to know if this bill was passed. He writes to me for leave from the President—if the law is passed, or if the officers of Government had decided the law in such a manner that leave of absence can be granted. The President and the Secretary would cheerfully grant him leave of absence, knowing his character. But he cannot come. He cannot come here to take his family out to that Territory without the forfeiture of his whole year's salary. The law is so manifestly unjust that I cannot conceive any reason in the world why this bill proposed shall not pass. It may operate upon those officers desiring to leave the Territories for pleasure, or for the accommodation of somebody else, or for the purpose of coming to Washington city to see the political movements of the country; but, sir, the law should not operate so as to exclude good men and faithful officers, who are attentive to their public trusts. The law should not be made to include them within its purview, when it was intended to operate as a penalty upon those who, in disregard of their public duty, do otherwise. I contend that the construction put upon the law by the Department was not right. I think, now, that the proper and legitimate construction of that law is, when these officers absent themselves from the Territory without cause, &c. Why do I put that construction upon it? I venture the assertion, that there is no court in the United States, when that question is presented to it, but would decide that that clause means, when they shall absent themselves without cause. Why do I come to that conclusion? Because there is a penalty, and wherever there is a penalty attached, the non-performance of a particular duty, that penalty implies a wrong, and there can be no wrong without an intention. The Government certainly never intended to say, that if you absent yourself for cause over which you have no control, &c. Suppose the Indian depredations should drive the people and officers out of the Territory of New Mexico: they would absent themselves within the legal technical meaning of that law. Suppose they should take refuge upon the frontier of the United States: it would be a technical absenting themselves from the Territory. My friend says it is not a penalty—that it simply says, if you do not perform the duty, you shall not have pay. It says you shall not have pay if you absent yourself from the Territory.

Mr. RICHARDSON, (interposing.) My friend from Indiana will permit me to call his attention to one fact. The gentleman will perceive, from reading the bill, that the penalty attaches when he has absented himself from the district, and from his duties. Now, in the case of the Indians running them out of the country, it would not be a case of absenteeism from duty, such as contemplated by the proviso.

Mr. GORMAN. That is only a technical way of getting out of the difficulty. I am only presenting that as a reason why this law should be repealed. I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STREVEN,] that it is an odious law. I agree with him that it is disreputable. If it has come to this, that we cannot get officers to discharge a high and responsible trust, without putting penalties upon them for the non-performance of such duties, it seems to me that is a mistrust of the integrity of the public men, or men sent to perform any other public trusts.

I am opposed to it upon that ground; but I have a specific ground of objection, which I have stated. Here is a man, I say, who is one of the best qualified men in that country; a man who would honor almost any judicial office; a man of as exemplary character, and of as strict integrity as any in this country; a man competent to discharge any judicial station in the State of Indiana, from which he went; and he refuses to come home for his family, because it would be regarded as a dereliction of duty, and a violation of the trust reposed in him by the Government. Sir, when such officers are crippled and cramped by a law of this kind, it ought to be repealed for that cause, though at the same time it lets others run at large. I allude to Judge Watts. When I pay him this compliment, I do no more than that which he richly and meritoriously deserves. I know him well. For energy, integrity, and high honor, he has but few equals. I say I cannot conceive any single legitimate reason why this provision should not be repealed.

Mr. TUCK. In the discussion, thus far, nothing has been said, except upon one section of the bill under consideration. I propose some remarks in reference to the salaries of the judges of the United States in Oregon and New Mexico.

The judges now receive, the chief justice $2,500 and the associate justices $2,000 each per annum. I maintain that these salaries are wholly inadequate, and so utterly and grossly such, that we should permit no delay in fixing them at a fair and honorable amount. I understand from an authentic source, that ordinary board in Oregon is from $40 to $50 per month, and that a single meal at any public house is never less than one dollar. I further am told, that a judge cannot pay his current expenses in Oregon with a sum less than $2,000; consequently, the chief justice may possibly save $500, while the other judges cannot save a single dollar. The common wages of laborers is $4 per day and board, while a boot-black gets $100 per month and board. On this state of facts, it appears that the chief justice cannot earn so much, by devoting himself to the duties you have imposed upon him, by $700, as the boot-black at the hotel where he takes his board.

It is possible, some one will say, that a judge must make a large set-off from his pay, in consideration of the privilege he enjoys of seeing the country, and of engaging in profitable speculation. In reply to such a remark, I would say, that if it ought to be our policy to make any officers of the Government independent, it surely will be the judges of our courts. They ought to feel under no necessity to look beyond their salaries for adequate and honorable support. I happen to know one of the judges in Oregon, Chief Justice Nelson, lately of the State of New York, and am somewhat acquainted with his high standing as a lawyer, in the part of the State where he practiced. He would confer honor upon any judicial position which he should accept. I judge that his practice at the bar, before he went to Oregon, must have been worth $4,000 per year, and perhaps more; and I think it discreditable, both to the Government and to the courts, to pay a man of Judge Nelson's abilities and high character, the inadequate pay of $2,500 per year.

Now, it may not happen, that the Government will lose the services of competent judges in Oregon or New Mexico, (I believe the two Territories are similarly situated,) by refusing to raise the salaries of the judges to a fair and honorable sum; yet it cannot be doubted, that the pursuit of such a policy of inadequate pay would end in having for judges men entirely unfit for their duties.

Oregon and New Mexico are very much in the condition of California, in respect to expense of living. The justices of the supreme court in California receive, each, a salary of $10,000, while the salaries of the judges of the next subordinate court, are $7,500 each, and the judge performing the duties of judge of probate for the county of San Francisco, receives $4,000. There is no petition here in regard to these salaries, but members of Congress have received letters, and particularly the Delegate from Oregon, and the facts of the expense of living, and utter unreasonableness of the present pay of the distant territorial judges, is known to us all. If we are worthy to legislate for those distant lands, we should consider their peculiar circumstances, and make our laws accordingly. If we govern ourselves by such false notions of economy, as to put our judges below a boot-black or wood-sawyer, in the way of pay, we demonstrate to the people of the Territories that we do not understand their condition, and that they could do better on their own hook.

I trust the views I have presented will meet the approbation of the committee; and I shall, at a proper time, if no other gentleman does it before me, offer an amendment to the bill under consideration, giving more reasonable compensation to the judicial officers to whom I have referred.

Mr. LANE. In the remarks which the chairman of the Committee on Territories addressed to the committee, he stated that at my request it had been agreed by that committee to exempt from the operation of the provisions of the bill the Territory of Oregon; and I am much inclined to think that all the other Territories of this country should have the like exemption. The law, as it now stands upon the statute-books, is as good as we desire for Oregon Territory, and I am very much of the belief that it is well suited to the other Territories. We have had experience in regard to this matter; and I can inform the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] and the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. GORMAN,] that their views relative to the judiciary and other officers of the Territories, and the allowing of an absence of sixty days, are not at all consonant with the wants and interests of the people I represent. I have seen the system tested from the time of the organization of that Territory until the time of my starting for this city. I am fully satisfied in my own mind, from experience, that the proviso in the appropriation law, which is now proposed to be repealed, is the very provision which ought not to be repealed. I can assure the gentlemen to whom I have just alluded, that whenever there are vacancies in the territorial offices, applicants will be found numerous enough to fill them. Such, I am quite sure, was the fact at the time of the organization of our territorial government, and I have yet to learn that the interests of Oregon or any other Territory has seriously suffered from a diminution of the number of applicants for these offices. This is not the evil from which the interests of the Territories have suffered; on the contrary, we complain—and complain justly, too—of the absence of officers, and the consequent neglect of their official duties—neglect which the provisions of this bill indirectly rewards by shielding from a just and proper suspension of pay and salary. Had I a vote to cast, Mr. Chairman, it would most certainly be given against the alteration of the law as it now is. I would vote to pay every officer, judicial and other, for the honest and faithful discharge of his duty.

The proposition of the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. TUCK,] to increase the salary of the territorial judicial officers, is very reasonable and just, provided the increase is not extended too far. As the law now stands, the salaries of the officers of the Territory of Oregon I cannot but regard as insufficient, being scarcely sufficient for the defrayment of their necessary expenses. The necessities of life in Oregon being much more expensive than in the Atlantic States, the salaries of officers there, as in California, should bear a just proportion to the exorbitant prices of subsistence. I have arisen, however, for the purpose of suggesting to gentlemen, that if the passage of this bill is insisted upon, I shall feel it my duty to ask its amendment, so as to exempt officers of the Territory of Oregon from the force of its provisions, and so far as they are concerned leave the law in reference to their absence from the Territory as it now is. Beside this, I am not sure that even as the law now stands upon your statute-books, the governor and secretary are included within the restriction of sixty days.

Mr. PHELPS. The Governor of Oregon cannot by the laws established in the Department, absent himself for more than sixty days from the place where he is to discharge his duties. If he does absent himself for a longer period, he forfeits his salary for that time.

Mr. LANE. If that is the case, they are under the same restrictions; and it is right they should be so. This bill is, however, objectionable to me for other reasons. I am very unwilling to see the President required to give a judicial officer a certificate before he can be entitled to leave of absence. Such a duty should not in my opinion be imposed upon him. It matters not who the President may be, influence can be brought more or less to bear upon him. The same influence that procured the appointment, will hardly fail to procure favors incidental to that appointment; and if a judge, absenting himself for a period of time sufficient to work a forfeiture of a portion of his salary, desires a certificate such as required by this bill, he has only to appeal to his friends, through whose influence the certificate cannot fail to be obtained, and he at once secures his salary.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois. The gentleman, when he stated that the law was good as it is, referred to the proviso in the appropriation bill?

Mr. LANE. I referred to that proviso.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Well, I ask, that being a proviso to an appropriation bill made for a single year, whether its operation does not cease with the termination of the year for which the appropriation was made?

Mr. PHELPS. No; it is general. In the civil and diplomatic bill which has been reported this session, the gentleman will find a similar provision.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I was going to say, if I am correct, that you have this proviso to reenact every year; to put it into every appropriation bill to accomplish the object desired. I then ask if it would not be better to have a general law, which would not require reenactment?

Mr. LANE. I would not oppose the passage of this bill, were I confident that it could pass with just such restrictions as are necessary for the interests of the Territories. If it is to pass in anything like its present shape, I want to have inserted the amendment I have indicated.

I have seen great public inconvenience and public suffering on account of officers leaving their posts, and leaving the Territory. As to the gentlemen whom it was intended this law should benefit, I have nothing to say. I have no feeling whatever in relation to it. If they could be paid, perhaps it would be well enough; but my opinion of discharging a duty is this: I would rather vote to give a family a pension if the husband was killed at his post of duty, than to vote a single cent to a man who abandons his post, or fails to do his duty under any circumstances. If the Government officers of this country are not sufficiently sustained by their commission, and the laws of their country, to enable them to perform their duties, let them refuse to accept such offices. I only desire to say, that so far as Oregon is concerned, I am anxious to have the officers of that Territory remain there, in the faithful performance of their duty. But it is said that these officers wish to visit their families. Let them take their families with them, or send for them, and, if they cannot do that, they should not have accepted the office, or, having accepted, should resign.

Mr. CLARK. I believe the question is upon striking out the first section. I trust that section will not be stricken out, as I think it is a wise provision. It might, perhaps, seem to be a violent presumption, that high judicial officers should be otherwise than disposed to discharge their duties faithfully and strictly. But we know that there are instances in which it has been otherwise—and I think it right that there should be some extraneous influences moving upon them to induce a strict discharge of their duty. It has been said that such a provision is a reproach to judicial character. But it can be no slur upon those who are disposed to discharge their duties faithfully and honestly, that there should be a provision of law of this kind, even though it may be regarded as penal in its character. There can be no application of the law of a personal character in advance of dereliction in duty; but after such fault it is right that the application should be made. Laws of this kind are made for the "evil, the injurious, and the unthankful," and not for those who are disposed to do their duty. I can, therefore, discover nothing reproachful in the law. The reproach is in the neglect of duty. How does the law stand as it is? By this law a judge in the Territories is liable to forfeit his entire salary for the year, if he absents himself from the Territory for a period beyond sixty days. I think that is too severe; but the provision which is contained in this section of the bill is more moderate, more reasonable, and, I think, ought to be retained. By this provision the functionary can, in no event, be deprived of his salary for a period beyond that during which he absents himself. We know very well, by observation and experience, that there have been judges, that there are judges, whose thoughts and interests are everywhere but within the sphere of their duties. We know that there are judges who are speculating judges, and whose attention to their duties is merely nominal; that so soon as they have discharged those duties, with the least appearance of decency, they are somewhere beyond the sphere of them, where they cannot be reached by those who have occasion for their services. We also know that there have been those appointed to office who merely sought to obtain places, and emoluments of places, in order that they might have wherewithal to revel in pleasure and luxury. I should hope that these cases were few. I believe they are exceptions; but is there, therefore, no good reason why these cases should not be provided for? At the same time that I would guard well against dereliction in the discharge of duties upon the part of judges and other territorial officers, I would not place them too exclusively in the power of any other public functionary.

Now, as the law stands, if they are beyond the sphere of their duties for more than sixty days, it is in the power of the President to withhold their salaries entirely. How are judges appointed? They are appointed by the President of the United States; and what are the elements which effect their appointment? Why, political influences often more than any other. These judges might sometimes fall into the hands of the Chief Executive of a different political character and condition from their own, and he might perchance be disposed to do them injustice. At the same time that I would guard against injustice upon the one hand, I would not leave this gap ungarded upon the other. I trust this section will not be stricken out. I believe it is a good and wholesome provision. I believe it is better than any which has heretofore existed—better than the one which is proposed as an amendment. In the one which is proposed as a substitute, there is great uncertainty and difficulty. I understand from the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PHELPS,] as he interprets the law, that the salary of the judges is to be paid quarterly. Suppose that three quarters of the salary has been paid, and that the forfeiture arises by reason of absence during the last quarter, what power of protection is there here? What power is there in the Government to retain the forfeit money? It seems to me that there is none whatever—that there is an obscurity and difficulty arising here, which it is impossible to reconcile upon the face of the law, and in connection with the practice of the Government. But when you retain in proportion to the time of absenteeism, there is no difficulty. It is all plain, and what is more, it is right, and will, in my opinion, work the desired security.

Mr. SIBLEY. I beg leave to state to the committee before this debate is brought to a close, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] is entirely mistaken in regard to the inconveniences to which the people of the Territory are subjected by the absence of their judicial officers. There is no analogy between the situation of a judge in a thickly-inhabited district, and that of a judge in a sparsely-settled Territory. The judges in the Territories are the only high judiciary we have. They are vested with the powers of Federal judges, as well as of territorial judges. They are the only officers who can issue habeas corpus and other writs, act at chambers, and perform the other duties of the superior courts. The districts of these officials are separated sometimes hundreds of miles from each other, and if an individual wishes to avail himself of their services for any specific purpose, and cannot find the judge of his district, he will be put to the inconvenience of going to the next district. I wish to provide in this bill a remedy, so that the injury which must be inflicted on the people of the Territories by the absence of these judges may be obviated. I trust that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] will be satisfied with the explanation I have given of the necessity of such restrictions as are imposed by this bill. A repeal of these restrictions would have a most evil and injurious effect upon the Territories. I know all about the reasons which induced Congress to pass this prohibitory clause. I know that some of our judges and other officers were absent for months, and that the same was the case in Oregon. I believe at one time they had not a single judge within the limits of that Territory. These facts were brought to the knowledge of members of this House; and when that restrictive clause was introduced here, it passed with scarcely a dissenting voice. There is not a single reason which was urged then that does not exist now with even greater force, in consequence of the increase of population; and no one of these three judges can absent himself from his district for any length of time without serious detriment to the interests of the people.

But the gentleman says, that if these officers do not perform their duties properly, they should be removed. This power of removal of a territorial judge by the President is far from being conceded. It is a mooted question at this moment before the Senate of the United States, and many eminent jurists deny that any such power exists. Be that as it may, and even admitting that it does exist, there are grave reasons why it should be exercised only in extreme cases; for if the territorial judiciary is subject to be displaced arbitrarily, and without good and sufficient cause, it ceases to be independent of Executive control, and will speedily be converted into a mere political engine, and will no longer be depended on or respected by the people.

[Here the hammer fell, the hour for closing the debate having arrived.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. I suppose some of the votes on this bill will have to be taken by tellers, and as there is evidently not a quorum present, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman (Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee,) reported, that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the special order, and had instructed him to report to the House two bills, with the recommendation that they do pass; the committee had also had under consideration House bill No. 175, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I ask my friend to withdraw that motion for a single moment, to allow me to make a correction in relation to a publication in the Globe of yesterday.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Certainly. I withdraw the motion.

CORRECTION OF THE REPORTS.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I desire, if there be no objection, to make a correction in relation to a publication which appears in the Globe of yesterday. I do it at the instance of several gentlemen, who desire it quite as much as I do. It appears from the Globe of yesterday, that while I held the floor the other day, I gave way to a gentleman from New York, who made a speech, occupying several columns, and that I then went on with my own remarks, and made no reference at all to his speech. Now, my constituents, and the constituents of other gentlemen, will think it very singular that I should hold the floor, give another gentleman an opportunity of making a speech, and then go on with my remarks and make no reference to that speech. My constituents may say, "If you did not choose to answer the speech, at any rate you ought to have made some reference to it."

Now, the fact is just this, that a gentleman from New York said he wished I would give him the floor for a single moment, and that his object was to notify the House that he intended to publish a speech. I told him, of course, that I had no objection—it is a pure matter of taste. I then informed the House that I had given him the floor for that purpose. I made that statement, and he made the statement to the committee, that he intended to publish a speech. I took it for granted that all that would go into the Globe. If that had been done, everybody would then have seen that the speech which followed had not been actually delivered in the House, and I and other gentlemen should have been relieved of all responsibility of answering it. Several gentlemen have come to me, and said they considered such a thing a fraud on the House. I will not use such a strong expression myself. I have no objection to the publication of speeches in the Congressional Globe that have not been delivered here; but the fact that they were not delivered here ought to be known and understood. I wish, therefore, the report of these remarks to go into the Globe, so that it may be understood by the country that this speech was not delivered here. I have no objection to the gentleman publishing his speech. The only error was in publishing it without the preliminary remarks, which would have shown that the speech was not delivered.

A VOICE. Whose speech was it?

Mr. CLINGMAN. The speech of Mr. HASCALL, of New York.

Another VOICE. Move to expunge it! [A laugh.]

Mr. CLINGMAN. Oh, no; let it go now.

On motion by Mr. RICHARDSON,

The House then adjourned until to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

PETITIONS, &c.

The following petitions, memorials, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees: By Mr. FITCH: The remonstrance of James E. Winegar and other citizens of Elkhart county, Indiana, against the renewal of a patent to A. & Z. Parker, for alleged improvements upon reaction water-wheels.

By Mr. McNAIR: The petition of Washington Richards and 25 others, citizens of Montgomery county, Pennsylvania, praying a grant of 160 acres of land to the soldiers of the war of 1812.

By Mr. PARKER, of Indiana: The petition of Samuel Johnson, Charles A. Jeffrey, and 148 others, citizens of Wayne, Randolph, and Union counties, Indiana, praying for a tri weekly mail route from Liberty, via Centreville, to Winchester.

By Mr. WASHBURN: The petition of Isaac F. Stevens and others, for a post route from North Lincoln, Penobscot county, Maine, to Nickerson, in said county.

By Mr. FLORENCE: The memorial of John Howard, Edward Ford, and David Ford, praying Congress to afford them speedy relief, by the passage of Senate bill No. 51, prohibiting the importation of articles manufactured in the Canadian provinces from American patented machines, under penalties.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, May 20, 1852.

To the Editor of the Globe:

On Monday last, the Hon. Mr. CULLOM, of Tennessee, stated in the House, that "it was said my colleague, Hon. JAMES BROOKS, advised me to change the vote I had given on the fugitive slave law;" and in a way and manner as degrading to me as the fact would be injurious to him, if the statement, as made, were correct.

My colleague and myself are political and personal friends; and on this occasion I went to Mr. Brooks's seat, and consulted with him upon the course I was taking; but that he induced me to change my vote, or attempted to do it, in the conversation I had with him, is not the fact.

I do not approve of the practice of introducing upon the floor of the House, the private conversations of gentlemen; but I attempted, at the moment, to obtain the floor, and to relieve both my colleague and myself from the imputation; but it was not yielded to me, and I had no opportunity to reply upon the spot. Hence I take the liberty of asking you to set my colleague and myself right before the public, through your columns.

Yours respectfully,

GEORGE BRIGGS.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, May 21, 1852.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Postmaster General, made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate calling for information in relation to the postal operations of the United States; which was ordered to be laid on the table and printed.

A motion, by Mr. SUMNER, that five thousand extra copies of the above report be printed for the use of the Senate, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. President, I move to suspend until one o'clock the order requiring to-day to be devoted to private bills, for the purpose of proceeding with the morning business until that time; and at that hour I shall move to take up the deficiency bill.

Mr. ATCHISON. I am willing that the order shall be suspended until one o'clock, but not for the purpose of taking up the morning business. I know that it is highly important that one Indian treaty now before the Senate should be disposed of in a short time. In my opinion, if we go into Executive session, it will not take more than an hour to dispose of it. It is said that there are now some five or six thousand Indians collected upon the Arkansas, waiting some action upon this treaty.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator must be aware that it is not in order to refer to matters pending in Executive session.

Mr. ATCHISON. I am fully aware of the rules, but I did not know that, being an Indian treaty, the rule strictly applied to it.

The PRESIDENT. It does apply.

Mr. ATCHISON. I wished to give the Senate some hint of the necessity of going into Executive session.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to suspend the order requiring this day to be devoted to private bills, until one o'clock.

Mr. CASS. Is it with a view of dispensing with private business for the entire day?

The PRESIDENT. The motion is to dispense with it until one o'clock. What may be done afterwards, it is not for the Chair to say. That will be a matter for the decision of the Senate.

Mr. CASS. I trust that private business will not be dispensed with. We have talked away Friday after Friday, and utterly neglected private business.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE BUSINESS.

Mr. ATCHISON. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Executive business.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope not. I trust that the Senate will proceed with the morning business; and at one o'clock either take up the deficiency bill, or proceed with private business.

The motion was not agreed to.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a petition numerous signed by citizens of Dover, New Hampshire, the town in which I reside, respectfully entreating that the Senate will concur in the bill which has passed the House of Representatives, commonly called the homestead bill. This petition has been gotten up without any correspondence or knowledge of my own. It is signed by men whom I know desire to take advantage of the bill. I move to refer the petition to the Committee on Public Lands; and I hope that the committee will give the subject its attention at an early day, so that we may have the bill before the Senate, and be able either to pass it or reject it.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WADE presented a petition of citizens of Logan county, Ohio, praying that the bill of the House extending the time for locating Virginia military land warrants may not be passed; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WALKER presented a petition of citizens of Owego, New York, praying that the bill now pending before Congress, granting to every man who is the head of a family and a citizen of the United States, one hundred and sixty acres of land, may become a law; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SEWARD presented a petition of citizens of Rochester, New York, praying that Senate bill No. 51, affording protection to American inventors against the importation of their own patented articles from foreign countries, may become a law; which was ordered to be laid on the table.

Also, a petition of members of the Journeymen Tailors' Coöperative Union of the city of New York, praying that the bill now pending before Congress, granting to every citizen of the United States who is the head of a family, one hundred and sixty acres of land, may become a law; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BORLAND presented a petition of citizens of Batesville, Arkansas, praying the establishment of daily lines of mail steamers between Louisville and New Orleans; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. CASS presented a petition of citizens of New York, praying that the bill now pending before Congress, granting to every citizen of the United States, who is at the head of a family, one hundred and sixty acres of land, may become a law; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, a memorial of Henry Ball and others, praying a modification of the bounty land law; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CHASE presented a petition of citizens of Shelby, Richland county, Ohio, praying that the bill now pending before Congress, granting to every citizen of the United States, who is at the head of a family, one hundred and sixty acres of land, may become a law; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BROADHEAD presented ten memorials of citizens of Schuylkill county, Pennsylvania, praying a modification of the tariff; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. STOCKTON. Mr. President, I have a petition from James W. Marshall, praying for a donation of land in California. I have not much to say about his petition at this time; but I give notice to the Senate, that when it comes up for consideration, I shall have something to say about it. This petition has been sent to me from California, because Mr. Marshall belonged to the "sailor army" there. He was a man of great enterprise, great talent, and great courage, and was very useful. He deserves great commendation from the public, and great gratitude from me for his services. He was the discoverer of gold mines in California. Senators will thus see that this is a matter of some importance, and I hope they will help me to get the subject up some of these days. I move to refer the petition to the Committee on Public Lands.

It was so referred.

Mr. STOCKTON also presented a petition of Robert Heuguenin; a petition of seamen of the United States Navy, who served in the late war with Mexico; and a memorial of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying a modification of the bounty land law; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

REPORTS FROM A STANDING COMMITTEE.

Mr. FELCH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to convey the right of way to the Cleveland and Pittsburg and to the Cleveland and Painesville and Ashtabula Railroad Companies through certain lands therein mentioned, reported it back with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill granting lands to the States of Louisiana and Mississippi, in aid of the construction of certain railroads therein, reported it back with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the memorial of the clerks of the Land Office, praying an increase of their salaries, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance; which was agreed to.

OBSTRUCTIONS IN THE SAVANNAH RIVER.

Mr. BERRIEN. Mr. President, I have a personal favor to ask of the Senate. Circumstances require that I should leave the city in the course of a few days, for the purpose of returning to Georgia. I have an anxious desire that two bills, introduced by me at an early stage of the session, may be considered before I leave the city; and, with a view to test the disposition of the Senate to indulge me in this wish, I move to suspend the prior orders, for the purpose of taking up "the bill to provide for the removal of the obstructions in the Savannah river, in the State of Georgia, and for the improvement of the same." I beg to state, that this bill has several times passed this body, but has not been arrived at in the House. The obstructions in that river are increasing from day to day, so as to threaten to render valueless the wharf property of the city. The bill can occupy but little time, and I hope the Senate will agree to take it up.

Mr. HUNTER. I have no objection to taking up the bill, provided the Senator will agree that, if it leads to debate, it shall be laid aside at one o'clock.

Mr. BERRIEN. I presume there will be no debate on the subject.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the sum of $50,000 be appropriated, to be applied under the direction of the chief of the corps of Topographical Engineers, to the removal of obstructions in the Savannah river, below the city of Savannah, and to the improvement of said river by the construction of such works as, in his judgment, may be best adapted to accomplish that object.

No amendment being offered, the bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

The question was stated to be: Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time?

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I would like very much that the gentleman from Georgia, who sits furthest from me, would give the Senate some explanation with respect to this bill; and especially, as I understand that it relates to a sort of improvement to which he demurs very much when applied in the western country. I do not object to the bill. I merely wish to know if the improvement which it contemplates is one of that class to which he has such strong objections proposed for the Ohio and Mississippi rivers?

Mr. BERRIEN. I presume the Senator from Iowa does not address the remark which he made upon the subject of opposition to internal improvements to me?

Mr. DODGE. Not to you, sir. I made no allusion to you.

Mr. BERRIEN. I beg to say to the Senator, in explanation, that this is a bill which, by repeated decisions of this body, does not involve the question of internal improvements. It is for the removal of obstructions which were created by the Government. During the revolutionary war, wrecks were sunk in the Savannah river below the city of Savannah, for the purpose of preventing the approach of the enemy. These formed a nucleus around which banks have been formed, and they have obstructed the flow of the water from the river above, which is divided opposite to the city of Savannah, by the intervention of an island. The effect of these continued obstructions, is to cause the flow of the water from the southern to the northern portion of the river—from the river above to the river below—so as to leave the water very shallow along the wharves of the city; and it is feared, that, in process of time, the obstructions there will so increase as to interfere with the use of the wharves for purposes of commerce. My object is not to delay the Senate, and therefore I will not further trespass upon their time. This question has been duly considered before, and I trust the bill will meet with no objection from the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. My object was precisely the same. I did not wish to delay the decision of the Senate for a moment; but I was anxious to hear from the Senator from Georgia, who sits furthest from me, and whose clarion voice has been so often heard in this Chamber, upon occasions where bills of like character were pending; if he could vote for this bill, and could sit in his seat and allow it to pass, without giving us one of his eloquent speeches which we have so often heard in opposition to grants of land and money for internal improvements.

Mr. DAWSON. I cannot go into the discussion of this question; for I well know that the Senator perfectly understands the distinction between this bill and internal improvement bills generally. Even his Democratic friends, who have been all along opposed to internal improvements of rivers and harbors, from the highest to the lowest, clearly perceive that difference.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was subsequently read a third time and passed.

JUDICIAL SALARY.

Mr. BERRIEN. There was another bill which I introduced at an early stage of the session, upon which I stated that I desired the action of the Senate, as I supposed it would not involve debate. It is a bill to regulate the compensation of the district judge of the United States for the district of Massachusetts. It is sustained by evidence here, leaving no doubt as to its propriety. I move, therefore, to postpone the previous orders, for the purpose of taking up the bill.

Mr. HUNTER. I will agree to that motion with the same understanding with regard to this, as with regard to the other bill.

Mr. BERRIEN. Certainly.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that there shall be allowed to the judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts, a yearly compensation of $3,500, to be paid at the Treasury of the United States in quarterly payments.

Mr. BERRIEN. I beg to say, simply, on this subject, that when the present incumbent was appointed to that office, the salary was $2,500, which it is still; but at that time, the jurisdiction of the court was very much less than it now is. The business of the court was then very much less than, by the increase of its jurisdiction, it has now become. The increase has occurred in two ways; first, by an alteration of the crimes act cases, which before were under the jurisdiction of the circuit court, are now committed to the jurisdiction of the district court. The business of this judge has been further increased by the fact, that the attendance of the circuit court judge for one term in each year is dispensed with; and, consequently, the district judge is obliged to hold, not only a protracted district court in consequence of the increase of business in that court, but he is also obliged to sit alone and transact the business of the circuit court.

These facts are disclosed in the statement of the members of the bar of that district, and the statement of respectable gentlemen, which were laid before the Committee on the Judiciary, and also by reference to our statutes. The object of the bill is to place the district judge for Massachusetts, living in Boston, upon the same footing as the district judge of the southern district of New York, living in the city of New York. I hope there will be no objection to it.

Mr. HALE. I want to ask a single question of the Senator from Massachusetts. I do not mean to oppose this bill. I know the facts which the Senator from Georgia has stated; but I want to inquire what is the salary of the State judges in Massachusetts?

Mr. SUMNER. The salary of the chief justice of Massachusetts is $3,500; and the salary of the associate justices of the supreme court is $3,000.

Mr. BORLAND. I would inquire what amount of salary this judge now receives?

Mr. BERRIEN. Two thousand five hundred dollars.

Mr. BORLAND. I am opposed, as I have said upon a former occasion, to any extravagant allowance—certainly to any increase of allowance—to Federal officers, either here, at the seat of Government, or in any of the States. I am not acquainted with the character or the extent of the service which this judge has to render, which should put him upon a different footing, and entitle him to a higher rate of compensation than the district judges in other States receive.

Mr. BERRIEN. I would say to the Senator, that it is believed that the duties of the district judge in the district of Massachusetts, and in the southern district of New York, are greater than they are in the other districts in the United States. The object of this bill is to place the district judge of Massachusetts upon the same footing as the district judge of New York. He has had an increase of business, from the causes which I have stated, which would abundantly appear to the honorable Senator from Arkansas, if he had an opportunity of examining the papers to which I have referred; but I trust that he will take my assurance of their contents. From them, it appears that the business of the district court of Massachusetts has so increased as to engage the attention of the very worthy gentleman who presides over that court during his whole time, and that the sum of $3,500, which he now receives, is inadequate to his support in the city of Boston, where his duties require him to reside. I hope the bill will not encounter further objection.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. President, I do not know that the proposed compensation to this judge will be too great, under the circumstances stated by the Senator from Georgia. But I do know, that in other States, and in my own State, where the duties of the district judge of the United States have been very greatly increased, no increase of compensation has been made. I do not wish it to be understood that I shall make any application for an increase of compensation for the district judges of my State, for I am opposed to it. His duties occupy him a great deal more of his time than they did before the increase of business, but yet they do not occupy so much of his time, in my opinion, as to make any increase of compensation necessary.

The rule upon which I have heretofore governed myself in relation to propositions of this kind, is, to place the United States judges upon the same footing, as to salary, with the State officers of the same class. I understand this to be placing the district judge of the United States in Massachusetts on the same footing with the associate justices of the supreme court of that State.

Mr. HALE. It is to place him on a footing with the chief justice, and give him $3,500.

Mr. BORLAND. I cannot understand why we should increase this amount to $3,500, when $3,000 would place this judge upon a footing with the associate justices of the supreme court of the State of Massachusetts. Certainly, he is not a judge of higher dignity, or requiring a higher order of qualification than the associate justices of the supreme court of that State, and I can see no reason why he should be given that higher position which we must accord to him by giving him a higher salary. I venture to say that the order of talent, or of attainment, is not required to be higher in the performance of his duty, than those talents and attainments which are required by the associate justices of the supreme court of the State of Massachusetts. I appeal to the Senator from Massachusetts if that can be so.

Mr. BERRIEN. I am very anxious not to bring myself under the condition stipulated by the chairman of the Committee on Finance. I understand that this question was discussed, with regard to the compensation of the district judge of New Hampshire, and the Senate determined to fix the compensation upon the same footing with that of the chief justice of the State. I would say, further, to the honorable Senator from Arkansas, that he is entirely mistaken in one point. The duties of this judge, sitting in the circuit court of the United States, alone, are much more onerous than the duties of any associate judge of any State; because such associate judge has the assistance of his associates, and of the chief justice, while the district judge of the United States, sitting alone in the circuit court, as he is compelled to do, necessarily has a responsibility which is far greater than can be imposed upon any associate justice in any State.

Mr. HALE. I want to make a suggestion to the Senate. I know this judge, and I know something about his business, and concur in everything which the Senator from Georgia has said; but I want to make an additional suggestion, which, I think, will strike the honorable Senator from Arkansas with great force. He should remember that this judge is situated right in the vicinity of Bunker Hill, and Lexington, and Concord; the people there have got some old-fashioned notions; and hence it is very burdensome to enforce the fugitive slave law there, which this judge has to do. In view of these increased difficulties, growing out of his vicinity to these localities, which take up so much of his time, and call for so much exertion, this increased compensation ought to be paid to him for that. I think he earned this additional compensation last summer, in trials in that class of cases alone. I hope this consideration will be sufficient to induce the honorable Senator from Arkansas to forbear further opposition to the bill.

Mr. BORLAND. I have nothing to say on that subject, except that I think it constitutes a very poor claim upon the favorable consideration of Congress, that this judge is charged, as the Senator from New Hampshire says, with the execution of the fugitive slave law, in view of the manner in which that law has been executed. But, sir, I will not pursue that subject.

I am willing, in view of all the circumstances, to vote to put this judge upon the same footing with the associate justices of the supreme court of Massachusetts, as I voted to put the district judge for the State of New Hampshire upon the same footing with the associate justices of the supreme court of that State. I know very well that that bill passed, giving to that judge the same compensation as the chief justice of the State received; but I voted for giving him the same salary which was received by the associate justices of the State. I shall act on the same principle in this case, and, therefore, I move to amend the bill, by striking out "$3,500," and inserting "$3,000."

Mr. BERRIEN. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. The object of the bill is, as I have said before, to place this judge on the same footing with the district judge of Southern New York, the business of the two being considered equal.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ADAMS. Before the vote is taken upon the bill, I wish to make a single remark. It was suggested by the Senator from Georgia, that upon a question which was submitted to the Senate a few days ago, it was determined by the Senate to allow the same compensation to judges of the district courts of the United States which is allowed for judges of the same grade in the States. It is true that some Senators voted upon that principle, but there were others who did not do so. There were some Senators, myself among them, who voted upon the principle of allowing a reasonable compensation to the officers of the General Government, regardless of what the States might pay for similar services. I believe that to be the correct principle. I believe that there should not be rivalry between this Government and the State government in paying money to their officers. This Government should look higher than such considerations. It should pay a fair and reasonable compensation for the services rendered by its officers; and no more. So far as the compensation allowed to officers by the States for particular services is an index to a reasonable compensation—to a correct conclusion—that far I am willing to take it, but no further. I think that $2,500 a year in such a State as Massachusetts, where living is cheap, is a reasonable compensation for the discharge of all the duties that a Federal judge is capable of performing. The number of cases that may come before him is not a matter which should enter into the consideration of the compensation. A judge is presumed to occupy his whole time either in the discharge of his duties, or in qualifying himself to discharge them; and his compensation should be fixed with reference to his occupying his time in the discharge of his duties. I think that the amount which this judge now receives ($2,500) is a fair compensation for a district judge in Massachusetts or anywhere else, and upon that ground I shall vote against the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not wish to say anything to commit myself on this subject. This general subject is before the Committee on the Judiciary at this time, and the Senator from Maine, [Mr. BRADBURY,] one of the members of the committee, has especial charge of it. We are endeavoring—though I do not know that we shall attain the object entirely—to have the salaries of the different judges fixed according to the business in their courts. I am not one of those who would be willing, by any compensation or salary which may be given to a Federal judge, to indicate that his judicial dignity should in anywise be regarded as superior to that of a State judge. Nor can we regulate or indicate the dignity of such an officer by the salary he receives.

For instance, the judge of the United States for the district of Florida, who has to hold his court at Key West, has more business, I will answer for it, than all the State judges in Florida; and he has a kind of duty to perform that requires his continual attention. From Boston, from New York, from Baltimore, from Philadelphia, and nearly all the cities on the Atlantic coast, petitions have been received for an increase of that judge's salary; and if it is not increased he will have to resign. Considering the duties he has to perform, his salary should be above that of the State judges there. Then again, the rule would not operate well so far as regards Louisiana. In Louisiana, and particularly in one of the districts in that State, it would be wrong to make the salary of the district judge of the United States equal to the salary of the State judges.

The State judges there I believe receive $6,000, a year. There are two Federal district judges in the State of Louisiana; and I would not consent that their salaries should be made equal to the salaries of the State judges of Louisiana. We cannot lay down any uniform rule in regard to this subject. Then, look up at New Hampshire, Vermont, and other States of the kind, where there is very little business for a Federal judge; and yet, if you give a man the office, you must give him at least enough to enable him to live. I do not know that I would be willing to give the Federal judges of these States the same salary which the State judges there receive.

There are circumstances which should regulate the salaries of the Federal judges in each case. We cannot lay down an arbitrary rule upon the subject. I think, however, that perhaps the correct rule would be that the Federal judges should receive no more than the State judges. But still, in all cases the compensation could not be regulated by that rule. I would say to my friend from Arkansas, that the business of the United States courts in Boston, New York, and Florida, and particularly in New York and Boston, takes up more of the time of the Federal judge than all the business put together in Arkansas. I mean that the maritime cases alone occurring before these courts amount to more than all the business of the Federal judge in Arkansas. I do not suppose that the judge there has anything to do with that class of cases which continually require the attention, and the responsible attention, too, of the Federal judges situated in Boston and New York.

As regards what was said by the gentleman from New Hampshire about Bunker Hill, &c., I do not understand what he was talking about. [Laughter.]

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. President, I desire to state, in two or three words, my objection to putting the salary of the Federal judges above that of the State judges of the same class. The objection is twofold. In the first place, I think the provision would be economical. For the purpose of ascertaining the proper compensation under the circumstances in which a United States judge is to live, I must confess I cannot conceive of any other standard which is so proper and so reliable as the amount of salary which the State governments pay. They regulate their salaries according to the circumstances immediately before them and around them; and I think that what they establish as a proper compensation for their judicial officers, ought to be adhered to by the United States in fixing the salary of their judicial officers who are to live in the same States.

Mr. BERRIEN. Will the Senator allow me to suggest to him, that this district judge, from the nature of his occupation, is obliged to reside in Boston, while the State judges in Massachusetts may reside elsewhere; and that the expense of living in the city of Boston is much greater than the expense of living in the country.

Mr. BORLAND. Upon that ground, I think that really the judges of the State courts are at a great disadvantage. This judge, as the Senator says, has to reside in the city of Boston. That is his home, and he there holds the court. The judges of the State courts, as the Senator well knows, have to ride over extensive circuits, at very great expense, involving very great labor, and often very great exposure, to the neglect of their private business and their homes. So that, upon that ground alone, I think the disadvantage suggested, is greatly against the State judges.

As I remarked before, I assume the amount paid by the State governments to their judges should be a proper and sufficient standard to which we should determine the salaries of the Federal judges.

The second objection which I have to this, is a political one, and which I have stated here on a former occasion. I think it is sufficiently evident that the Federal offices have already more than enough attractions to individuals to seek and desire them. They present sufficient attractions to deter individuals from taking office in most of the States of the Union. As I said before—and I shall not undertake to elaborate it now—this is an influence which is working great mischief to the character of our Government. Its tendency is to point to this center; and it is strengthening what I consider to be the most unfortunate and most dangerous tendency in our whole system of government. I am unwilling, therefore, to minister to that tendency—to give it one particle more strength than it already has, by holding out to persons, whether of the learned professions or not, inducements to turn their backs, in disregard, from the offices and honors of their own States, and look to this Government as the great disburser of office and of patronage.

Upon these two grounds, I am opposed to this increase of salary for this district judge, beyond what the associate judges of the supreme court of Massachusetts get. In the first place, I think that amount is all-sufficient to pay for these services; and in the second place, I think the district judge cannot be considered a judge of higher grade, or that that office requires a higher order of qualification, than that of the associate justices of the supreme court of that State.

Mr. BERRIEN. I hope the question will be taken without further debate.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope that the question will either be taken now, or that the bill will be laid aside.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, I will not extend the discussion, as I see that the hour of one is approaching. But I find that I voted under a misapprehension in regard to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas. I intended to support this bill as it came from the Judiciary Committee. I hope my friend from Arkansas will withdraw his opposition, and for this reason: No parallel that he has produced, it appears to me, is sufficient to sustain his opposition to it. He seems to think that, because the judges of a State get a certain amount of compensation, that should necessarily be a criterion by which the salaries of the Federal judges should be determined.

Mr. BORLAND. I say that is the best standard.

Mr. MALLORY. In my opinion, it offers no standard whatever. Is it a standard to estimate what a judge can live upon, or for what a judge is willing to take the office and discharge its duties? The judges are taken from the bar, and the only true standard of their compensation is to ascertain the amount which will induce the members of the bar of a particular district, competent to fulfill the duties of the office, to give up their practice and go upon the bench. Take the instance cited by the Senator from South Carolina. The State judges of Louisiana receive $6,000 a year. Now, a judge may live there in proper style, and support the dignity of his office, for $2,000 a year. In that case, clearly, the $6,000 paid to the State judges would form no standard whatever. The true standard is the amount which the services of a man competent to fill the office are worth.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. ADAMS called for the yeas and nays on the engrossment of the bill; and they were ordered, and being taken, resulted—yeas 35, nays 13—as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Badger, Bell, Berrien, Bright, Brooke, Butler, Cass, Clarke, Dawson, Dodge of Wisconsin, Downs, Fish, Foot, Geyer, Hale, James, Jones of Iowa, Mallory, Mangum, Miller, Morton, Pearce, Rusk, Sebastian, Seward, Shields, Smith, Soule, Spruance, Stockton, Sumner, Tancay, Underwood, Upham, and Weller—35.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Borland, Brodhead, Chase, Clemens, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Hamlin, Hunter, King, Wade, and Walker—13.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

It was subsequently read a third time and passed.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. HUNTER. I now move to postpone the prior orders of business for the purpose of taking up the deficiencies bill.

Mr. BORLAND. I hope that motion will not prevail. I do think that, in justice to those whose interests are involved in the private claims now before Congress, and for whose benefit we adopted the rule setting aside Fridays for the consideration of these claims, we cannot any longer postpone their consideration. We have now for a month or more put aside all private claims, to the great injustice, in my opinion, and certainly to the great injury, of those whose claims upon us are not only just, but beyond dispute; and have been engaged in discussions which, so far, have resulted in little good to the country, or to individuals. I trust, therefore, that we will this day undertake to do justice to long-deferred claims.

The question was taken on the motion to postpone the prior orders, and a division being called for there were—yeas 17, nays 22.

So the motion to postpone was not agreed to.

THE PRIVATE CALENDAR.

The PRESIDENT. In conformity with the rule, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the Private Calendar.

The rule by which the business this day is governed, is the following resolution, which was adopted on Friday, April 23d, on the motion of Mr. NORRIS:

Resolved, That on day, and every fourth Friday hereafter, shall be devoted to the consideration of such private bills upon the Calendar as shall not give rise to debate; and whenever debate shall arise upon a bill, or any Senator shall express a desire to debate the same, it shall go over to the following Friday.

WILLIAM BEDIENT.

Mr. ATCHISON. Under a mistake on the last Friday on which the Senate considered private bills, I made a motion to indefinitely postpone the consideration of a bill for the relief of William Bedient. If it is in order—and I believe it is, as this is the first Friday since then that we have transacted private business—I will move to reconsider the motion by which that bill was indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT. It will not be in order now, to move to reconsider that vote. It is too late. But, inasmuch as there was a mistake made, and as the report was favorable, the bill can be reinstated on the Calendar, by the unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. ATCHISON. Then I trust the unanimous consent of the Senate will be given.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection; the bill will therefore take its place upon the Calendar, and will be the first that comes up for consideration.

The Senate accordingly proceeded to the consideration of the bill for the relief of William Bedient, late a sergeant in the fourth regiment of artillery.

Mr. CLEMENS. Is there a report in that case? The PRESIDENT. There is.

Mr. HALE. Is this the day on which private bills which generate debate are passed over?

The PRESIDENT. This is the day on which all private bills leading to discussion must be laid aside.

Mr. HALE. Exactly.

The bill was read a second time, and considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the Secretary of the Interior be authorized and directed to place the name of William Bedient, at present of Newark, in the State of New Jersey, late a sergeant in the fourth regiment of artillery, on the roll of invalid pensioners, and that he be allowed a pension at the rate of eight dollars per month, from the 16th day of June, 1849, to continue during his natural life.

Mr. CLEMENS. Is there a report in that case? The PRESIDENT. There is.

Mr. CLEMENS. I would like to hear it read.

The report was accordingly read, from which it appeared that the said William Bedient enlisted the 20th of January, 1840, and was then sound in body and of a firm and vigorous constitution. That he reenlisted in November, 1844, and was still sound in body and constitution. He was appointed a sergeant while stationed at Puebla, in Mexico, in 1848. While stationed at Pensacola, in Florida, he was discharged, on the examination of Doctor Randall, post surgeon, by reason of hernia. That from 1840, when first enlisted, to the time of his discharge, in June, 1849, he was constantly, and without furlough or other interruption, in the line of his duty, and in the actual service of the United States. That his health was perfectly good, and his body entirely sound, until he was sent to Point Isabel, in Texas, in 1846, where, in August, in consequence of exposure and fatigue, he contracted fever and ague; and that after the reduction of the disease by medical treatment, he first perceived the hernia, which resulted in his discharge.

From statements made by Colonel Gardiner, Major W. W. Morris, Lieutenant Colonel Brown, and Brigadier General Childs, all of the United States Army, it appeared that the claimant was a soldier of good character; and from a letter of assistant surgeon Joseph Eaton, it further appeared that he was three fourths disabled from earning a living by manual labor.

The Commissioner of Pensions, also, in a letter to the chairman of the committee, dated February 2, 1852, says: "Had the evidence of a commissioned officer been produced, to show, in positive terms, that the rupture was incurred in the line of his duty, the claim to a pension would have been allowed at the Pension Office."

Mr. CLEMENS. I am not perfectly satisfied as to the propriety of allowing this pension. I should like to inquire further into the merits of the case.

The PRESIDENT. Does the Senator propose that the bill should be passed over?

Mr. CLEMENS. Yes, sir.

The bill was accordingly passed over; but at a subsequent period of the day, its consideration was resumed, on motion by Mr. Fish, Mr. CLEMENS having withdrawn his opposition.

The bill was then reported to the Senate without amendment, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was subsequently read a third time and passed.

THOMAS H. LEGGETT.

The PRESIDENT announced the next bill in order to be that for the relief of Thomas H. Leggett.

Mr. HUNTER. I object to that.

The PRESIDENT. Does the Senator desire to discuss it?

Mr. HUNTER. I believe the bill has been discussed pretty fully. I am willing, if the yeas and nays are taken, to have it voted upon now. I think, however, it is a bill which was passed over to accommodate the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COOPER,] and that on the whole it will be well to pass it over again.

So the bill was passed over.

IRA DAY.

The bill for the relief of Ira Day, of Vermont, was announced as next in order.

Mr. HUNTER. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] requested me to say that he would like to have that bill laid over.

Mr. BADGER. I would suggest that it would be better not to lay the bill over. I believe it has been discussed during six or seven hours already, and I think it should be disposed of. If the consequence of having it laid over will be to renew the discussion, that is an additional reason for not doing it.

The PRESIDENT. This is a day on which no discussion can be had upon any bill.

Mr. BADGER. I am aware of that; but if the bill is to be discussed further, hereafter, it should not be passed over.

Mr. HUNTER. Upon reflection, I think it will be as well to take the vote on the bill. I think that the Senator from Delaware did discuss it.

Mr. ADAMS. That is no reason why he may not wish to do it again.

The bill was then read, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill originally authorized the Postmaster General to pay to Ira Day, of Vermont, $1,008 90, together with interest thereon, from the first day of July, 1837, out of the funds of the Post Office Department, in full for the balance due to him for transporting the mail from Royalton to Burlington, in the State of Vermont, from January, 1833, to July, 1837, and had been amended by striking out the words, "together with interest thereon, from the first day of July, 1837."

The bill was then reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. HUNTER. Is that the bill in which the allowance of interest was stricken out?

The PRESIDENT. The allowance of interest was stricken out when the bill was under consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The question was then taken on concurring in the amendment, and it was not concurred in.

Mr. HUNTER. I now desire to have the bill passed over; because if interest is to be allowed, it becomes a debatable matter again.

So the bill was laid over.

HARRIET F. FISHER.

A bill for the relief of the widow of Marvin W. Fisher came up next in order, and was read a second time. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Harriet F. Fisher, the widow and executrix of Marvin W. Fisher, the sum of $20,000, as a full compensation for the past use of the machine invented by him for charging percussion caps in the arsenals of the United States, and also for the future free and undisturbed use by the Government of the patent-right to said machine, with its improvements, as patented on the 21st day of November, 1848, during the entire term of fourteen years for which said patent is to run.

Mr. HALE. What committee reported that bill?

The PRESIDENT. It was reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HALE. There is another bill relating to this very matter, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. SHIELDS,] who is not now in his seat, and the Senator from California, who reported the bill from the Committee on Naval Affairs, is not in his seat.

Mr. BADGER. Let the bill be passed over. So the bill was passed over.

SYLVANUS BLODGET.

The consideration, as in Committee of the Whole, of House bill for the relief of Sylvanus Blodget, was resumed. It enacts that the name of Sylvanus Blodget shall be placed by the Secretary of the Interior on the pension-roll, at eight dollars per month, commencing on 7th January, 1846.

Mr. HUNTER. I should wish to hear the report read.

The report was read accordingly.

The memorialist served as a private in a volunteer company in the war of 1812-'14 against England, and was present at the battle of Plattsburg, in September, 1814. Owing to fatigue and exposure while in the performance of military service, the memorialist contracted a serious illness, and in consequence of the enfeebled state of his health he has been incapable of manual labor since. He has lost the sight of one eye, and can see but imperfectly with the other, in addition to other bodily infirmities. He is also poor, and about sixty-five years of age. The facts stated by the memorialist are confirmed by the affidavits of his captain and colonel, and also by the certificates of two physicians.

Mr. ADAMS. I move to amend the bill by striking out "1846," and inserting "1852."

Mr. HALE. I made that motion the last time the bill was before the Senate; and I ought in justice to say that the chairman of the Committee on Pensions has informed me that the proof in this case was completed in 1846. The bill is drawn up in accordance with the rule applied by the Departments.

Mr. FOOT. I hope the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. ADAMS] will withdraw his motion. The facts are in effect what the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] has stated. The proof was completed on the 7th January, 1846; the report was made first in favor of the bill, two years ago or more—

Mr. ADAMS. I withdraw the motion.

The bill was then reported to the Senate without amendment, and read a third time and passed.

ROBERT ARMSTRONG.

The consideration, as in Committee of the Whole, of the bill for the relief of Robert Armstrong was resumed. The bill provides that the name of Robert Armstrong, of Tennessee, be placed on the pension roll by the Secretary of the Interior, and that he be paid a pension at the rate of thirty dollars per month during his life, commencing on the 14th May, 1845.

Mr. ATCHISON. That bill involves the principle of arrearages of pensions; and that is a question worthy of discussion, for the Commissioner of Pensions has informed me that the amount involved by this principle is nearly three or four millions of dollars.

Mr. HALE. That bill did involve the principle of arrearages when before the Senate on a previous occasion; but it has been so altered as to bring it down to the basis of the bill for the relief of Sylvanus Blodget, just passed. The arrearages have been abandoned, and the pension is only made payable from the time when the proof was completed.

Mr. ATCHISON. I withdraw my objection.

The bill was then reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was subsequently read a third time, and passed.

THOMAS PEMBER.

The Senate next proceeded to the consideration of the bill for the relief of Thomas Pember, as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill provides that the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be authorized and directed to audit and adjust the account of Thomas Pember, and to pay to him the difference between the compensation of a captain's clerk and a purser on board the United States steamer Vixen, from the 23d of October, 1848, to the 20th day of June, 1850, and the difference between the compensation of a captain's clerk and a purser on board the ship Electra, from the 1st day of July, 1847, to the 28th day of February, 1848, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to which this case was referred, reported that the certificates of Lieutenants James H. Ward and Timothy A. Hunt, respectively commanding the United States ship Electra and the United States steamer Vixen, show that the memorialist was captain's clerk on board the steamer Vixen from the 23d day of October, 1848, to the 20th day of June, 1850, and that during the same period he performed all the duties of a purser on board the vessel; that the labor thereof was "excessively arduous frequently, and for a portion of the time beyond all precedent," and that he was called upon to perform these duties because Lieutenant Commanding Ward's own duties, as commander of the vessel, rendered it impossible for him to give them his attention; and that the memorialist was captain's clerk on board the ship Electra from the 1st of July, 1847, to the 28th of February, 1848; and that he performed, also, during the same period, the duties of purser, which were arduous, and which were devolved upon him by Lieutenant Hunt, because the command of the ship, in active service in the Gulf of Mexico, required his undivided attention.

Mr. DAVIS. I shall be very glad to know whether this bill introduces a precedent of putting every captain's clerk, on board a small vessel, on the footing of a purser. Is this vessel—the Electra—one which had a purser assigned to it, or were the duties performed in some other way? Was it a vessel that usually carried a purser?

Mr. MALLORY. I will explain the matter to the Senator from Massachusetts. The certificates given by the masters of the vessels state that they could not perform the duties of pursers. These services, on the part of the person for whom the bill makes a compensation, were performed during the Mexican war. A purser was necessary on board those vessels at that time, but none was appointed for them. Mr. Pember was familiar with the duties of a purser, having discharged them before. They, therefore, called upon him to do it, and held out to him the idea that Government would compensate him. He accordingly did it, and discharged the duty faithfully, disbursing a large amount of pay and clothing. The proposition is to give him the difference between the pay of a captain's clerk and that of a purser. It involves no precedent.

Mr. DAVIS. I think the consideration of the bill should be postponed, simply for this reason: If, according to the usages of the Navy, this man is entitled to have his pay, as this bill proposes, I shall interpose no objection; but if it is introducing a new principle, that every officer who performs the duties of purser on every little craft shall have pay as a purser, I object to it.

So the bill was passed over.

GUION AND McLAUGHLIN.

The Senate next proceeded to the consideration of a bill for the relief of Guion and McLaughlin; which was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and provides that the Postmaster General be directed to pay to E. P. Guion and Benjamin McLaughlin the sum of $1,640 from the appropriation for mail transportation, being the amount due them, under the equitable terms of their contract with the Postmaster General, for two months' extra pay, upon the discontinuance of the transportation of the Southern mail, on route 2,802, from Raleigh to Fayetteville; on route 2,811, from Fayetteville to Cheraw; and on route 3,101, from Cheraw to Columbia, South Carolina; on the 6th of February, 1845, the Postmaster General having only paid the allowance for two months' extra service upon the amount dispensed with, when it should have been upon the whole amount of the contract.

Mr. HUNTER. Is there any report in that case?

The PRESIDENT. There is.

Mr. HUNTER. Let it be read.

The report was accordingly read; from which it appeared that the petitioners entered into contracts with the Post Office Department to carry the mail of the United States from Raleigh, North Carolina, by Middle Creek and Aversborough, to Fayetteville, six times a week and back, in two-horse coaches, the Postmaster General reserving the right to order the great Northern and Southern mail on this route at $10,800 per annum. Also, from Fayetteville, North Carolina, by Dane's Springs, Randallsville, Montpelier, Laurel Hill, and Brightsville to Cheraw, daily and back, in two-horse coaches, the Postmaster General reserving the right to order the great Northern and Southern mail on this route as advertised. That on the 3d of December, 1844, it was ordered that the great mail should be put upon each of the above routes as follows: 1844, December 3, the great mail on this route at $10,800 per annum, to go into effect January 1, 1845; and on the 20th of December, 1845, it was ordered that the allowance be entered into the contract, to be made in case the new service is discontinued before the expiration of the contract, shall be two months extra pay on account of the peculiar nature of the service, and the large outlay and expense to be incurred in stocking the route. That on the 6th of February, 1845, the great mail was discontinued on each route; and it was ordered in the case of Guion, that the two months' extra pay contracted for should be estimated on the amount saved, and not on the entire sum paid for the greater service. In the case of McLaughlin's contract to carry the great mail from Fayetteville, North Carolina, to Cheraw, for $13,320 per annum, the order indorsed thereon is as follows: "1845, February, '6. Annul the great mail service on this route, ordered 3d December, 1844, and allow two months' extra pay, according to contract, on the amount saved, $9,000 per annum, and restore the ordinary mail service, in two-horse coaches, at $4,320 per annum."

The report further stated that the petitioners appealed to Congress to be paid the difference between the two months' pay on such contract saved by Government, and like pay on the larger sums for the larger service; that the contract was made for the less service only, with the right reserved to the Department at its option to increase it, as before stated; that the stipulation to allow the contractors in this case two months' extra pay instead of one, had reference only to a subsequent order for the greater service, and its subsequent discontinuance; that it appeared that this stipulation by which the contractors were bound (if so ordered) to carry the great mail, had reference to an anticipated difficulty with the "Wilmington and Raleigh Railroad Company," then carrying the great Southern mail; and it was well understood, that should this mail be thrown on the contractors, it would involve a heavy outlay in coaches and horses, which would involve them in a proportionate loss, should the same be discontinued at an early day. That it so resulted in consequence of this new service being ordered on the third of December, 1845, and discontinued on the sixth of February, 1846, a period of only two months.

The report further states that upon the face of the contract, and the terms of the orders referring to it, the committee were disposed to consider that the contractors would, in strictness, be limited to the extra pay on the "amount dispensed with." But from the evidence of William H. Dundas, esq., who at the time of these contracts was principal clerk in the Contract Office, and who was summoned before the committee at the request of the petitioners, they were satisfied that such was not the construction placed upon them by either of the contracting parties, when the contracts were made, but that the Department, as well as the contractors, intended that the extra pay should be on the larger sums, which were stipulated for the new and larger service.

No amendment being offered, the bill was reported to the Senate, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

It was subsequently read a third time and passed.

ELIZABETH V. LOMAX.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of Elizabeth V. Lomax. It enacts that the name of Elizabeth V. Lomax, widow of Mann Page Lomax, late a major of the Ordnance Corps in the United States Army, be placed on the pension roll at the rate of thirty dollars per month for her life, commencing on 27th March, 1842.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to know from the Committee on Pensions, whether, in every case, they have fixed the time when completion of proof was made, as the time for the commencement of the pension? That point has already been mooted, and that was the point on which we stopped the allowance of some pensions the other day. If it is understood that all the bills conform to the regulations made in the Pension Office in that respect, I have no objection to this measure; but as its operation extends as far back as 1842, I should like to know whether the proof was completed at that time?

Mr. FOOT. I will state to the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] that it is the intention of the Committee on Pensions to act on that rule, to limit the time when the pensions shall commence to the period when the proof shall be completed. I cannot say whether this bill was drawn up in accordance with that rule, as it was reported by the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. BORLAND,] but I presume that the rule applies in this case also.

Mr. BORLAND. What is the date at which the pension commences?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Eighteen hundred and forty-two.

Mr. BORLAND. The principle on which that bill was reported was the recognition of the claim from the death of the individual of whom this lady is the widow; and as I stated on a previous occasion, the action of the committee was based on the propriety of regarding that as a disability on the part of his widow. Believing that an invalid soldier should be entitled to a pension from the time when the disability should commence, if the pension be due at all, the object of the law is, clearly, that it should commence as a compensation, or supply of means when the disability commenced.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will be under the necessity of directing the bill to pass over, if it is likely to lead to discussion.

Mr. BORLAND. One word more. The operation of this bill extends back only to the time when the disability began.

Mr. HALE. Let it lie over.

The bill was passed over accordingly.

THEODORE E. ELLIOT.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of Theodore E. Elliot. The bill provides that the sum of $300 be paid to Theodore E. Elliot, in satisfaction of his claim for a keel-boat furnished to P. M. Butler, late agent of the Cherokees, and used in transporting supplies, under treaty, to the Indian territory.

At the request of Mr. HUNTER, the report in the case was read, the substance of which has been previously published.

Mr. HUNTER. I would like to hear a statement of the proof of this claim. I find here on the table of the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] who is now absent, and who has examined this matter, this memorandum made upon the bill: "This claim is not proved."

Mr. SEBASTIAN. When that bill was up before, the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] a member of the Committee on Claims, requested that it might lie over in order to give him an opportunity to examine it. He inquired whether there was any evidence of the recognition of the contract by the Department? He was told that there was no evidence on the books of the Department that the debt had been paid; but he did not know that no evidence could appear there until the agent appeared to claim the payment of the money. The committee resorted to the books of the Department to ascertain whether the debt had been discharged, and it appeared that the agent had given no credit for the amount, and that the money had not been paid.

Mr. HUNTER. Was there any proof of the contract?

Mr. SEBASTIAN. That is proved by several witnesses, besides the pilot engaged in steering the boat, reputable persons, some of whom were known to myself.

The bill was then reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was subsequently read a third time and passed.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. BADGER. I desire to avail myself of this favorable moment to submit a motion, which is, that when the Senate adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. ADAMS. I hope, Mr. President, that that motion will not prevail. I think we ought to meet to-morrow and dispose of the deficiency bill; and with that view I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken, resulted—yeas 27, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Bell, Berrien, Borland, Brooke, Cass, Clarke, Davis, Dawson, Downs, Felch, Fish, Foot, Hale, Hamlin, James, Mallory, Mangum, Miller, Morton, Rusk, Sebastian, Seward, Sumner, Upham, and Wade—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Brodhead, Chase, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Geyer, Hunter, King, Norris, Smith, Spruance, Underwood, and Weller—13.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ATCHISON. I deem it my duty to make one more effort to induce the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Executive business; and I therefore move to suspend the rules which set apart Friday for the consideration of private bills for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of Executive business.

Mr. JAMES. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion for one moment.

Mr. ATCHISON. Certainly.

Mr. JAMES. I ask, as a special favor, that Senate bill No. 421 may be taken up. It relates to the case of a poor wounded soldier standing at our door, destitute of the necessities of life, or even what he requires to provide him medicine.

Mr. HAMLIN. If we continue with the Private Calendar, we shall reach that bill to-day without taking it out of its order.

Mr. JAMES. I think not. I hope gentlemen will consent to have the bill taken up. If the gentleman from Maine had seen this individual as I have, he would not oppose taking up the bill, I am sure. I have put my hand into my own pocket, to furnish him means of procuring medicine.

Mr. HAMLIN. I give way.

Mr. BADGER. That is right.

The motion to take up the bill was agreed to; which was a bill for the relief of John Williams.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed by the Secretary, that the bill has not been printed. It was ordered to be printed, but has not been returned from the printer, and, therefore, cannot now be considered.

So the bill was passed over.

BARBARA REILY.

The Senate next proceeded to the consideration of Senate bill No. 208, being a bill for the relief of Barbara Reily.

The bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the Secretary of the Interior be required to pay to Barbara Reily, widow of Captain William Reily, an officer of the Army of the Revolution, the amount of pension due him from the time he was last paid, to the 4th day of March, 1820.

Mr. ATCHISON. There is a report in that case, which I desire to have read.

The report was accordingly read; from which it appeared, that the petitioner was the widow of Captain William Reily, an officer who served in the revolutionary war, and was placed on the pension roll under the act of 18th March, 1818, at the rate of twenty dollars per month, commencing March 23d, 1818, and who was paid his pension to the 4th of September, 1819. By a letter of the Commissioner of Pensions to the chairman of the committee, it appeared, that in April, 1820, his name was stricken from the roll by the Secretary of War, in consequence of his not being in indigent circumstances. In July, 1824, he died.

The report further shows that the petitioner now claims that her deceased husband had, under the act of 1818, a vested right to the pension at the rate of twenty dollars per month during his life, and prays that payment be made to her at that rate, from the time when her late husband was last paid to the day of his death; that the act of 18th March, 1818, granted a pension to each officer, non-commissioned officer, musician, and private soldier, who served in the revolutionary war, for a period and in a manner specified in the act, and who "by reason of his reduced circumstances in life shall be in need of the assistance of his country for support;" that by the terms of this act the right of an applicant to a pension depends upon the existence of the necessitous circumstances mentioned; and unless the act of the Secretary of War, in placing the name of an applicant on the pension roll, is conclusive of that fact, it cannot be claimed that the right to the pension vested so as to exclude all inquiry into the facts.

In the opinion of the committee, the placing the name on the pension roll had no such effect under the act of 1818; but that it was entirely competent for Congress to cause the facts upon which the pension depended to be inquired into and determined upon evidence; and this was the object of the act of the 1st of May, 1820, which provides that no person who then was, or who might be thereafter placed on the pension list by virtue of the act of the 18th of March, 1818, should, after the payment of that part of the pension which became due on the 4th of March, 1820, continue to receive the pension granted by said act until he should have exhibited to some court of record a schedule of his property, verified by oath, which schedule and oath, duly authenticated, were required to be exhibited to the Secretary of War; and it was made the duty of the Secretary, upon receipt of the schedule, to cause to be struck from the pension list the name of every person who, in his opinion, was not in such indigent circumstances as to be unable to support himself without the assistance of his country.

This act, in the opinion of the committee, divested no vested right, and was not unreasonable in its requirements. It merely required the production of evidence of the fact upon which the right to the pension depended, and that evidence of a kind which every pensioner might readily furnish. It only suspended the payment of the pension until the evidence was exhibited, and then submitted it to the judgment of the Secretary of War to decide on each case, whether the necessitous circumstances existed which entitled the party, under the act of 1818, to a pension.

It did not appear that the late husband of the petitioner was at any time in such necessitous circumstances as to need the assistance of his country for support, nor was it alleged that he in his lifetime complied with the act of 1820, or furnished any of the evidence required by that act. Upon the facts, therefore, as presented, it did not appear that the deceased husband of the petitioner was entitled to a pension after the 4th of March, 1820; but as the act of May, 1820, contemplated the payment up to that date, the committee concluded that it ought to be paid to the petitioner, and reported a bill accordingly.

The bill was reported without amendment, ordered to be engrossed, and was read a third time and passed.

ROBERT MILLIGAN.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of House bill for the relief of Robert Milligan, which enacts that the Secretary of the Interior be directed to place the name of Robert Milligan upon the invalid pension roll, at the rate of four dollars per month, in addition to the sum of four dollars to which he was entitled under the law of Congress, approved June 25, 1834, to commence on the first of January, 1852.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be read a third time; and having been read a third time, was passed.

NOAH MILLER.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Noah Miller, of Lincolnville, in the State of Maine, and for the relief of other persons. It enacts that there shall be paid out of the Treasury, from any money not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,000 to the legal representatives of Noah Miller, and such other persons, or their legal representatives, who aided either as boat's crew or pilot, in making prize of the British schooner Mary, and taking her into port in the year 1814, in Penobscot Bay, in such proportions to each as the Secretary of the Treasury shall determine—which vessel and cargo, after having been taken in port, was libeled, condemned, and sold, and one half of the proceeds, amounting to more than $32,000, paid into the Treasury of the United States, said vessel and cargo having been surrendered to the collector of the customs for that district.

Mr. HUNTER asked for the reading of the report of the Committee on Commerce; but after a few lines had been read, withdrew his request.

Mr. HAMLIN. I desire to make a single statement in regard to that report. There have been four or five reports made in this matter; but the one which was adopted by the Committee on Commerce at the present session, is one which was formerly made by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS,] from the same committee.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

PUBLISHED AT WASHINGTON, BY JOHN C. RIVES.—TERMS $3 FOR THIS SESSION.

32d CONGRESS, 1st Session.

MONDAY, MAY 24, 1852.

NEW SERIES....No. 90.

In the written report, there was a slip prepared by myself, stating that the committee readopted that report. It does not appear so in the printed report, but does in that which I drew up. I feel bound to say that in justice to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HALE. I move to amend the bill by striking out all after the word "determine." The words which follow that are simply recitative.

Mr. WELLER. It is to strike out the argument.

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have no objection to that. The amendment was agreed to. The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; the amendment was concurred in; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was subsequently read a third time and passed.

MARTHA L. DOWNES.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of Martha L. Downes. It provides that the widows, if any such there be, and in case there is no widow, the child or children, and if there be no child, then the parent or parents, or if no parents, then the brothers and sisters of the officers, seamen, and marines who were in the service of the United States, and lost in the United States schooners Grampus and Seagull, shall receive out of the Treasury a sum equal to six months' pay of their relatives, in addition to the pay due to said relatives when the vessels were lost.

Mr. HALE. Can that be the right bill? Is that the bill for the relief of Martha L. Downes? The PRESIDENT. That is the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I suppose Martha L. Downes is a widow, entitled to some of the benefits which this bill confers upon the whole class of representatives of the officers and sailors who were lost on board the ships mentioned in the bill. I imagine they may as well be all passed in a bulk, as each one separately.

Mr. BADGER. As regards the title of the bill, I have only to say that the subject came before the Committee on Naval Affairs, on the petition of Martha L. Downes, widow of the commander of the schooner Grampus, at the time that schooner was lost. The bill was entitled a bill for her relief. Of course, the title will have to be amended.

On the request of Mr. HUNTER, the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs was read, from which it appears, that in several cases, laws have been passed granting to the widows and orphans of the officers, seamen, and marines of various vessels which were lost, an extra allowance. The act of June 15, 1844, directed that the widows and orphans of those on board the Grampus and Seagull, should receive the compensation which was due them at the time of their loss, but made no provision for extra pay, as in the other cases. No reason is known to exist for the discrimination against the widows and children of the officers, seamen, and marines, lost in the Grampus and Seagull, and without such reason the discrimination must be unjust; and the committee, therefore, report a bill to supply the omission in the act of June 15, 1844, and place those persons on a footing of equality with others provided for in similar cases.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was subsequently read a third time and passed, and the title was amended on the motion of Mr. BADGER, so as to read, "An act to amend and extend the provisions of an act entitled 'An act for the relief of the widows and orphans of the officers, seamen, and marines of the United States schooner Grampus, and for other purposes,' approved June 15th, 1844."

ROBERT T. NORRIS.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of Robert T. Norris.

It directs that there shall be paid to Robert T. Norris, in consideration of injuries received by him while acting as pilot under the direction of the collector of customs at New York, the sum of —, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. SEWARD. I move to fill the blank with the sum of $500.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Let the bill go over.

Mr. SEWARD. I hope the Senator will allow me to fill the blank.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That involves an inquiry into the nature of the services.

The bill was accordingly passed over.

LEWIS H. BATES AND WILLIAM LACON.

The bill for the relief of Lewis H. Bates and William Lacon was next considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes and directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to audit and allow the claim of Lewis H. Bates and William Lacon, or either of them, for losses and damages sustained by them, in consequence of the proceedings of custom-house officers at New York, in exacting from them for certain importations of iron into that port, made between June 15th, 1829, and January 1st, 1832, higher duties than were required by law; and in seizing and libeling some of said goods, upon the refusal of Bates & Lacon to enter the same, as subject to the said higher duty; and for certain costs of court paid by them, and not reimbursed. There is a proviso in the bill, that no greater sum shall be allowed than will reimburse the parties for the costs and expenses actually paid by them, and not repaid to them, in the various suits touching said importations; and certain sums paid by them for the storage of said goods, while kept out of their possession; and such sum also as will pay them for the damage they sustained by the detention of the money exacted from them by the collector, and allow for said detention a damage not exceeding the rate of six per centum per annum, from the time the moneys were paid to the time they were refunded.

Mr. HUNTER. I shall debate that bill. It ought to have gone to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT. Certainly it ought.

Mr. HUNTER. Cases of that sort are always considered by that committee. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SEWARD. I hope not. There is no necessity for it.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope the chairman of the Committee on Finance will not make objection to the bill on account of its not having been referred to his committee. This is only asking for indemnity for expenses incurred in carrying on certain lawsuits.

Mr. HUNTER. Does it not provide for the refunding of duties?

Mr. DAVIS. It only provides for indemnity for expenses incurred in certain lawsuits. That may be a very proper question to be discussed.

Mr. HUNTER. Then I ask that it may be laid over.

The bill was accordingly passed over.

Mr. HUNTER subsequently said:

I objected a short time ago to a bill for the relief of Lewis H. Bates and William Lacon. I was not aware of what it was at the time. I shall not vote for it; but I am not willing to interpose my single objection to delay it. I therefore will withdraw my objection, if the Senate desire to take it up.

The bill was then taken up for consideration.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not think I can vote for the bill in its present form. I think the Senator who has care of it had better consider whether he will not propose some amendment to it.

The PRESIDENT. Does the Senator propose to debate the bill?

Mr. DAVIS. I think it had better lie over for consideration.

The PRESIDENT. It will lie over.

RICHARD MACKALL.

The bill for the relief of Richard Mackall was read, and the Senate proceeded to consider it as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the proper accounting officer of the Treasury to audit the claim of Richard Mackall, for the destruction of his tobacco warehouse, wheat, and tobacco, by the British, in June, 1814; and to ascertain the losses sustained by him by reason of the destruction of that property. It also provides, that if the amount of damage, as ascertained, shall not exceed $5,000, it shall be paid to the claimant.

Mr. HUNTER. That is one of the cases which the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] requested me to have passed over.

The PRESIDENT. It will be passed over.

ROBERT SEWALL.

The PRESIDENT. The next bill on the Calendar is that for the relief of the heirs and representatives of the late Robert Sewall. It is of a similar character to the one which has just been passed over.

Mr. HUNTER. I ask that it may lie over.

The PRESIDENT. It will be passed over.

JOHN W. ROBINSON.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill from the House of Representatives, for the relief of John W. Robinson. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of John W. Robinson, of the State of Maryland, a soldier in the late war with Great Britain, on the invalid pension roll, at the rate of eight dollars per month—to commence June 1st, 1850, and to continue during his natural life.

The report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the House of Representatives was read. It appears from the affidavit of John W. Robinson, and that of Peter McCartney, that Robinson served as a volunteer under General Hull. About the first of March, 1814, he enlisted, in the State of Ohio, in the first regiment of United States infantry, and served on the Canada frontier, and was in all the engagements, from the taking of Fort Erie to the cessation of hostilities, including the battle of Lundy's Lane and Chippewa. At Bridge-water he was wounded above the knee; but paid no attention to the wound. It has since broken out several times, and is a source of great pain.

In the performance of his duty in 1814, he was obliged to stand at his post in water to various depths, until the water froze round him and he became paralyzed, and was ready to sink under his sufferings. He was relieved by the cessation of hostilities, when he was taken across the river to Markee hospital. In consequence of his sufferings he became afflicted with paralysis, and so continued. In 1839, he applied to the Commissioner of Pensions for a pension; but it not appearing from the roll that he was wounded or disabled, and not having a certificate of his officer, he was refused. He did not apply for a pension before, because he could still work some, and did not want it; but the older he gets, the more he is affected by the rheumatism and paralysis which he contracted in the war.

The committee thought the case a meritorious one, and reported a bill accordingly.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be read a third time. It was subsequently read a third time and passed.

HENRY KING.

The PRESIDENT announced, as next upon the Calendar, the bill for the relief of the representatives of Henry King.

Mr. HUNTER. That is one of the bills which the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] asked me to have laid over.

The PRESIDENT. It will be passed over.

PAYMENT OF WITNESSES.

The bill for the relief of John Jackson, Joseph Pineau, and Louis A. S. Smith, was read and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to John Jackson, Joseph Pineau, and Louis A. S. Smith, the mileage allowed by law to witnesses attending the courts of the United States, for their attendance from Port-au-Prince, in the Island of St. Domingo, to the city of Boston, in the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. HUNTER. That is another bill which the Senator from Delaware asked me to have laid over. He says too much mileage is allowed. He thinks it introduces a new principle, and desires to discuss it.

Mr. ADAMS. I rise to a question of order. I understand, according to the resolution which we have adopted, that on every fourth Friday, if a Senator wishes to discuss one of these private bills, it must be passed over.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia states that the Senator from Delaware, who is not now present, wishes to discuss this bill.

Mr. ADAMS. He cannot intimate his wish by proxy. If he can, he had better make his speech by proxy. If these bills ought to pass, and a Senator who objects to them is not here, it is his misfortune; it is not his fault. I do object to a Senator leaving here, and leaving it with another Senator to intimate when a bill comes up that he desires to discuss it.

Mr. HUNTER. These are matters to which the Senator from Delaware—who is a member of the Committee on Claims—has given his attention. He is better able to discuss them than most others are. I believe it is usual, at the mere request of a Senator, out of courtesy to him, to let a subject lie over.

Mr. BADGER. I suppose no gentleman here proposes to discuss the bill.

The PRESIDENT. The rule adopted is, that when a bill leads to discussion, it must be passed over.

Mr. BADGER. As soon as any discussion arises, I suppose it goes over. None has arisen on this bill yet.

Mr. ADAMS. The point of order I made was, that the suggestion that a Senator would discuss a bill, if he were here, does not come within the rule.

The PRESIDENT. Strictly speaking, it does not; but it is customary, in the Senate, when a Senator who is going to discuss a bill is absent, to pass it over. If, however, the Senate is disposed to take up the bills as they come, and enforce the rule, without reference to the absence of a Senator, it can be done.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I believe we have practiced upon such a suggestion as the Senator from Virginia makes; but I am perfectly willing to unite with the Senator from Mississippi to let it be known that it is the last time we will do it. I think, however, a little notice ought to be given before we change what has been our practice. I think it a very bad rule to say that because a gentleman who wishes to discuss a bill is absent, we will accommodate him, and suspend the business of the country on that account. But I think, as we have been practicing somewhat upon it, instead of changing it immediately, upon this bill, we had better let it be understood that it shall not be the rule hereafter.

Mr. ADAMS. I believe this is the second day that the Senate have acted under the resolution setting apart certain days for the consideration of private bills, which shall not lead to debate, and consequently no established rule has grown up, nor do I recollect that this mode of objecting to the consideration of a bill has occurred before.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will act under the direction of the Senate. If it is the pleasure of the Senate to proceed with the bill, after the suggestion made by the Senator from Virginia, it will be considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CHASE. For the purpose of testing the sense of the Senate, I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until next Friday. I think it would be wrong, in the absence of the Senator from Delaware, when he requested that it should be postponed, to go on with it. I am perfectly willing that the Senator from Mississippi, or any other Senator, should give notice that he will, on the next occasion of the kind, insist on going on with the bill.

Mr. ADAMS. My object is not to deprive the Senator from Delaware, who is absent, of the opportunity of discussing the bill; but to let this action be understood as an intimation that in future I shall insist on avoiding this.

The PRESIDENT. The proposition is to postpone the further consideration of the bill until Friday next.

Mr. BUTLER. This bill comes from the Judiciary Committee, and has my individual sanction; but I think it a very favorable thing to legislation that we should have one gentleman like the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] who has given his attention to these private claims. Every veto in the way of disbursing the public money is an advantage; and I would vote with greater confidence upon a question which had received the examination of such a gentleman, than upon any general view which I might have of it. I think the principle is a good one to extend this kind of courtesy, and let as many delays take place as may on account of them.

Mr. CHASE. I made the motion out of courtesy to the Senator from Delaware, who is absent. I am very certain that the Senator from Mississippi would not press his objection, unless he considered the claim a very meritorious one; but after the suggestion made by the Senator from Virginia, that the Senator from Delaware has examined the claim—and we all know that he has turned his attention to private claims—and that he wishes to discuss it, it seems to me that it is nothing more than is really due to courtesy that he should have the opportunity to do so.

The motion to postpone the further consideration of the bill was agreed to.

JOHN McVEY.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of John McVey. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of John McVey, of the State of Arkansas, a soldier in the late war with Great Britain, on the invalid pension roll, at the rate of eight dollars per month, to commence on the 1st of April, 1850, and continue during his natural life.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

It was subsequently read a third time and passed.

JOHN JACKSON.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the House bill for the relief of the heirs of John Jackson. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the heirs and legal representatives of John Jackson, the pilot on board the "Bon Homme Richard" during her brilliant engagement with the British frigate "Serapis," in which action Jackson lost an arm, such a sum as would be equal to a pension at the rate of six dollars a month from November 15th, 1779, to the day of his death, agreeably to the pledge given by the captain of the "Bon Homme Richard," and the report of the committee of the Continental Congress made September 23th, 1785.

Mr. BRIGHT. Let it lie over. I propose to discuss it.

The PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

GAD HUMPHREYS.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of Gad Humphreys, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs. It directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to ascertain the value of the property of Gad Humphreys, which was burned and destroyed by order of Colonel Pearce, of the United States Army, at Port Defiance, in the State of Florida, in the year 1834; and that there be paid to him the amount thus ascertained out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. BORLAND. I think I can save time by a word of explanation of this bill. This claim is presented to the Senate under circumstances which commend it to their favorable consideration. This bill was reported for the payment of Mr. Humphreys several years ago, and passed the Senate without a dissenting voice, and went to the House of Representatives. After it passed here, another bill was passed for the relief of George Centre, based upon the bill for the relief of Mr. Humphreys as a precedent. It went also to the House of Representatives, and by some extraordinary efforts of its friends there passed. Mr. Humphreys's bill did not pass that session. That is the ground of this bill. It was deemed to be so good a claim when it passed here before, that George Centre's bill was passed because it was of the same character. That is all I have to say. The payment of the claim has been delayed for years.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was subsequently read a third time, and passed.

ROSANNA SOWARDS.

Mr. RUSK. I have before me a report of about a dozen lines, in a case that appeals strongly to my feelings, and I feel a disposition to appeal to the Senate. With their permission, I will read the report, preparatory to moving to take up a bill out of its order.

The Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the petition of Rosanna Sowards, report:

"That the petitioner is the mother of Griffin Sowards, deceased, who enlisted to serve twelve months in the first regiment of Ohio volunteers, company D, who was wounded in the battle of Monterey, and was, in consequence of said wound, discharged for disability; and who died at Brazos Island on the 5th of December, 1846, while endeavoring to reach his home in Ohio. From testimony quite satisfactory to the committee, it appears that the said Griffin Sowards was but seventeen years old at the time he enlisted; at which time his mother, who was a widow, and in destitute circumstances, depended much on his labor to aid her in supporting several young children, left to her sole care on the death of her husband. He was her eldest child; and when she found he had marched with the volunteers she followed them for some distance, for the purpose of getting him to return home; but in this she was frustrated by sickness, which prevented her from overtaking the company in which her son was mustered.

"In view of the facts presented, the committee have deemed it expedient to grant relief to the petitioner, believing that she was legally and justly entitled to the services of her son, being a minor at the time she was deprived of them by the recruiting officer; and they therefore report a bill, and recommend its passage."

I move, therefore, to take up the bill which accompanies that report.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill was accordingly read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It requires the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Rosanna Sowards, of Lawrence county, Ohio, upon the pension roll, at the rate of four dollars per month for five years; commencing on the 4th of March, 1852.

Mr. ATCHISON. I move to amend the bill by striking out "four dollars" and inserting "eight dollars." Eight dollars per month would be little enough. That would pay her for the services of her son at the rate of about $100 a year, from the time he enlisted until he would be twenty-one years of age, when she would be no longer entitled to his services.

Mr. WELLER. I hope that amendment will be agreed to. I can speak of my own personal knowledge, that the young man, whose mother is provided for in this bill, was one of the most gallant young men we had in our regiment. I was lieutenant-colonel of the regiment at the battle of Monterey, and I know personally that this young man suffered very much from the wounds that he received in that engagement.

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill was reported to the Senate as amended. The amendment was concurred in, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was subsequently read a third time and passed.

SARAH D. MACKAY.

The bill for the relief of Sarah D. Mackay was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It requires the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Sarah D. Mackay, widow of Alexander D. Mackay, late a lieutenant in the Army of the United States, on the pension roll, at the rate of fifteen dollars per month, to commence January 1, 1850, and to continue during her natural life.

The bill was reported to the Senate, without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was subsequently read a third time and passed.

HIRAM MOORE AND JOHN HASCALL.

The PRESIDENT announced the next bill in order to be a bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Hiram Moore and John Hascall.

Mr. JAMES intimating a desire to debate the bill, it was laid over.

NANCY BOWEN.

The bill for the relief of Nancy Bowen was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. By it the Secretary of the Interior is required to place the name of Nancy Bowen upon the pension roll, at the rate of six dollars per month; said pension commencing January 1, 1850.

The bill was reported to the Senate, without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was subsequently read a third time and passed.

LAFAYETTE McLAWS.

The bill for the relief of Captain Lafayette McLaws, of the Army of the United States, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It requires the Secretary of War to cause Captain McLaws, of the United States Army, to be paid the difference between the pay allowed by law to a first lieutenant of infantry and a captain in the staff, from October 23, 1849, to July 19, 1851, any law to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. FELCH called for the reading of the report, and it was accordingly read.

From it it appears that Captain McLaws, in the month of August, 1849, was detailed, by order, from the headquarters of the sixth military department, for duty with Brevet Colonel John Munroe, major of the 2d Artillery, who was at the time under orders to proceed and assume the command of the ninth military department, which embraced New Mexico and a portion of Texas. Captain McLaws, as ordered, moved with Colonel Munroe for Santa Fé, on the 1st of September, 1849, and arrived there on the 22d of October. On the 23d of the same month, Colonel Munroe assumed the command of the department, relieving Brevet Lieutenant Colonel Washington, Major 3d Artillery, of that duty, and also of his duties as civil and military Governor of New Mexico. Colonel Munroe appointed Captain McLaws his assistant adjutant-general, which duty was performed by him until Colonel Munroe was relieved by Lieutenant-Colonel Sumner, in July last. Captain McLaws was assistant adjutant-general for about twenty-two months. His duties were very arduous, owing to the peculiar state of affairs in New Mexico, and during that time he was only in the receipt of the pay of a first lieutenant of the line, which was inadequate to his support. The committee therefore propose to give him pay equal to that of a captain in the staff, the duties of which office he performed. There is, accompanying the report, a certificate from Colonel Munroe, setting forth these facts.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was subsequently read a third time and passed.

W. D. PORTER.

The bill for the relief of Lieutenant W. D. Porter was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Lieutenant William D. Porter, of the Navy of the United States, the sum of $1,848 61, to reimburse him for the amount of money expended by him for expenses incurred in bringing Amin Bey, of the Turkish Navy, and his attendants, to the United States, in the year 1850, at the request of the Minister Resident of the United States at Constantinople.

Mr. BORLAND. I do not understand this matter very well. I would like to have some explanation of the bill. If there is a report in the case, I should like to hear it read. I wish to have some knowledge of the reason for the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state the object of the bill in a few words. Amin Bey was a Turkish gentleman, who was entertained in this country. He went through the United States, and for his expenses in this country an appropriation was made by Congress. Having done that, I think we ought not to tax the officer who brought him here, with the expense of bringing him. That is the state of the case.

Mr. BORLAND. I am not disposed to discuss this bill, but it seems to me that this stands precisely on the footing of some other claims which I have known to be presented by naval officers, and paid at the Navy Department. I know of one that strikes me as being of a similar character. Captain Carpenter, of the Navy, at one time was subject to extraordinary expenses, in consequence of entertaining some guests of the nation on board the ship he commanded; but I well know that I myself went to the Navy Department and presented his claim, and that it was paid. That was in 1848. It was recognized then as a proper claim to be paid out of some fund in the Navy Department. And I do not see why this claim cannot be paid in the same way, without bringing it before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT. If the bill gives rise to discussion, it must lie over.

Mr. HALE. I think that is the best way.

The PRESIDENT. It will lie over.

RICHARD KING.

The bill for the relief of Richard King was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that Richard King be confirmed in his title to two hundred and forty arpents of land on the eastern bank of the Ouachita river, in the parish of Caldwell, in the State of Louisiana, which was conveyed by the claimant of the Maison Rouge grant, to Bagwell Bailey, in 1818, for cutting a road through said grant, and which has remained in possession of and cultivation by said Bailey and his successors to the present time, and is now a part of the plantation of the said King, on which he has resided for many years, and that a patent issue for it after a legal survey is made and returned under the direction of the Surveyor General: Provided, that this act shall amount only to a relinquishment of title on the part of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was subsequently read a third time and passed.

REPRESENTATIVES OF JOSHUA KENNEDY.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Joshua Kennedy, deceased, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the legal representatives of Joshua Kennedy, deceased, the sum of $6,590, in full compensation for the destruction of property by the Creek Indians, in the year 1813.

Mr. HALE called for the reading of the report.

It was accordingly read. The committee state, that they entered upon the examination of the claim with a feeling of distrust as to its justice, occasioned by the length of time during which it had been permitted to remain unsettled, and the fact that a commission had been appointed for the purpose of deciding on these and similar claims, but that the prejudice which had thus arisen soon passed away, on a careful examination of the facts. The property of Joshua Kennedy was occupied by the troops of the United States as a fort, during the last war with Great Britain, and there can be no doubt, say the committee, that such occupation was the cause of its destruction; and hence the case comes clearly within the spirit, if not within the letter, of the act of 1816, and the supplement thereto; for the exciting cause of the destruction being the military occupation of the property, it is difficult to imagine what difference the precise moment at which the destruction took place, can make. There was a feeling of hostility created on the part of the enemy, by the act of the Government, in erecting a source of annoyance in the neighborhood, which, in the opinion of the committee, should make the Government liable for the consequences of its own act, and not the particular time chosen by the enemy to satisfy its vengeance. The petitioner in this case had originally erected his buildings and other improvements, under the assurance given in the President's proclamation, that the person and property of the settlers should be protected. Subsequently, the buildings were converted into a temporary fort, and as such, became a point of assault for the Indians. After a successful attack on Fort Mims, and the massacre of its garrison, the enemy destroyed this property. Although it was not then in the possession of the troops of the United States, yet as it was undoubtedly destroyed in consequence of its occupation by the troops, the committee think the claim ought to be allowed.

Mr. HALE. As this case comes within the same rule as a class of claims which the Senate rejected the other day by a vote, upon the yeas and nays, saving the expression of an opinion by the committee, that this destruction may possibly have been occasioned by the former occupancy of the property in question by the troops of the United States, I desire to say something about it.

The PRESIDENT. The bill giving rise to debate, will be laid over.

WILLIAM GREER.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill from the House of Representatives, for the relief of William Greer. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to William Greer the sum of $60 25, with legal interest thereon, from July, 1843, it being in full payment of moneys by him at that time advanced to the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

SURETIES OF DANIEL WINSLOW.

The bill for the relief of the sureties of Daniel Winslow was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It enacts that Daniel Winslow and James N. Winslow, and their legal representatives, and the real and personal property of each, be released and relieved from all judgments and from all liens and incumbrances of said judgments in favor of the United States, obtained against them in any district court of the United States, as security for Daniel Winslow: Provided, that the costs of said suits be first paid by the said Winslows.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was subsequently read a third time and passed.

BANCROFT WOODCOCK.

The bill for the relief of Bancroft Woodcock, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the several patents granted to Bancroft Woodcock, on the 26th of January, 1832, on the 23d of November, 1836, on the 14th of June, 1837, and on the 31st of January, 1845, for his improvement in the self-sharpening plow, a description of which is given in the schedules annexed to the letters patent granted as aforesaid, be renewed and extended for the term of ten years, from and after the passage of the act: Provided, that Bancroft Woodcock shall, in three months after the passage of the act, make and file in the Patent Office amended specifications of his inventions, for the purpose of correcting defects therein, and shall pay the legal fees and charges thereon; and the Commissioner of Patents is directed to receive the surrender of the said patent on payment of the fees and charges provided by law, and shall issue to Bancroft Woodcock new patents on such amended specifications, reciting said patents, and referring to this act.

Mr. HALE. I do not like to object to this bill; but there is a principle in it to which I am opposed, and that is, allowing parties to file new specifications under these extension acts. I think the principle is wrong; but if nobody objects to the bill, I shall not.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to amend the bill by inserting "seven years," instead of "ten years." My reasons are these: the law authorizes the Commissioner of Patents to renew patents for seven years; the policy of Congress hitherto has been to limit them to that period of time, for, by granting a longer time, you only induce everybody to come here for renewals, instead of going to the Patent Office. I believe we have adhered to that principle. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. BORLAND. I would inquire of some Senator who understands the bill, when the patents, which it is now proposed to renew, expired? If no one can give me the information, I would prefer that the bill should be laid over.

Mr. DAVIS. I think that is the best course.

The PRESIDENT. The bill will be laid over.

CYRUS H. MCCORMICK.

The PRESIDENT announced that the bill for the relief of Cyrus H. McCormick was the next on the Private Calendar.

Mr. NORRIS intimating a wish to discuss the bill, it was laid over.

CAPTORS OF THE FRIGATE PHILADELPHIA.

The PRESIDENT announced that the next bill in order was the bill for the relief of the captors of the frigate Philadelphia.

Mr. HALE. I shall discuss that bill a great deal before it is passed.

The bill was accordingly laid over.

FREDERICK VINCENT.

The PRESIDENT announced that the next bill on the Calendar was the bill for the relief of Frederick Vincent, administrator of James Le Gaze, surviving partner of Le Caze & Mallett.

Mr. WALKER. That is a revolutionary claim which was reported from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims by myself. From information which has reached me since that report was made, I am led to suspect that the claim has been paid by the State of Virginia. Nothing appeared here to indicate that fact; but there is a clue to it in some Virginia documents which have come to my knowledge. I may be in error about its having been paid. I do not say it has been paid, but I am led to suspect that it has been; and therefore I ask that it be laid over, in order that I may have an opportunity of examining it further.

The PRESIDENT. It will be laid over.

ADVANCES FOR PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of the Orange and Alexandria Railroad Company. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the Orange and Alexandria Railroad Company, assignee of the Commonwealth of Virginia, $120,000, in full for money advanced by said Commonwealth to the use of the United States in erecting public buildings in the District of Columbia, in pursuance of an act of the General Assembly of said Commonwealth, approved December 27, 1790.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Mr. President, I made a report upon this subject from the Committee on Claims, and I now beg leave to offer, as an amendment, the following two additional sections:

Sec. 2. And he it further enacted, That the said Secretary be further directed to pay to the State of Maryland, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $72,000, in full for money advanced by said State to the United States for the same purpose mentioned in the foregoing section, in pursuance of an act of said State entitled "An act concerning the District of Columbia and the city of Washington," approved December 19, 1791, and of the resolutions of their Assembly of the previous session.

Sec. 3. And he it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to pay, out of any money not otherwise appropriated, to the use of said Commonwealth, the sum of $100,000, in full compensation for fitting up, and for the use and occupation by Congress and the public officers of the United States, of the public buildings in the city of Philadelphia, then belonging to the said Commonwealth, from the 6th of December, 1790, until the removal of the Government to the city of Washington, in the year 1800; and that the said Secretary of the Treasury be also directed to pay to the city of New York the sum of $20,000, in full compensation for fitting up, and for the use and occupation by Congress and the public officers, of the public buildings belonging to said city prior to the removal of the seat of Government to the city of Philadelphia.

Mr. HALE. Would it be in order to move an amendment to the amendment?

The PRESIDENT. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I move, then, that the Secretary of the Treasury be also directed to pay to the State of New Hampshire the sum of $200,000, which she would have paid, if the Government had thought fit to erect public buildings there. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT. The Senator's amendment will not be entertained, unless it is put in writing.

Mr. DAWSON. I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will withdraw his amendment, and bring it up as a separate bill. Let us act upon this bill while we are upon it, and not encumber it with other propositions.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I made a report upon the subject at this session, and the Committee on Claims are unanimously of the opinion that if the State of Virginia is paid $120,000, advanced by her for the purpose of erecting the public buildings at this particular place, then Maryland ought also to be paid the $72,000 advanced by her at the same time for the same purpose; and that if the States of Maryland and Virginia are paid, then the State of Pennsylvania ought also to be paid for the use and occupation of her public buildings for ten years, and that the city of New York should also be paid for the use of her public buildings by the United States. The amendment can be adopted, and then the bill can lie over.

The PRESIDENT. If debate arises, the bill must be laid over.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I do not object. Let the amendment be adopted, and then it can be laid over.

Mr. HUNTER. I ask that the bill may be laid over. The amendment requires to be debated.

The PRESIDENT. The bill will be laid over.

ANN ROBINSON.

The bill for the relief of Ann Robinson was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of State to pay to Ann Robinson, of Virginia, the sum of $380, it being the assessed value of a slave named "Hampton," the right to whom was in the said Ann Robinson, who was carried off from Virginia by the British forces in June, 1813, during the war declared by the United States against Great Britain, if there be so much remaining of the fund of $1,204,960 provided by the first article of the treaty of Ghent, and paid by Great Britain, and accepted by the United States in full satisfaction for slaves and other property carried off as afore-said.

Mr. MANGUM. I suppose there will be no objection to this bill. The proof is complete that this negro was carried off by the British. Such claims are provided for by the treaty of Ghent. I find that there is a balance of $2,000 remaining in the Treasury of money paid by Great Britain under that treaty for property of this description. These slaves are valued according to the valuation originally established by the commission which was had upon that subject. I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. HALE. I hope not, sir. I want time to look into it.

The PRESIDENT. Does the Senator wish to discuss the bill?

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT. It will be passed over.

On motion, the Senate adjourned until Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 21, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER stated, as the first business in order, the unfinished business of the day before yesterday, being the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the construction of roads in the Territory of Oregon.

Mr. SIBLEY. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the special order.

The SPEAKER. There is a bill from the Senate in relation to collection districts in Oregon, which the Chair suggests it would be well to take up, and have referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SIBLEY. I withdraw my motion for that purpose.

The following bill from the Senate was then taken up from the Speaker's table, viz:

An act to authorize the President of the United States to designate the places for ports of entry and delivery for the collection districts of Puget's Sound and Umpqua, in the Territory of Oregon, and for other purposes.

The bill, having been read a first and second time by its title, was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FAULKNER. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of James L. Collins, a citizen of the Territory of New Mexico, asking relief. I am further instructed to ask that the papers in the case may be withdrawn from the files of the House, in order that the petitioner may make his application to the War Department.

It was so ordered.

Mr. SIBLEY. I now renew the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the gentleman from Minnesota to withdraw that motion for a moment, to allow me to present a petition. I have no remarks to make on it.

Mr. SIBLEY. I should be happy to extend that courtesy to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but I have refused similar requests from gentlemen on this side of the House, and I must therefore decline to withdraw the motion.

The question was then taken on Mr. SIBLEY's motion, and it was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee, in the Chair.)

The CHAIRMAN stated as the business before the committee, Senate bill No. 175, being an act relating to the salaries of officers of the Territories of the United States, and to repeal the proviso in the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1852, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1851.

Mr. SIBLEY. I move to pass by that bill, in order that we may proceed with the other business on the Calendar, which can be speedily disposed of.

Mr. FOWLER. What is the object of that motion? Why cannot we go on and perfect this bill, and lay it aside to be reported to the House, without further delay?

Mr. SIBLEY. I will state to the gentleman that the bill now under discussion is of far less importance than a good deal of the territorial business on the Calendar, which could be disposed of in a very short time. We could then return to the discussion of this bill. But if we continue the discussion now, many bills will probably be neglected, which are of great importance to the Territories.

The question was then taken on Mr. SIBLEY's motion, and it was not agreed to.

So the committee refused to lay the bill aside.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now before the committee is on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] to strike out the first section of the original bill.

Mr. STUART. I hope the opposition to the postponement of this bill will be withdrawn. I move that the bill be laid aside, and on that motion I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. FOWLER and SIBLEY were appointed.

The question was then put, and it was decided in the negative; ayes 48, noes not counted.

So the committee refused to lay the bill aside.

The question recurred on Mr. STEVENS's amendment.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. It is, perhaps, better that we should vote upon the other amendments first, and we can accomplish my purpose by voting against the first section of the bill. If there be no objection, I will withdraw my amendment.

There being no objection, the amendment was withdrawn.

The question recurred on the amendment proposed by Mr. STUART to the substitute, to strike out the word "leave" and insert in lieu thereof "cause."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, moved to amend the substitute by adding thereto as an additional section, the following:

"And he it further enacted, That nothing in said proviso or in this act, shall be so construed as to prevent the payment of the salaries of the chief justice, the associate justices, and the Secretary of State of the Territory of Utah, who have withdrawn from said Territory for the reasons set forth in their report to the President of the United States."

Mr. J. said: Mr. Chairman, I offer that amendment upon the grounds which I will state. I know, and I presume the whole House knows, that these gentlemen, under their appointment, made a trip to the Utah Territory, and that, after they arrived there, the country was distracted into three districts—although the House might have been left under a different impression yesterday by the remarks of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. STUART.] The supreme court of that Territory actually did sit, and they actually transacted business of the most serious character, in their official capacity, and that was to save the funds of the Government during the time they were there, from the unauthorized and illegal action of the Legislature and Executive of the Mormons, in attempting to seize on the funds of the Government, and to expend them, in violation of law.

Now, sir, they discharged their duties while they were there, and as far as they were able, until they were compelled to leave on account of danger, of which I presume no one can doubt. Some blame has been cast upon these judges, perhaps, but most certainly we have not investigated the matter at all, to see if they are censurable. They are entitled to pay; yet you condemn without hearing. The proviso, as it stands, in the original bill, I suppose will prevent these judges from receiving their pay for the time they were there. Now, when this proviso was affixed to that appropriation bill, I do not suppose the gentleman who offered it, or the House, contemplated, for one moment, its application to a class of cases such as would embrace this now under consideration. They could never, for a moment, have contemplated that such a case, would ever arise. This case will stand, it is to be hoped, forever upon the record as an anomaly. Then, sir, these gentlemen did discharge their duty faithfully, until they felt compelled to leave the Territory; and having thus left the Territory and having secured and brought away the funds of the Government to a considerable amount, which must have otherwise been lost, it would seem a hard judgment that they should be placed under a proviso to an appropriation bill never contemplating such a case, which would prevent them from receiving their salary. Why, sir, this proviso never contemplated the existence, or the possible future existence, of such a case as this. I believe the counsel, advice, and wishes of the Delegates from the Territories ought to be regarded in our enactments relative to those Territories. It is the wish of the Delegates from the Territories that the officers appointed for those Territories shall be forced to reside there; and it is my opinion that legislation to that effect is just and proper. But I do not believe that a case like this, which has never occurred before, and which will probably never occur again, ought to come under a law which was never intended to embrace such a case. No one will pretend that a case of this nature could possibly have been contemplated when the law was enacted, and it does not seem right that these men should be subjected to it. On the contrary, having incurred the dangers and expense of traveling there, and having passed through the hardships incident to the performance of their duties for the time they were there, and the labor, danger, and hardships of return, I cannot possibly believe this House of Representatives will decide that these gentlemen shall be punished, by being excluded from the reception of their just salaries.

The condition of the matter is this: These officers are not in office now. They have been removed, and other officers have been appointed in their places; and the question is not what provision we shall make for them in future, but simply whether we shall pay them for services they have actually rendered, and rendered ably and in good faith, taking upon themselves the responsibility to act for the best interests of the Government in bringing away its funds. It has been a habit of great men and small, to take responsibility for the good of their country in all cases, and a habit to take that responsibility in a thousand of extraordinary instances which their official position as judges or otherwise compelled them to assume; and it has been the habit to reward and applaud such actions. That is the case in regard to their action. They are now out of office; they have been superseded by others, and it seems to me that it is right to authorize the payment of their just salaries, and not to make them an exception to this natural rule of action. If not, while you are striking a blow at these gentlemen, you will relieve the judges in the Territories of all responsibility in the performance of their duty, and leave them to the indulgence of their own pleasure, and the pursuit of their own interests. I repeat, that this is not one of the class of cases designed to be embraced under the existing law. I offer, therefore, this amendment, which merely provides for making these men an exception to the law you propose, and for allowing the House to do justice to these officers now no longer officers. They have unquestionably, as every one will acknowledge, discharged their duties in going there, in encountering the dangers incident to their going to, and returning from that country, and in living amongst a hostile people; and it seems to me they do not merit this penalty. It is a penalty, and without trial, without hearing, it is adjudged and inflicted under mistaken notions.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STUART. Mr. Chairman, I cannot conceive, as far as I am concerned, any advantage in the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. JOHNSON.] In the first place, the amendment offered by the Committee on the Territories as a substitute for the Senate bill, authorizes the President, if sufficient cause exists for the absence of these officers, to certify that fact to the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, and thereupon they are to be paid. Now, I consider the provision or amendment offered by the Committee on the Territories, as preferable, vastly preferable, to a declaration by Congress, that these gentlemen shall be paid, without any inquiry into the justice of their claim at all. If good and sufficient cause exists for the absence of these gentlemen, they will be paid; if it does not exist, they ought not to be paid. Now, who is better competent to inquire into the sufficiency of the reasons for their absence than the President of the United States?

Again: I deny, so far as I am concerned individually—and it is only for myself, individually, that I speak—that there was any such good and sufficient reason for these gentlemen to leave that Territory. And I ask the members of this House if they are prepared to sanction the doctrine, that when an officer is called upon to execute the laws of the United States in the Territories, and when he finds there is difficulty in executing those laws, he shall abandon his place? A gentleman remarked here yesterday, that it was not the Jackson mode of doing business. I should like to see a judge or any other officer of a Territory abandon his duty because there was difficulty in executing it, and be retained in office for one instant, if General Jackson were President.

Now, sir, these gentlemen have set forth no such difficulties as might not have been overcome if they had remained in the Territory. If such facts existed as are whispered about, they could have furnished the President of the United States or Congress evidence of it, without leaving us to guess at the truth; and we should not be here to-day with anonymous communications in the public papers, published for the purpose of awing Congress into legislation of some sort, and legislation specially for individuals, without furnishing any information upon which to ground such legislation. Now, sir, there is not a Government officer there, except one of the judges, to furnish any information in relation to this matter, except these judges themselves.

But what has the President done in the case? After these gentlemen have staid here during the whole session, and belabored all the committees of the House to do something for their special benefit; the President has notified them that they must either return to their duties or resign; and they did resign.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I desire to ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. STUART] one question; for I am sure he would not willingly do injustice to these gentlemen. I desire to inquire if there was any source from which this information could have been officially obtained, except from Brigham Young and from these officers who have made the report which is before the committee?

Mr. STUART. That is the very thing I am complaining of. I say if these officers had remained there, they could have furnished us reports of the facts as they occur; but they have abandoned their posts, and left no one there.

Mr. JOHNSON. But will you not take their information as sufficient?

Mr. STUART. I say they have left nobody there, and they have shown no sufficient reason for supposing that their lives were in danger. What was the difficulty? It was, that interference was made in executing the laws. Now, it was their business, if they intended to execute the laws, to have remained there, and endeavored to overcome the difficulty.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JOHNSON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Michigan if there is not sufficient information in the possession of the House to act upon?

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. No further debate is in order.

Mr. CLEVELAND. Will it be in order to move to strike out the first section?

The CHAIRMAN. That motion has already been made.

Mr. CLEVELAND. Will it not be in order to move to strike out the first section of the original bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the original bill may be amended in that form.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I wish to say that I disapprove as much as any member of this committee can of the conduct of these judges. But, with the knowledge we have of the reasons which induced them to leave their positions, permit me to say, that I think the ground taken by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. JOHNSON] is the true one for this House. They have come back here because they said they could not discharge their duties where they were stationed. Now, when they come here and make a report to the Government of the United States, of which this House is a part, we institute no investigation in relation to the matter—we make not the least inquiry as to the justice or injustice of their complaints, but proceed forthwith to punish them, for that is the course which we propose to take. We propose to punish these judges by refusing to pay them the salaries to which they are entitled. We ourselves go home, as occasion may require, and take our pay, and gentlemen in other kinds of business do the same. But, when these officers say they could not discharge the duties required of them by the Government, and had to leave the Territory where they were stationed; when they resign because of the improper conduct of Governor Young, I can readily believe there was some ground for their abandonment of the Territory.

Mr. STUART. The gentleman is mistaken if he supposes that we propose any such thing as he speaks of.

Mr. CLEVELAND. It virtually proposes precisely that thing. That is the practical effect of it.

Mr. STUART. The gentleman will permit me to say that the proviso in the existing law was in full force at the time they were appointed to their offices.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I am now endeavoring to convince the House of the propriety and justice of voting for the amendment upon which we are now to vote, and not with reference to the original bill. The gentleman from Michigan will therefore understand that my remarks are not only in order, but pertinent to the amendment under consideration.

Mr. STUART. I did not pretend the gentleman was not in order; I only mentioned a fact.

Mr. CLEVELAND. My remarks were not only in order, but pertinent. I desire to show the House that they cannot, in justice, refuse to give these judges their salaries, unless they institute an investigation into the facts connected with the case—unless they ascertain, by evidence, that they left their posts improperly, or without good and sufficient reason. It would seem to me that it is—and every member of this body cannot fail to see the manifest injustice we do these men in saying they shall not have their salaries, although we have no evidence that they do not deserve them, for that is the effect of voting against this amendment. We know not but they have done just as we would have done under the same circumstances. We must recollect who were the men opposed to them. Governor Young, the head of the Mormon church. And with the feelings I have towards that church, I am not prepared to say I would punish those judges. The President of the United States has placed that Territory in the hands of a man who holds the power of the Mormon church, and he cannot now, with propriety, remove him; for the removal of Brigham Young, and the appointment of another man in his place, could not be effected without bloodshed. Being placed in this peculiar position, he says to these gentlemen, "You must either go back there or resign." They did resign. He appoints two Mormons in their places. Such is the position of the case, and we refuse to give these men, who refused to become Mormons, their salaries, for that is really the effect of rejecting this amendment. I hope, for one, that the House will adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. JOHNSON,] for it is eminently just and proper, and it is the only proper course the House can take if they refuse to investigate the matter.

Mr. SIBLEY. I am opposed to the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. CLEVELAND,] not that I have anything to say in reference to the payment or non-payment of the salaries of these Utah officers. That is a matter entirely foreign to the object which I have in view. But I am opposed to making any proviso which will annul the law as it now stands. If there is any exception to be made, I hope it will be made in the form in which the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. JOHNSON] has presented it. That proposition brings up the question of the payment of the Utah officers in a tangible shape before the House. But I must contend that it is incumbent upon Congress to provide that the people of the Territories shall be guaranteed against the evils which must necessarily follow the continued absence of their officers. I care not in what shape it is placed, or what peculiar phraseology may be used, I only wish one object secured—the devotion of the territorial officers to their duties.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, (interrupting.) I hope the gentleman will allow me to make one statement. It is merely to say to the House again upon this matter, that if these officers shall be excluded from their pay under this law, it is wrong. The operation of the exception for the officers of Utah, is well guarded and limited, because they are out of office now, whilst we cannot well expect that they will be paid by the order of the President, when it is a fact that he has removed them; and to say further that we have no right to conclude that he has condemned them; because it is a fact we know, that he has offered office to two of them unsolicited, and none of them have asked any continuance in office, or will accept it under their anomalous condition.

Mr. SIBLEY. I repeat that I obtained the floor more particularly to enter my protest against the adoption of any general, sweeping clause for the annulment of the previous action of Congress as it now appears upon the statute book; and I trust that this House will not, under any circumstances, consent, either expressly or by implication, that the officers of the Territories shall be allowed to absent themselves from their posts without good and sufficient cause. In conclusion, I wish to state to the committee, that this matter which is now before them is of less consequence than other business yet to be transacted in relation to the Territories, and that as soon as I can get the floor to make the motion in order, I will move that this business be passed by informally, to enable us to take up bills of more importance. The debate upon this question is consuming too much of the limited time yet remaining for the perfection of all the territorial business, and should be arrested.

Mr. MEACHAM. I wish to make one correction in regard to a statement which has been made here.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must inform the gentleman that remarks are not in order.

Mr. SIBLEY. My time is not out. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MEACHAM. I wish to occupy but a moment. It has been stated by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. STUART], that these judges and secretary were in no personal danger. If you will read the record they made, you will find it stated, and, as yet, uncontradicted, that a member of the Legislature of Utah threatened the secretary that if he did not give up that money he would have his head taken from his body, and have it tossed into the public street; and he threatened that his heart's blood would be taken if he attempted to go out of that Territory with the money. In the face of that threat, the secretary did come out of that Territory with twenty-four thousand dollars, and deposited it in the bank of St. Louis.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I withdraw my amendment if there be no objection.

No objection was made, and the amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. HOUSTON. I propose to offer an amendment to the amendment, by adding to it—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must inform the gentleman that that would be an amendment in the third degree, and is not in order. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. JOHNSON] is an amendment to the substitute—which is itself an amendment—and no other amendment is, therefore, in order at this time. The question is now upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. JOHNSON].

The question was then put upon the amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to strike out all of the proposed substitute, and to insert in its place the following:

"That nothing in the proviso contained in the act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1852,' approved March 3, 1851, relating to the payment of the salaries of the officers of the Territories of the United States, shall be so construed as to prevent the payment to the two judges, and the secretary of Utah, and the judge of New Mexico, who have returned home, the amount of salary which shall be ascertained to be due them from the time they left home until they returned."

I propose to adopt this in lieu of the proposed substitute, and then to adopt that in lieu of the whole bill of the Senate. This, then, will authorize, if it should be passed in this form, the payment to the secretary and those officers their salaries from the time they left home until the time of their return. It will leave upon the statute-book the proviso under which they are now prevented from having their accounts audited and their salaries paid. It seems to be the wish and desire of every Delegate from the Territories that the original provision of law shall remain unaltered upon the statute-books of the country. This substitute provides for paying them for the time they were actually going to and returning from the scene of their duty; and whatever may be the cause of their return, those causes were good and sufficient to themselves. For the time they were actually absent from their residence in the States, I am willing to pay them; but whatever may be the causes of their return, they certainly are not entitled to any pay from the time they reached home up to this time. If they left Utah under circumstances which justify their conduct, they certainly should, in my opinion, have resigned their office as soon as they reached home. All I wish to do, is to pay them for the time they were absent, and to leave the proviso of law as it is.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES.] If I can get his attention for a moment, I think I can satisfy him that it is not a proper amendment. The object of the proviso originally, in the civil and diplomatic bill of the last Congress, was to keep the territorial officers at their posts, for the discharge of their appropriate duties; and the law, in its terms, requiring that they shall forfeit a portion of their salaries, if absent from their posts, is a penalty upon them for leaving the Territories. Now, if that is true—and I think it is a position which no one can deny—that it is a penalty intended to be brought to bear upon them for leaving their posts, then is it proper that we should bring that penalty to bear upon them when we have the evidence before us, that they could not remain there and discharge their duty? Is it proper, is it a fair construction of the law to say, that, if a man is driven from his post, or is expelled by a strong arm, from the discharge of his duties, when he has no means in his power to prevent it, that he shall forfeit his compensation?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him where is the evidence of that fact?

Mr. HOUSTON. It is to be found in the report of the gentlemen themselves, and in fact, in the statement of the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. JOHNSON], made a few minutes since, that these men, or some of them, had been offered a reappointment by the President.

Mr. STEPHENS. I wish the gentleman to state the evidence. I have seen no evidence, except the statement of the officers who ran away.

Mr. HOUSTON. I cannot give up my time to the gentleman from Georgia. If he will read the document, he will find the testimony. He cannot expect me, in a five minutes' speech, to state it. If he has not seen the evidence, it is not my fault.

Mr. STEPHENS. Where is the evidence? I have seen no evidence, nor has the House, except the statement of the gentlemen themselves.

Mr. HOUSTON. I pretend to say that a large number of the members of this House have seen and read the evidence in the report of these officers to the President of the United States. If I do not misunderstand the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. JOHNSON], he seems to think their cause of withdrawal good; for if he did not so deem it, it was not proper in the President to offer to reappoint any one of them. If they had abandoned their posts without good cause, the President of the United States should not have offered to give them any other appointment or responsible position. But I take it for granted that there can be no dispute about the fact, so far as we have any evidence before us—and we have it abundantly—that they left for good cause; and having left for good cause, I say that the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] is wrong, for it proposes to pay them up to the time only when they reached the States. But if there is any law—if there is any reason or justice for paying them from the time they left Utah up to the time when they arrived in this city, there is the same reason and justice in paying them from that time to this.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, (interrupting.) I ask what in the name of common sense is the use of territorial officers in this city?

Mr. HOUSTON. It is true we have no use for them here; but if they had cause for withdrawing from that Territory, why did not the President of the United States remove that cause, and let them go back to their duty? And, if they were derelict in the discharge of their duty, why did he not remove the officers themselves, and send others there? Now, the gentleman's position cannot be sustained upon any ground at all; for either the judges themselves ought to have been removed, or the cause of the obstruction to the discharge of their duties in the Territory should have been removed.

Mr. JONES, (interrupting.) I wish to ask the gentleman if he thinks that the President should have sent a military escort, a body-guard, for those men, to that Territory?

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not pretend to answer for the President of the United States. He is the Executive of the United States, and it is his duty to execute the laws of the land, and he should have taken such a course as was necessary and proper to remove the obstructions to the exercise of their duties.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Will it be in order to strike out the last words of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee?

The CHAIRMAN. No further amendment is now in order.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to change my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee can modify his amendment.

Mr. JONES. Instead of offering it as a substitute for the whole bill, I propose it as a substitute to the second section of the substitute offered by the Committee on Territories. The original proviso in the civil and diplomatic bill will expire with the present fiscal year, and will leave no restriction upon the territorial officers, unless the first section of the bill is adopted. My object is to preserve the first section, and to have the amendment I proposed adopted as a substitute for the second section.

The CHAIRMAN. The question will be upon the adoption of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee, as a substitute for the second section of the substitute.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I rise to a point of order, which I will state. I may, or may not, be right, but the Chair will decide. This amendment is now offered, not, I believe, in lieu of the whole substitute, but in lieu of the second section. The committee have already adopted, as an amendment to the section of that substitute, the amendment that I offered; and the amendment that the gentleman from Tennessee has offered conflicts directly with it, by striking it all out—thus making the whole action of the House insensible.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is obliged to overrule the point of order made by the gentleman from Arkansas. It is true, that the amendment has been adopted to the second section; but it does not prevent an additional amendment, in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. JOHNSON. Was a vote taken upon my amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, a vote was taken, and the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas was adopted. The Chair decides that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee is in order. Does the gentleman from Arkansas appeal?

Mr. JOHNSON. I will ask, then, if the effect of that is not to strike out, at once, the amendment which I offered, and which was adopted by the House?

The CHAIRMAN. That will be the effect of it.

Mr. CARTTER. Is it in order to move an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee? [Mr. JONES.]

The CHAIRMAN. That is an amendment to an amendment, and no further amendment is now in order.

Mr. CARTTER. I understand it to be an amendment to the second section of the original bill; or is it an amendment to the second section of the substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. It is an amendment to the substitute.

Mr. CARTTER. I wish to ask a question, with the consent of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. It can be done only by the unanimous consent of the House. Does the gentleman from Arkansas appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not.

Mr. JONES. I ask for the reading of the substitute as it will be, if my amendment is adopted.

The proposition, comprehending the first section of the substitute of Mr. JONES for the second section thereof, was read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. CHASTAIN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. CHASTAIN. I do not propose to debate the question. All I wish to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] is, to modify his amendment so as to make it read that nothing in that act contained shall be so construed as to prevent the payment of these officers up to the time of their resignation.

Mr. JONES. I cannot do so, and would not vote for any bill containing such a proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The question must be taken upon the amendment, and no debate is in order.

Mr. BEALE. May I ask a question?

Mr. PIELPS. I propose to strike so much—

The CHAIRMAN. No amendment is in order at this time.

Mr. BEALE. Is it in order to ask that the reasons assigned by the officers for leaving the Territory may be read?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order, because it would be in the nature of debate.

The question is upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] to strike out all after the first section of the substitute, and insert what has been read.

Mr. MEACHAM. I wish to make this inquiry, in regard to the effect of this vote: if we vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, will it carry with it the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the amendment, if adopted, will strike out the whole of the second section as it has been amended, and substitute the proposition offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES.]

Mr. JONES demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, and Mr. FREEMAN were appointed.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 30, noes 94.

So the amendment of Mr. JONES to the substitute was rejected.

Mr. POLK. I understand that the question before the committee is—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair informs the gentleman from Tennessee, that no debate is in order, unless he has an amendment to offer.

Mr. POLK. I move the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. JOHNSON,] as a substitute for the original bill.

The CHAIRMAN. That proposition is not in order.

Mr. POLK. I move to strike out the word "officers," in the first section of the bill. The Territory of Utah was established under the act of 1851, and the present President of the United States appointed the Governor of that Territory. Who did he appoint? Was he a man who would recommend himself to the moral community, North or South? Was he a man who any member of this House would be willing to recognize in the social circles of his own community? or, was he appointed by the indorsement of the President, and recommended by him to the country, notwithstanding all his sins, and all the outrages which he had committed, and is still committing, or not? I say, Mr. Chairman, that the President of the United States committed the initiative wrong by appointing Brigham Young, the Mormon, to rule over that Territory. I say, that he committed, by his appointment, a wrong against morals, against pure religion, and against the laws under which we live; and if any difficulty has grown out of it there, you must trace it to that source. The President sends out his judges—he has and exercised the power of appointing them also—they arrive there, and are unable to perform their duties. They return to the United States. Why? Because they are honorable and high-toned men, and were not permitted to perform the duties which the Government required of them. What, then, is the action of the President? They return, and make a report of the immorality of the people there, and of the resistance to the Federal laws by Governor Young, whom the President appointed, and his associates. If they were worthy of appointment; if they were worthy of the position, and came sufficiently and properly recommended by the President, surely they are worthy of credence. Surely their report is worthy of belief. And how does our amiable President act upon this report of the facts, as stated by the honorable men who assumed authority and power by his authority? Does he remove Brigham Young, who had obstructed the execution of the Federal laws? No. How does he act in the premises? Why he removes those gentlemen who made a statement of the facts to him, and retains the creature who is defiling the country which he inhabits and controls, and who sets at defiance the power of this Republic. Now, if President Fillmore thought these men, whom he appointed judges, were worthy men, of unimpeachable character, and entitled to credence in stating the facts, why should he have removed them and retained Brigham Young? A proper regard for the dignity of our Government, for the just and faithful administration of its laws, and for the purity of morals, imperiously demanded the removal of Brigham Young from the gubernatorial chair, and the retention of those judges in their offices, backed by the power of the Government to sustain them.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BISSELL. Mr. Chairman, I am unwilling that we, by any action here, should indorse, in any degree, the doings of the local authorities of Utah; on the contrary, I deem it important that Congress, in every proper way, should manifest its disapprobation of those doings. But, independent of any considerations of that kind, I am in favor of paying these officers—paying them up to the period of their resignation. In my judgment, they have done their duty, and nothing else. They have done no more nor less than what the interest and credit of the Government required. It has been said, by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. STUART,] that even after they had found it impossible to discharge their duties in Utah, they should still have remained there. For what?

Mr. STUART. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman, but I cannot consent to be misinterpreted. I said I had seen no sufficient evidence that they could not discharge the duties of their office. If there were difficulties in the way of discharging them, there was greater reason for them to have remained and reported what those difficulties were.

Mr. BISSELL. That is as I understood the gentleman before. Whatever the extent of the difficulties thrown in their way by the local authority of Utah may have been—whether to the extent of preventing them wholly from the discharge of their duties, or not, they, in the opinion of the gentleman from Michigan, should have still remained there for the purpose of becoming reporters of the doings of Mormonism! They should have quietly submitted to have their judicial robes torn from them, and been content to become resident reporters at Salt Lake City. Was that the business on which we sent them? Was that the purpose for which this Government invested these, its agents, with judicial powers? No, sir; they were sent to Utah to administer the laws; to perform the high duties of judges of the United States. Had they been sent there as reporters of the proceedings of Brigham Young's government, then, unquestionably, they should have remained there, and reported, under all circumstances. But theirs were very different duties; and when there were difficulties, insurmountable, thrown in the way of their discharge of the legitimate and sole duties pertaining to their office, by the local authorities there, it was their duty to return, especially under the peculiar circumstances in which they were placed. They did so, and they did right; and I will not consent to punish them for it. I feel as little disposed to punish them, as I do to encourage, thereby, the authorities of that Territory in their treasonable course. It has been insisted that these officers should be paid only up to the time they reached Washington on their return. I think that such a view of the case is altogether wrong. On arriving here, they very properly reported to the Executive the causes which rendered it impossible to perform their duties. That was right. They did not resign then; and for a very obvious and sufficient reason. They waited the pleasure and the action of the Executive, supposing, with good reason, that he whose duty it is to see that the laws are faithfully executed, would take measures to remove the obstacles in the way of their official action; to clear away the obstructions to the laws, and enable them to return to Utah under circumstances that would enable them to enter upon and discharge their duties. This, I repeat, was a reasonable expectation on their part. And, not till they were disappointed in that expectation, were they justified in resigning their commissions. They ought not to have resigned till they had learned the President's purpose in regard to the course he should pursue in reference to the troubles and troublemakers at Utah. Now, I cannot understand why it is that they are not entitled their pay up to the time of their resignation. I should like to know what there is in all their conduct which should subject them to penalty, reproach, or censure in Congress, or anywhere else.

Judges have been necessary all along, in Utah, as elsewhere; and the fact that these officers held themselves in readiness up to a recent period to discharge their duties, the means to enable them being provided, furnishes no just grounds of complaint against them as loyal and faithful officers of this, the Government of the United States. I think their conduct is deserving of far higher commendation than if they had made a burnt offering of their commissions to the Prophet-Governor of Utah, or thrown them up here before being apprised of the views of the Executive. At all events, I consider them fairly entitled to the compensation which the law provides for that class of officers.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to move an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. There is already pending an amendment to an amendment, and no other one can be received. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, to strike out the word "officer."

The question was put, and the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move pro forma to strike out the word "and." In this debate is brought up the question of the propriety of paying the Utah judges, and I desire to submit a remark or two upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must say, in reference to this motion, that it is altogether too trivial to be regarded as an amendment which can be debated.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Let, then, four or five other words be connected with it.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman specify his amendment?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will not detain the committee by further continuing the discussion.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to strike out the whole of the substitute, as it has been amended, except the first section, and to insert what the Clerk will read.

The Clerk then read, as follows:

That nothing in the proviso contained in an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the payment of the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and fifty-two," approved March third, eighteen hundred and fifty-one, relating to the payment of the salaries of the officers of the Territories of the United States shall be so construed as to prevent the payment to the two judges and the secretary of Utah, who have returned home, the amount of salary which shall be ascertained to be due them, from the time they left home until their return.

Mr. JONES. This is the same amendment which I offered before, except that when first submitted it included the judge who returned to New Mexico, whereas the present amendment does not. It only provides for the payment of salaries which shall be found due to the two judges and secretary of Utah from the period they left home until the time they returned. That is all I can consent to pay those officers, whatever may have been their reasons for returning. They may be satisfactory to themselves, but into the investigation of those reasons I am not disposed to go. I do think, at least, when they left there under the circumstances which they did, on returning to their homes, or to this city, they should have tendered their resignations, and afforded the President of the United States opportunity to appoint those who would have proceeded there to fulfill the duties of their office. I can see no possible reason why we should pay them salary for the time they have been in this city, or other parts of the States, since their return from the Territory of Utah. The bill if adopted as I propose to amend it, will retain on the statute-book the provision precluding the payment of territorial officers in future who shall absent themselves for more than sixty days at a time. And this section will also, if adopted, pay these officers who have returned for the time they were absent, and nothing more.

Mr. GIDDINGS obtained the floor.

Mr. SIBLEY. Will the gentleman yield me the floor for a moment?

Mr. GIDDINGS. I cannot yield it to any gentleman. I do not intend to occupy it long myself; but in behalf of the Territories and their business, I desire to make an appeal to gentlemen upon this floor to proceed to vote upon these questions, that we are here discussing.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is entitled only to speak in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I am opposing the amendment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. With the gentleman's permission, I will occupy the floor a moment for explanation. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] desires to know why these judges did not return to the Territory. I will state to the gentleman and the committee the reasons on account of which they did not return—expressed repeatedly, I believe, to the President of the United States. So I have understood. Unless Congress did do something by which the laws could be executed in the Territories, they did not desire to go back to Utah. When there, they could not execute the laws. To remain, would only have been to subject themselves to abuse and to hear their Government traduced. The discharge of their duties was out of the question. When the matter was settled in the committee—when it was no longer an open question whether Congress should do anything to enable them or any other authority there to execute the laws, they did resign. I think, under all of the circumstances, it would be a very great error for us to refuse to pay them up to the moment they resigned.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I appeal to the members of this committee to vote down the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, and proceed to dispose of this bill. There is important business with respect to these Territories, which is yet behind, and we have only to-day and to-morrow to complete it. I do believe that this subject has been sufficiently argued and illustrated by the arguments of gentlemen here to enable every member to cast his vote understandingly. I therefore refuse to occupy the time of the committee, and invoke of gentlemen action upon the business now before us.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, and no further debate is in order; nor can any further amendments be submitted.

The question was taken upon the substitute of Mr. JONES, and it was disagreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Is it in order to move to lay the bill aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be adopted? If it is, I make that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The question must be first taken on the adoption of the substitute as amended.

Mr. POLK. Is it in order to move an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order. A substitute has been offered for the substitute, and it has been rejected.

Mr. POLK. Can the Chair suggest any mode by which I may be enabled to submit a few remarks?

The CHAIRMAN. No; unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, made some remarks in regard to the right to amend, which were totally inaudible to the Reporter.

The CHAIRMAN. The opinion of the Chair as stated was, that after having passed through the substitute, and the various amendments offered to it, it was not again in order to recur to and offer amendments to that substitute. That was the opinion of the Chair, but he is not certain that he is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Gentlemen can take an appeal, if they desire to do so. The decision of the Chair must stop this question somewhere.

Mr. SIBLEY. I wish to appeal to the committee—

The CHAIRMAN. No debate is in order.

Mr. SIBLEY. I wish to make a motion by unanimous consent of the committee to lay this bill aside informally.

[Cries of "I object!" "I object!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the substitute for the original bill.

Mr. CLEVELAND. Is this the substitute reported by the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. It is the substitute reported by the committee, as amended on the motion of the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. JOHNSON.]

Mr. CLEVELAND. I made that inquiry, that the House might understand it.

Mr. TUCK. I wish to offer the following amendment:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the salaries of the judges of the United States courts for the Territories of Oregon and New Mexico, be fixed as follows, namely: The chief justice of the said Territories shall each have a salary of $3,500, and the associate justices each a salary of $3,000 per annum.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has decided that no amendment is in order, after the various propositions which have been made.

The question was then taken upon the adoption of the substitute as amended, and it was agreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move to lay the bill aside, to be reported to the House.

Mr. TUCK. I have an amendment to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has decided that no amendment is in order.

Mr. TUCK. Does the Chair decide that no amendment is in order upon the substitute to the original bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The committee have passed through the substitute, have acted upon every portion of that substitute, and have also acted upon a proposition to strike out the whole and insert another. That has been voted down. According to the recollection of the Chair, it has been the uniform practice after such a vote, to rule amendments out of order. The Chair may be mistaken.

Mr. TUCK. I wish to offer this amendment.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask the Clerk to read the latter part of the 53d rule.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Is there any point of order before the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. Tuck] offers an amendment which the Chair thinks out of order.

Mr. JOHNSON. Has any appeal been taken?

The CHAIRMAN. No appeal has been taken.

Mr. JOHNSON. I object to the reading of any rules.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I take an appeal, and I ask the reading of the rule. Let the committee vote down the rule, if they wish.

The 53d rule was then read, as follows:

"Any member may call for the division of a question; which shall be divided if it comprehend propositions in substance so distinct that one being taken away, a substantive proposition shall remain for the decision of the House. A motion to strike out and insert shall be deemed indivisible; but a motion to strike out being lost, shall preclude neither amendment, nor a motion to strike out and insert."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon a motion to amend. After a motion to strike out the whole bill and insert another proposition, the Chair decides that a motion to amend is out of order. From this decision the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] appeals; and the question now is, Shall the decision of the Chair be sustained as the judgment of the committee?

Mr. POLK. Do I understand the Chair as deciding that no additional section is in order to this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has so decided, and an appeal upon that question is now pending.

Mr. TUCK. I wish to ask—

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I object to any debate.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

The question was then taken on the appeal; and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. TUCK. I wish to ask the unanimous consent of the committee to have the amendment read which I propose to offer.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I object. I ask that the question be taken upon the motion I made.

Mr. GORMAN. I propose to add another section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has decided that no amendment is in order, and that decision of the Chair has been sustained by the committee. The Chair must again rule the amendment proposed out of order.

Mr. GORMAN. I make the point, that we can add another section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already decided that it would not be in order, and that decision has been sustained by the committee.

The question was then taken upon Mr. RICHARDSON's motion; and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House.

TEXAS BOUNDARY.

The committee then proceeded to consider House bill No. 254, to run and establish the boundary between the State of Texas and the Territories of the United States.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move to fill the blank with the sum of $25,000. It is my intention, before I take my seat, to move that the committee rise, with a view of terminating debate upon this question.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move that the committee rise, with a view of terminating the debate.

The question was then taken, and it was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman of the committee reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly House bill No. 175, which they have ordered to be reported to the House with an amendment, and also bill No. 254, upon which they have come to no conclusion.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move to terminate debate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on bill No. 254 in five minutes after the committee shall have resumed its consideration. I think this bill can be debated in a very short time. If one gentleman gets the floor, and makes an hour's speech, there ought to be an opportunity to reply. I propose myself that so far as the members of the committee are concerned, they shall be confined to five minutes. I intend to confine myself to that time, and I think we can dispose of the bill upon its merits just as well, and perhaps better, in this time than in these hour speeches.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The question was then taken upon Mr. RICHARDSON's resolution, and it was agreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question was then taken, and it was agreed to.

So the committee then resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. RICHARDSON], to insert in the blank the sum of $25,000.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The amount with which I propose to fill the blank, is estimated by the proper Department as sufficient to cover the preliminary expenses of this survey. I desire to take no gentleman in the House by surprise upon this subject, and will state the utmost that is estimated for fixing this boundary, so that it may be known, is $211,000—$25,000 this year, and the balance at a subsequent period. The extent of boundary to be fixed is something over nine hundred miles. It should be fixed and established in such a manner as can be easily known to persons moving to that country for the purpose of settlement. It is important that this matter should be attended to now. In this question of boundary between the State of Texas and the United States, it becomes important to fix it before the settlements are made. The estimate of the Department is, that $25,000 will be enough for the present. I now send to the desk papers in relation to this bill, and ask that they may be read.

The Clerk then read communications from the War Department, the Department of the Interior, and the General Land Office, accompanied by a profile of the boundary line, and the necessary estimates for the cost.

The question was then put upon Mr. RICHARDSON's amendment, to fill the blank in the bill with the sum of $25,000, and it was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. RICHARDSON, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

ROADS IN MINNESOTA.

The next bill on the Calendar was House bill No. 255, "making further appropriations for the construction of roads in the Territory of Minnesota."

Mr. FAULKNER. There are some amendments which the Committee on Roads and Canals have instructed me to offer to this bill. I move to amend the bill in the tenth line, by adding after the words "Lake Superior" the words "by the most direct and convenient route between those points," so as to make it read "for the construction of a road from Point Douglass, on the Mississippi river, to the falls or rapids of the St. Louis river, of Lake Superior, by the most direct and convenient route between those points, $20,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FAULKNER. I move further to amend the bill by striking out the word "Mississippi," in the nineteenth line, and inserting in lieu thereof "Missouri," so as to make it read "a military road from Mendota to the mouth of Big Sioux river, on the Missouri." I presume it is a typographical error.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FAULKNER. I now move to strike out the words "Governor and Legislative Assembly of said Territory" from the end of the bill, and to insert in lieu thereof "Secretary of War, pursuant to contracts to be made by him," so as to make it read, "the said roads to be constructed under the direction of the Secretary of War, pursuant to contracts to be made by him."

Mr. SIBLEY. I wish to make a brief explanation of this bill. The items embraced in it are in accordance with estimates submitted by the War Department. The only change contemplated has been made by myself. I have taken the responsibility of reducing the amount specified in the estimate more than one half, because I think that is quite as much as we ought to ask from Congress at this session, under existing circumstances. I trust that with this short statement, the committee will consent to lay the bill aside, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. FOWLER. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Minnesota whether any of these routes have been surveyed?

Mr. SIBLEY. They have all been surveyed except the last, and the bill provides for the survey of that.

Mr. FOWLER. Have there been estimates from the Department of the probable expense of executing the work?

Mr. SIBLEY. Estimates have been laid before the Department by the engineer. He has estimated for the construction of what are called good country roads, and he has based his calculations upon those that have been made in Wisconsin, in which there is probably more timbered country than in ours, and consequently the cost of the construction of roads is proportionably greater.

Mr. FOWLER. Are those mere comparative estimates, or are they based upon some other data?

Mr. SIBLEY. They are based upon actual surveys.

Mr. FOWLER. Have we those estimates where we can get at them? Have they been printed?

Mr. FAULKNER. They have.

Mr. SIBLEY. They are regular estimates from the War Department, and are accessible to every member of the House. They are to be found in the document room. I have a copy before me now.

Mr. HOUSTON. I want to ask the gentleman who reported this bill, or the Delegate from Minnesota, if they have any information how much has been appropriated to these roads heretofore?

Mr. SIBLEY. I will state to the gentleman, that $40,000 is the whole amount that has heretofore been appropriated to these roads.

Mr. HOUSTON. I then ask the gentleman how much is the balance that will be required for these roads, according to the estimates? I conceive that it will do no good to reduce the appropriations this year, if we shall have to make another appropriation next year. Let us know the estimate of the entire amount that will be required.

Mr. SIBLEY. In reply to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, I beg leave to state that the reason why I have deemed it expedient to reduce these estimates is, that I do not think the amount originally asked for can be expended beneficially during the current year, for the construction of these roads. I do not pretend to say there will be a sufficiency to complete the roads, but the amount which I have asked for will, in my opinion, and in the opinion of practical men in the Territory, complete the roads so far as to make them passable, at least between the points where they are now most needed. I will state further to the gentleman, that some of these roads lead directly to military posts and to Indian agencies, and that the Government would be saved a great deal of expense in the transportation of supplies, if they were constructed so as to be rendered passable with loaded teams.

Mr. FOWLER. I wish to make a further inquiry of the gentleman. Are these roads designed for general, public use, or are they for military purposes?

Mr. SIBLEY. They are for both.

Mr. FOWLER. If they are exclusively for general use, it is a system of internal improvements. If they are for war purposes, then let us understand that they are for those purposes.

Mr. SIBLEY. I reply that they are for general use and to accommodate the Government, while, incidentally, they will be vastly beneficial, and indeed indispensable, to the people of the Territory.

Mr. FAULKNER. In reply to the interrogatory propounded by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Houston], I will say, that if this had been an original appropriation altogether, I am not aware that I could have sanctioned it, even at the time that I did do so, to the extent that it has gone. But I found that the policy of constructing these four roads had been sanctioned by Congress in 1850. There was an appropriation made at that time of $35,000 for the construction of these four roads, and $5,000 for the survey of a military road from Mendota to the mouth of the Big Sioux river, on the Missouri. I find that of that amount not one dollar has yet been applied towards the construction of any of these roads. There has been expended of that appropriation $12,890 in preliminary surveys, and there remains unexpended of the original appropriation of 1850, $22,110.

Mr. SIBLEY. The gentleman from Virginia will permit me to say, that since that statement was submitted there has been some expenditure in the construction of the roads, and that the balance has been, therefore, much reduced. What is the date of the communication you hold in your hand?

Mr. FAULKNER. The date of this communication, from which I derive the information, is the 23d December, 1851, and it is from the Colonel of the Topographical Engineers. That is the latest information we have upon the subject. I believe I have now answered the question put by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to state that the information furnished by the gentleman is just what I predicted. These roads were commenced, as the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. Sibley] states, without any previous consultation with the Department under whose control they had been placed by law. An appropriation was made by Congress, and that appropriation has, as was stated by the gentleman from Virginia, been in part, absorbed by a preliminary reconnaissance or survey, and as was set forth by the head of the Topographical Bureau, and as the committee will see, fully illustrates and sustains the prediction I endeavored to enforce upon the House a day or two since: that is, when we make an appropriation in advance of a survey, we save nothing by it. The survey has still to be made, and at the same expense. Indeed, in the language of the head of the Topographical Bureau, it is attended with more expense. The gentleman who reported this bill says, that of the $40,000 appropriated for this work, there had been some $12,000 expended up to the date of his communication. Now, it would have been just as easy for my friend from Virginia, [Mr. Faulkner], and it would have been as easy for the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. Sibley], to have gone to the Department and ascertained, so as to be able to inform the committee, the exact amount that still remains in the Treasury, as a balance, or that did remain there, as a balance, on the first day of the present quarter, which was the first day of April.

Mr. SIBLEY. The gentleman is under a misapprehension in relation to the time necessary for communicating with Minnesota; during the winter season we cannot receive a communication from there in less than three or four weeks.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Minnesota does not comprehend the point I make.

Mr. FAULKNER. I believe I have already furnished the gentleman the information he asks for, that there was a balance of $22,500. I have stated what was the balance in the Treasury at the date of this report, and no surveys have been made since the date of that report. I presume that is the balance now unexpended.

Mr. HOUSTON. I suppose the gentleman is correct. I was going to present that view of the case. The gentleman from Minnesota, however, is mistaken in supposing that he could not obtain the information without sending to Minnesota for it. The money is drawn from the Treasury as it is wanted, and charged to that appropriation; and within ten days of the end of every quarter the gentleman can go and get the precise balance which remains to the credit of any particular appropriation in any of the Departments. You can tell precisely what has been expended, and what remains undrawn. But, I take it, there are some $25,000 or $28,000 yet unexpended, and remaining, as a balance in the Treasury, to the credit of this appropriation. The fiscal year now lacks but about a month of being out; and it seems to me that it is premature in this Congress to make an appropriation for this object, admitting that the principle is right, which I do not, by any means. But admitting it to be right, it seems to me not only premature, but unnecessary to make an appropriation now for these roads, when there are some $25,000 or $28,000 in the Treasury liable to be drawn in the next fiscal year.

Mr. SIBLEY. If the gentleman will allow me, here is a copy of a letter from the United States engineer in that Territory, who is charged with the superintendence of these roads. It is dated the 3d day of April last. He makes the inquiry of me, when the bill making appropriations for these roads is likely to become a law. He says it would be a pity if they should be made available too late to be of service this year.

Mr. HOUSTON. That shows that the gentleman who wrote the letter knows nothing about the matter.

Mr. SIBLEY. He is the Government engineer, and well understands his duty.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is very singular that an engineer should write a letter, saying that unless an appropriation be made soon, it would be unavailable for the year. The appropriation proposed is not to be expended this year. If the bill were to pass immediately in the precise phraseology in which it was presented to the committee, not one item could be touched until after the 30th day of next June.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois. He means the next year, when he says "this year."

Mr. HOUSTON. If he means the next year, he is in just as great an error. Whoever heard of an appropriation being passed too late to be made available for the year? Why, the latest we ever sit is the last of September.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It is to be used in the summer. They cannot work in the winter.

Mr. HOUSTON. But the present appropriation, according to the showing of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. FAULKNER,] will carry the work beyond the present summer, and the beginning of the fiscal year. There are, as I said, twenty-odd thousand dollars yet on hand ready to be drawn from the Treasury.

Mr. SIBLEY. I must be allowed to interrupt the gentleman for a moment. I will say that the contracts have been made probably to the amount of the balance of appropriation yet on hand, and the engineer is now only waiting to hear the result of this attempt to procure a further appropriation to continue the contracts on all these roads.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I am willing to take it upon that view of the case. Contracts are made, according to the gentleman's statement, to the amount of the appropriation. They certainly are not made beyond that. But if made within the appropriation, the appropriation still remains unexpended. Now, how can it be that you want an additional appropriation, unless the amount of the appropriation shall be expended before the work of the season is out? If the contract is made, the work will not be done—as I understand the state of the case, the work will not probably be done—before the beginning of the next fiscal year. But if you admit that it be done, they have at least $25,000 or $28,000 to go upon from now until the season when it is said they cannot carry on the work.

But, Mr. Chairman, I have another objection to this system of legislation. I object to it in principle, in the first place. I believe it is internal improvement by the Federal Government, in its most odious form. I believe it brings up that system in all its length, breadth, and bearings, and for that reason I have always opposed these appropriations. But I do not intend to make an argument upon that. Here is the principle: We have appropriated $40,000 already, and now we are asked to make another appropriation for the same work. It will probably require $100,000 to complete it. Now, if that is the fact, you might as well appropriate the whole $100,000 at once. According to the report of the engineers, that amount will be necessary to complete the roads. If, then, we are to embark in this system of internal improvement, let us make the whole appropriation at once, and let the work be carried on under the direction of the Secretary of War. Why should we appropriate $15,000 now to one road, and $10,000 to another, when we have got $25,000 on hand appropriated to these roads already? In the next place, the gentleman says they can work only during the summer months.

Mr. SIBLEY. I beg to interrupt the gentleman once more. I am not a little astonished at the course of argument the gentleman from Alabama has pursued to-day; for he has changed his position entirely from that assumed by him when the Delegate from Oregon, [Mr. LANE,] the other day, asked for an appropriation to construct roads in his Territory.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Minnesota does me injustice. I have not changed my position. In this case the surveys have been made, as the gentleman himself states, and as the report shows; and, of course, my argument in relation to the case of my friend, would not apply to this. I have not changed my ground, however. I do not take back anything I said yesterday. I think what I said then was substantially correct.

Mr. SIBLEY. I had no intention of doing injustice to the gentleman from Alabama; but it does seem to me somewhat strange that he should attack this bill upon the very opposite grounds taken by him in his argument upon the other bill. He assailed the Oregon bill because no previous surveys of the roads had taken place. The bill now before the committee is based upon surveys and estimates actually made. The Department has recommended that the money shall be appropriated. And so far as regards his present position, it does seem to me that the gentleman is a little inconsistent.

Mr. HOUSTON. I want to say to the gentleman from Minnesota that he has entirely misapprehended me. I do not attack this bill because the roads have been surveyed. The fact that they have been is so much to their credit. But the gentleman says, furthermore, that the Department recommends the payment of the money. Now, let me say to the gentleman that the Department merely recommends the payment of the money in case we intend to continue to carry on the work. But he cannot show me where these roads are set down as military roads. As I understand it, they are not estimated for as such in any of the reports made upon them, or in any of the surveys made upon them.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois. Do I understand the gentleman from Alabama to attack this bill upon the ground of the impolicy of the General Government making internal improvements in these Territories?

Mr. HOUSTON. I stated that I was opposed to the system, and should vote against the bill upon that ground, if upon no other. But I expressly stated that I did not intend to make an argument upon that point. There were other objections to the bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Then that is not the ground upon which the gentleman opposes it.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is one ground.

Mr. SIBLEY. I do not desire to consume the time of the committee unnecessarily in this debate; but I must not allow the House to act under a misapprehension of the facts in this case.

Mr. Chairman, under no circumstances would I urge any argument or any claim upon this committee, that was not, in my judgment, in perfect accordance with the facts, as presented by me. I wish the committee to act understandingly with reference to this question. The documents show that the engineer, who has charge of these roads, has indorsed them as being the very roads which it is most important should be now made in that Territory; that they are regarded as such, not only with reference to the public convenience, but to the wants of the Government itself. The gentleman (Lieutenant Simpson, of the topographical corps of engineers) who has been placed in charge of these roads, is eminently qualified, by scientific attainments, practical knowledge, and sound judgment, to discharge his duties properly. His opinions, with regard to this subject of roads, are entitled to great weight. He states, in his report, that it is of the utmost importance that these great thoroughfares should be properly opened as soon as practicable. I know, that when this is done, the Government will be saved a large sum annually in the transportation of supplies to its military posts and Indian agencies. If the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] does not base his argument against this bill on constitutional grounds entirely, I humbly submit that he can urge no other reasonable objection. The Government, being the sole great land proprietor in the Territories, is bound, by every consideration of equity and justice, to make its domain accessible to the settler, by means of roads. To do otherwise, would be to abandon the policy hitherto pursued towards all your Territories. How, sir, can your lands be sold if the immigrant cannot reach them? The gentleman will certainly not take the ground that the people of the Territories shall make their own roads, not only, but those of the Federal Government likewise. The Territories, North and South, have invariably received liberal grants from Congress for such purposes; and, hitherto, no attempt has been made to connect them with any system of internal improvements in the States. The distinction is too broad and too palpable to require anything to be said on the subject. The Democratic party, to which we belong, has never held the doctrine just advanced by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON.] It has always been liberal in grants to the Territories.

I respectfully submit, Mr. Chairman, that, as we make no demands upon you for light-houses and harbor appropriations, we may reasonably expect Congress to be generous with us in regard to the construction of roads and the improvement of our rivers. Minnesota never has, and never will, take undue advantage of your liberality. As an illustration of our modesty in that respect, I can point to the fact I have before adverted to—that this bill provides for only one half of the amount estimated for by the Department; and I will be frank enough to say, that I do not believe we should have received anything if I had pressed for the whole sum mentioned in those estimates. I have learned something, at least, from my experience here during the last Congress, when we lost all the appropriations for our roads because the Department asked for too much.

I conclude by assuring the committee that the money is wanted now, and I am satisfied it will be economically and properly disbursed. The sum remaining unexpended from the original appropriation is very small, and that asked for in this bill can be applied at once, so far as it will go, to the completion of the roads already commenced under authority of law. Notwithstanding the opinion expressed by the honorable chairman of the Ways and Means, I take it for granted, that if the bill now before the committee shall pass both Houses of Congress, the money appropriated can be drawn from the Treasury at any time after the 30th of June next, which will be the close of the fiscal year, and be made immediately available for the purposes for which it was designed.

Mr. BROOKS. I am very reluctant to throw obstacles in the way of this bill. I dislike, even, to seem to be in the way of proper appropriations for the Territories, and I rise, mainly, with a view of calling the attention of the House to what we are voting upon. If there is a majority of the House disposed to go into this sort of appropriations, I will not continue any longer to throw obstructions in their way. The objection which I made to making appropriations for the roads in Oregon, the other day, is certainly obviated in this bill, by the action of the Delegate from Minnesota [Mr. SIBLEY] the last Congress, who withdrew the Minnesota road appropriations from the usual committees having custody of such appropriation bill, and himself introduced them into the House, either upon his own sole responsibility, or through the Committee on Roads and Canals. A survey has been obtained for a part of these roads, by having appropriations made for the roads themselves, just without any survey, and hence the argument which was directed against the gentleman from Oregon, [Mr. LANE,] the other day, cannot now be used in this case. A survey has been made, out of appropriations to make roads; and the Topographical Bureau can now guess, therefore, what the gentleman from Minnesota is about, and Congress can have some idea—though a very faint one—what it is going to do, when it votes the $45,000 asked for here. Before I go further, I wish to repeat a remark I made the other day on the Oregon roads—that if these roads are not for military purposes, it is not in my power to perceive the difference in making four or five roads in Minnesota, reported on the authority of the Committee on Roads and Canals, or four or five roads in Kentucky, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Louisiana, or in any other part of this Union.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois. Does the gentleman draw any distinction between making a road in the Territories, or one of the States, and the making a road in the District of Columbia—for instance, Pennsylvania avenue?

Mr. BROOKS. We are constantly making streets or roads in the District of Columbia.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Is there any distinction in the power?

Mr. BROOKS. I do not wish to discuss the question of power, or to be drawn into a long controversy on a territorial bill day, and at this stage of the case. I only express my own opinion that, practically, I do not see any difference between making roads in Minnesota, or in the Territory of Oregon, not necessary for military purposes, and the making like appropriations out of the same Federal Treasury, for roads, or harbors, or rivers in other parts of the United States. It is easy to christen one of these roads in Oregon or Minnesota a military road—and military roads are doubtless necessary in Oregon, because there may be an enemy there to be met with, say a foreign enemy; but it requires a great deal of courage to rise upon the floor of this House, and say that a military road is necessary in Minnesota, in order to keep off or to put down an enemy there.

Mr. SIBLEY, (interrupting.) The gentleman will allow me to correct him in this matter. Is he not aware that the Territory of Minnesota is inhabited by the largest and most warlike tribes of Indians on the North American continent?

Mr. BROOKS. I know that very well, and the gentleman from Minnesota will not rise and say that the people of that Territory cannot take care of themselves?

Mr. SIBLEY. I will say, in regard to that matter, that if the Government will grant us one half of what it costs to support the Army on the northwestern frontier, small as it is, we will take care of ourselves against any and all enemies, without other cost to the Government.

Mr. BROOKS. That may be—and the like may be said of many other parts of the United States. But this Government has ceased to be a landholder, by giving away all its lands to actual settlers in the Territory of Minnesota. Besides, Minnesota will have nothing to complain of us, if, as she is asking at this moment, and rightfully, I think, we expend very large sums of money to extinguish the Indian titles to the lands within her borders, and in the ratification of numerous Indian treaties. Indeed, a Federal Government is acting with amazing liberality, if she extinguishes in Minnesota, and at great cost, titles to millions of acres of public lands, and then votes them all away to actual settlers. We have ceased, therefore, or are ceasing, perhaps I should say, to be a great landholder in Minnesota, or in any other part of the Union; and if we are more cautious than usual, therefore, in making roads, or in otherwise voting money from the Treasury to raise the value of these lands in the Territories, we must be pardoned now for this excess of caution. It is time to begin to look upon all these roads as a system of internal improvements, and to decide whether we shall go into it in Oregon or Minnesota, without extending it to other parts of the Union. Minnesota is a rapidly rising Territory, soon to be a State of the Union, and I am reluctant to see her have all she wants now as a Territory—five or six pretty long roads, as here intended, and when this Territory comes in as a State, have her turn around, snap her fingers at the old States and oppose the whole system of internal improvements as unconstitutional or wasteful. If the system is right in Minnesota, it is right elsewhere and everywhere, and if it is wrong elsewhere, it is wrong there; and hence, here at this starting point, we should settle whether or not internal improvement is a live or a dead system. I have nothing to say now on either side, pro or con, but what I do want is for the House to see what it is doing, and establish, or refuse to establish a precedent.

Now, as regards this road from Mendota, on the Mississippi, to the mouth of the Big Sioux, on the Missouri, I beg the attention of the House to the fact that it is an appropriation for a survey ($5,000)—an appropriation additional to $5,000 voted for a survey in the last Congress, and that, therefore, it is a new road that Congress is now called upon to establish, the very survey of which costs $10,000. The colonel of the topographical corps, as if to open our eyes to the fact that it was no military road, remarks "the (surveying) party will be itself its own escort, as the Indians are not troublesome in that region." Hence the remark of the Delegate from Minnesota about warlike tribes of Indians in Minnesota, is here of no account. If that be so, a military road can only be necessary for the transportation of supplies; and if we once begin to establish roads merely for transportation of supplies, where shall we stop. A like military road is needed in Missouri, in Texas, or Arkansas, for the like transportation of supplies for the troops stationed in those quarters. And hence we should begin at once the making of roads generally for the transportation of supplies.

In the eighteenth and nineteenth lines of the bill, Mr. Chairman, is this item of $5,000 for the survey of a military road from Mendota to the mouth of the Big Sioux river. The item is a very innocent and a very small appropriation upon the face of it; but let the House look at it, and ponder upon it. Last Congress, upon the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. SIBLEY,] $5,000 was given for the survey of this road, and given without any estimate from a responsible quarter. The War Department comes to you now and says that $5,000 will not begin to make the survey, and that you must give at least $5,000 more; and that sum is inserted in this bill upon the estimate of the War Department—an estimate forced now by an appropriation made in the last Congress without any estimate whatsoever. How long do you think this road is, Mr. Chairman? Forty or fifty miles? Perhaps a hundred, or a hundred and fifty? No; it is a road two hundred and sixty miles long, and $10,000 is asked for its survey; but the amount it will cost, the War Department cannot even guess, much less know. The gentleman from Minnesota himself does not know, and it is impossible for this House to guess at it with any certainty. We vote altogether in the dark.

Mr. SIBLEY. The gentleman will allow me to present one fact. I have been over much of the Indian country through which this road will pass. It is for the most part a prairie country, and the cost of a road through it will be much less than through woodland. In a military point of view this proposed road is of great importance, because in case of trouble with the powerful tribe of Dakotas or Sioux, which may or may not arise hereafter, the troops would be enabled to march with their munitions of war directly into the fastnesses occupied by these Indians, and bring them to terms without running the hazard of inflicting upon the frontier the horrors of savage warfare. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] is greatly mistaken in his estimate of the character of the wild tribes of the prairie, and of their means of offense.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not wish to be misunderstood upon this subject by the Delegate from Minnesota, [Mr. SIBLEY,] or the Delegate from Oregon, [Mr. LANE.] I did not rise to make war upon any necessary appropriations for these Territories, nor do I mean to be so understood. I am not hostile to the new States or the Territories, but I wish equal and exact justice to be done to all portions of this country, and it is time now to settle what that equality and justice are. It will not be right or wise for us to rear up new Territories into States by supplying all their wants and all their demands, upon one set of principles, and then when they are made States by our generous appropriations, to have their Senators in the other branch of Congress, and their members upon the floor of this House, rise here and oppose the whole set of principles upon which they have been reared as unconstitutional, wild, or extravagant. Now, there are five roads included in this Minnesota bill, the cost of which no man knows, and the length of one of which is two hundred and sixty miles; and to make the roads rightfully and properly, I have no doubt that over a quarter of a million of dollars would be indispensably necessary. Well, if the House choose to begin to appropriate such sums with a view to some general system, and these appropriations are to be considered as a part and parcel of that general system, why let us say so—but if not, it is time to stop where we are—to rescue territorial road bills from the Committee on Roads and Canals, and to consign them to the Army bill, or to the Military Committee, who can certify to us whether they are necessary for war purposes or not.

Mr. TUCK. I have too much regard to the dispatch of business in this House, to detain the committee long with any remarks of my own upon this bill. I will take occasion, however, to say, that I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] places unfair obstacles in the way of the passage of this bill, by attempting to hold every man who shall vote for it, committed to the policy of a general system of internal improvements. Now, the two great parties in the country have been, to a great extent, divided on the question of internal improvements. But the two parties have not been divided upon the policy or constitutionality of territorial appropriations, like the one now under consideration. Such appropriations have been made in past years for all the Territories, equally under Whig and Democratic administrations, and been supported by the masses of both parties, without its ever having been alleged, that those who voted for them, thereby abandoned their party positions. It is extraordinary, and I think wrong, now to impede and endanger this bill, by attempting to array a political party against it.

I understood the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Houston] to say that he adopted the views suggested by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks.] Now, I will say to the gentleman from Alabama, that if he sits himself up as such a Simon Pure Democrat, and so committed against internal improvements, that he will not even vote anything for roads in the Territories, he adopts a standard never set up by his Democratic predecessors, and not likely to be set up by his party friends at the present time. To discard the making of appropriations for military and other necessary roads in the Territories, will be turning over a new leaf in the history of the Democratic party, and will be writing a page of their history quite novel, and certainly in contradiction of their past conduct. But wishing to hasten action, I will say no more.

Mr. VENABLE. It is with much reluctance that I vote against any allowance asked from this Government for the benefit of a Territory. But the question now presented involves the great principle of the system of internal improvement. It points to opening the doors of the Treasury for the purpose of supplying every demand which may be made upon us by any Territory placed under our care. If the principle be fixed; if, by our legislation, it be settled that there is a general power in this Government to make roads, to make internal improvements of any kind, you may construct railroads and canals. Why, sir, I do not see any limit to the amount of money which is to be taken from the public Treasury for such purposes.

But the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. Tuck] says, should we deny the propriety of such appropriations, we shall have to turn over a new leaf in the history of the Democratic party. But I do not regard it as a party question. I regard it as a question springing from the Constitution, and I never, at any time, take my view of the Constitution from the construction which any party may place upon it. I regret very much to see that there are gentlemen belonging to the Democratic party who have voted for log-rolling river and harbor bills, who have gone to any extent that gentlemen upon the other side of this House have gone upon the subject of internal improvements, and I charge it as a departure from the old doctrine of that party; and if the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. Tuck] will put himself to the trouble to review those doctrines, as illustrated by Mr. Madison and others of the Republican party, he will find that I am not alone; and that he, instead of turning over a new leaf, has only failed to turn over a very old leaf; and that he has only failed to go back to the opinions of the fathers of the republican doctrines of this country. I have never felt myself bound by party lines upon this subject; but I here say again, that I deeply regret that the Democratic, or Republican party, (which was a much better name than the Democratic party, and I regret that the name was ever changed,) that the doctrines of the Republican party, since the days of Mr. Madison, seem to have changed.

If the gentleman will take the pains to go back to the discussions, immediately after the adoption of the Constitution, he will find that Mr. Madison, who was a member of the convention which adopted the Constitution of the United States, went into the first Congress, and there declared, when the question was brought before that body, as to the location of the district in which the seat of Government was to be placed, that the General Government would not have the right to clear out the Susquehanna river, or to make a harbor at Havre de Grace, without the consent of the States of Pennsylvania and Maryland, and that this consent ought to be obtained before any steps were taken for the location of the seat of Government. The selection of this District put an end to the question; but the construction of the Constitution in relation to this power was distinctly declared. The district selected was to be a Territory, under territorial government, recognized by the Constitution, and placed under the exclusive legislation of Congress.

These were the doctrines of Mr. Madison when he had just come from the convention which adopted the Constitution of the United States, and became a member of the First Congress. He did not feel it was so clear that this Government had a right to make internal improvements—the right to make appropriations from the Treasury for the purpose of carrying out any scheme of internal improvement. I take no distinction between a Territory and a State. I take no distinction between the right of this Government to make railroads, canals, or other internal improvements in a Territory or in a State. One difficulty which has been presented has been its interference with State sovereignty. If that was all, it could be obviated by the consent of the State being obtained; but it goes beyond, and lies behind it. It is not one of the powers ceded to this Government by the charter under which we act; and I would not oppose any measure for the benefit of the Territories which may be properly granted—and, whilst I have been liberal in every way, and on every opportunity, for the interests of that far distant people, I cannot consent that this measure shall pass without entering my protest against it, and against every act of legislation for the purpose of expending the money of the United States to make these improvements in the Territories, or elsewhere. We have fallen upon evil times. When a proposition is made here for the donation of the public lands you find a formidable body rising up and banding themselves together for the purpose of affecting those appropriations. I find before this House now, sir, schemes to build railroads in the States. They ask for the construction of those railroads alternate sections of the public land on each side of the proposed road—the selection to be made within twenty miles of the road; and if they cannot get the alternate sections there, to go thirty miles off to obtain them. It is said if you grant these alternate sections for the purpose of constructing roads, the reserved alternates will be increased in value. That is very well; but you give an opportunity to fish for the alternate sections many miles on each side. And roads passing in the same region find it convenient to make the appropriation of all the land, as well as to secure all the benefit of the enhanced value. One railroad corporation goes on to take alternate sections under the grant, and a neighboring corporation, with similar powers, take the alternate sections left, and all is absorbed. It is but another name for an absolute cession of the public domain to the States for purposes of internal improvement—differing only from the present bill, which asks for the direct application of money from the Treasury for the same purpose.

The Indian and white man, hunting together, had killed a buzzard and a turkey. The white man said, "You take the buzzard and I will take the turkey, or I will take the turkey and you take the buzzard." The reply of the Indian, that, in the division of the game, he had never had turkey said to him, has become proverbial as an illustration of unfair distribution of common property. This, sir, is a much stronger case; you say neither turkey nor buzzard to the old States. You speak of alternate sections and increased value, and end in a system of grants which take all the alternates—absorb all the land—take all. You give the word of promise to the ear and break it to the hope. You say that if this bill passes the price of the public lands will be increased, and that the old States ought not to be opposed to it—that it will add that much to the wealth of the country.

Mr. STUART. I rise to a question of order. I submit that it is not in order upon this bill to discuss the question of appropriating lands for railroad purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the remarks of the gentleman are not out of order. They have an evident bearing upon the question of giving roads to the Territories.

Mr. VENABLE. It is not the first time that I have seen those who are galled wince under the operation of outside pressure; but I think it is of importance to the public that we should ourselves come up and take an honest and faithful view of this subject. We have looked at it as one in the distance. It has now come near to us. There is upon the Speaker's table, or referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, bills which, if passed, will appropriate some thirty millions acres of the public land on this principle. A question of such importance should be fully discussed, and deliberately decided. It is no economy to suppress debate, or shun calculations. The proper doctrine—that which springs from the true reading of the Constitution—is this: Whilst the Federal Government has the power to make roads and other modes of transportation, under certain circumstances, such as are accessory to the power of making war, the transportation of troops and munitions—yet the power must be determined by the case and the necessity that exists to render effective a clearly-granted and well-defined power in the Constitution. The right to make such improvements is an incident originating in a necessity for the exercise of a higher and more important power, and is allowable only under such a state of things. The acknowledged power is the principal—the implied power the incident. Nothing can be a more unsafe rule of construction than that which converts the incident into the principal. To make military roads in advance of any necessity for them, with the real motive for the use of citizens in the peaceful avocations of life, is surely an obvious perversion of every proper rule of constitutional construction. The military road, when built, is properly used for all other purposes. But it originated in a necessity arising under the power granted, to make and to prosecute war.

I was unwilling, sir, to pass over this subject sub silentio, and permit this measure to be brought up as a precedent to override the Constitution. I have been taught by sad experience that the letter and meaning of the Constitution has been perfectly overslaughed by unconstitutional legislation. When it is written with a sunbeam upon the page of that instrument that a power is not given to this Government, if a gentleman should rise upon this floor, and, after looking back into the old statute-books, inform us that a former Congress disregarded those provisions, a precedent is discovered and the Constitution is disregarded again because of a previous violation—I am for returning to the instrument itself, whether Whigs or Democrats have done wrong. I trust that I shall never so far forget myself, as a Representative of the people, as to regulate my opinions of the Constitution by the dictation of any party. I acknowledge my party allegiance, but I never mean, by that allegiance, a sacrifice of my self-respect. If those with whom I act go wrong, I have the less respect for them than for others; for I believe that they, being wrong in their political principles, have fallen into the errors to which they necessarily lead. But I can make no such allowance for those whose fundamental doctrines disallow such conclusions. I am sure they ought to know better. The Whig party has been misled by its principles; and for them I have charity, and believe that they are following out honestly their opinions. They have been led into error because the principle which they have adopted is an incorrect one; but when those with whom I act and associate, whose glory is declared to consist in a strict construction of the Constitution, go wrong, it is a sin for which I have no such charity. It is in vain, therefore, for gentlemen to tell me that the Democratic party have done wrong. When they have done so they deserve double censure, and I never mean to be held by party lines when they point my course in direct violation of the clear construction of the Constitution. If it be right to make this appropriation for the Territory of Minnesota—if the principle upon which it is based be correct—it will be right also with respect to the States. Gentlemen may ask when they please for appropriations, and expect them to be granted. When a case is made out for internal improvements, the lands and the wealth of the Treasury of the Government will be squandered upon these roads. I repeat, that it is with reluctance I throw myself upon the attention of the committee. I have avoided discussion upon the subject, that I might not consume an improper and unnecessary portion of their time. But I know of nothing more fraught with evil, and nothing which is more certain to produce the festering of discontent and ill-feeling in the hearts of the people of the old States—those States who were tried in the Revolution, and who passed through its crucible. When they look upon the broad domain which belongs to them and their children, which has been purchased by their struggles and their contributions, and find that it is passing away day after day—melting like the snow beneath the influence of the sunbeam—when they feel every claim which they may urge upon this Government is regarded as idle—when they remonstrate and say that this extensive territory belongs to us all in general, and it is unheeded, they will lose confidence in the justice of those who control the destinies of the Government. I feel assured that in this policy we adopt a system of legislation which is to destroy the confidence of the old States in the justice of the Congress—that we will estrange the hearts of those who in the day of trial stood true, who have conquered this domain and left it an inheritance to their children. They are to be cast out and the stranger, sojourner, and foreigner is to be welcomed, and put in possession of the territory of our common country. The claims of our own citizens are to be utterly disregarded. The whole Atlantic slope is to be looked upon as a foreign land. And whilst I am willing to legislate liberally, willing to foster, to protect them, and to vote money and men for the defense of their homes and their rights, I claim that equal justice be done to the older members of the family of States. I am ready to make a just, a generous distribution; to give the younger members of our Confederacy a full and liberal portion, even that of Benjamin, in the inheritance. Still I claim that we of the old States shall not be declared illegitimate. I claim that the old States should be entitled to their rights. I ask no extra privileges. I only ask justice. There is no gentleman in this committee for whom I have kinder feelings than the Delegate from Minnesota. There is no gentleman for whom I would do more; and I would vote for this bill were it not a concession of the principle upon which I have always acted, and with my views of the Constitution, and of duty and propriety upon which I shall always act. I conceive that such a course is more necessary now, because there seems to be an unsettled state of opinion upon this once cardinal doctrine of the party to which I belong. The veto message of Mr. Polk was a clear and distinct avowal of that portion of our creed. I am aware that many gentlemen of the Democratic party dissented from his views. But the doctrine is not wholly repudiated even by them, if the platform of the Baltimore Convention contains the true creed. They distinctly disavow the right of the Government to prosecute any general system of internal improvements. Mr. Polk acted upon that principle. He discovered in the legislation of Congress what he believed to be the prosecution of such a general system. But other distinguished Democrats, candidates or aspirants, with their feet apparently upon that platform, have not found any bill so general as to come within the purview of that resolution. Bills including some ninety items, and spreading over some twenty-eight States, have not been considered general, but peculiarly particular, and essentially democratic in their character. Indeed, I know of no bill or scheme of internal improvement by this Government which is founded upon a system general enough to be forbidden by the resolution of the Baltimore Convention, affirmed and reaffirmed in the judgment of many of those whose distinguished position entitle them to be regarded as leaders of the party. I desire especially that it should be ascertained what is so general as to be forbidden, and so particular as to be allowed. In the absence of such lights, I must content myself with the opinions and construction of the fathers of the Republican party, and those who, revering their wisdom, have used the power of their office to restrain unconstitutional legislation.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I am certain nothing further is needed in the support of a bill like the one now before the committee; and I should not have detained the committee a moment, were it not that some remarks have been made, tending to show that the voting of this appropriation for the construction and survey of these roads in the Territory of Minnesota, is the adopting of a general system of internal improvements by the Federal Government. I do not wish to stand wrong upon the record, for as I have said before, I say now, that I am not the advocate of such a system. Nor do I propose, at this time, to go into a general discussion on the subject, for the time will not permit it. It would be better devoted to the disposition of this bill, it strikes me. It seems to me, that the proposition before the committee is one which is in perfect conformity with all the previous legislation of this Government upon similar subjects. What is it, sir? It is for the purpose of appropriating the sum of $5,000 for the survey of a road some two or three thousand miles in length, through one of the Territories, and for the appropriation, also, of some $40,000 to aid in constructing certain roads already surveyed, and the construction of which has already been commenced under the superintendence of the War Department. Now, I think that there is a perfect distinction between improvements of this character, and what are usually termed internal improvements in a State. We know that the Territories are peculiarly placed, by the Constitution of the United States, under the legislation of Congress. This is the point to which they look for all legislative assistance of this character, and to which alone they can look. And when we consider every Territory which has grown up through the whole progress of the growth of our country, from small beginnings, from the modest State, to become an important, rich, and powerful State in this Union, has met with the same difficulties with which the Territory of Minnesota now meets, in reference to this subject, I presume we shall not be disposed to make an exception in this case. I say, if we will go back through the period of thirty, forty, or fifty years, in reference to the legislation upon our Territories, we will find that Congress has uniformly appropriated for works of this kind. What are they? The construction of railroads—the construction of a national road—or anything of that character? Not at all; but the construction of the rudest of all possible roads, upon which a settler in a primeval country can find his way to his log cabin.

If you look at the report of the War Department, which I have before me, upon the subject of these very roads, it will show that the very small sum of three hundred and odd dollars, proposed to be appropriated to each mile in the construction of these roads, would construct but the poorest roads which could be imagined for traveling in a new Territory. It is, then, merely the opening of these communications which may be deemed necessary for the purpose of affording the denizens of the West an opportunity of settling upon their new lands, and affording them an opportunity of becoming citizens of a State that will by-and-by contribute money to the treasury of their State through its cultivation and accumulated wealth, which we have aided them in obtaining, and which can be subsequently appropriated in the construction of far better roads and other improvements.

Mr. VENABLE. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question? I should like to know if we consider it our duty, after giving land to the landless, to take money out of the Treasury and then make a road to the land.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I am coming to that identical point. I say, then, that so far as there has been any legislation upon the subject, it has been uniform. These roads, if they have been military roads, have been constructed by the Government. If they have been roads to aid the pioneer in reaching these settlements, they have been constructed by means of the legislation of Congress. It is said—and my colleague made the remark in the speech which he addressed to the committee some time since—and the question is now repeated by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. VENABLE],—that we have arrived at a point in the legislation of this country when the policy of the Government upon this subject ought to be changed; and that having voted for a law which allows to any individual who is the head of a family to go and take one hundred and sixty acres of the public land, and make a homestead of it, without paying a dollar to the Government for it, we should now no longer exercise this care and supervision, and appropriate these moneys for the purpose of aiding the settlement of the West, which we have heretofore done. In my humble opinion, there are still stronger reasons why we should do it. If the policy is a good one—and I think it is—which I advocated, and voted for upon this floor, to give to these settlers a homestead in that country, then it is surely a good one also to provide them with the means of attaining that point, where they can occupy the land; where they can become good citizens, and where they can increase by their industry the accumulation of wealth, which we hope will flow from such a stream of independent agriculturists who will so greatly increase the wealth of the whole country. That is a part of the great system which we have adopted in the preemption laws, and in all of those various facilities which we have afforded for the rapid settlement of the West. The construction of these roads, it seems to me, forms one important part of that system, and should not, and will not, be abandoned by the Government. With regard to the amount of appropriations asked for here, I think, that inasmuch as there are appropriations still unexpended, as I understand from the honorable chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, to the amount of some $20,000, the amount which was originally contemplated to be granted, should not be granted in full. I understand from the honorable delegate from Minnesota

[Mr. SIBLEY] that he does not ask it—that he has himself desired that these appropriations should be reduced which were originally contemplated, for the very reason that this balance, the sum of $20,000, already stands to the credit of these works. If this is so, then it seems to me the measure is put into the most acceptable shape possible; and I cannot conceive of any reason whatever, unless we mean to proclaim to the country now a change of the entire policy of the country in reference to the settlement of Western territories as a reason why we will not give to the Territory of Minnesota the sum that we have given to other Territories.

Mr. STUART. I move that the committee rise, with a view of passing a resolution to terminate this debate.

The question was then taken, and it was agreed to.

The committee then rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman of the committee reported that the committee had had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly House bill No. 254, which they have ordered to be reported to the House with an amendment; and also House bill No. 255, but have come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. STUART. I move that all debate in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be closed on bill No. 255 in five minutes after the House shall have again resolved itself into committee.

The question was then taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. STUART. I now move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question was then taken, and it was agreed to.

So the committee resumed its session and the consideration of bill No. 255.

Mr. STUART. No amendment, I believe, is pending in regard to this bill. I move that it be laid aside to be reported to the House.

The question was then taken, and it was agreed to.

UNITED STATES PROPERTY IN SANTA FE.

House bill No. 256, relinquishing to the Territory of New Mexico all the right, title and interest which the United States may have to certain real estate within the corporate limits of the city of Santa Fe, New Mexico, was then read by the Clerk.

Mr. BISSELL. What is the character of the bill? What character of land is proposed to be ceded?

Mr. LOCKHART. I will send to the Clerk the memorial from the Legislative Assembly of the Territory, which explains the matter.

The memorial was then read, from which it appears that in the city of Santa Fe there are several small tracts of cultivated lands, and certain public buildings, such as the palace, barracks, granary, and others, the titles to which were uncertain, as there was no record of them in the archives of the Territory to prove any legal title to them. It also appears that the title to said property was vested either in the Government of the United States or in the Territory of New Mexico, and that questions have arisen between the civil and military authorities, and although the civil governors have used the palace from time immemorial without dispute, it is also true that it was used by the military authorities when they were united with the civil. The land, which is inclosed within the barracks, was formerly cultivated by the Mexican soldiers, but was in the same condition with the public buildings, without any title to the property. In view of these facts, the memorialists pray the Congress of the United States to relinquish to the Territory all the right the United States may have to said property.

Mr. BISSELL. I should like to inquire of the gentleman whether the committee have made any report upon this case?

Mr. LOCKHART. There is no report.

Mr. BISSELL. I presume it is all right, though I think the bill is one of some importance.

Mr. CLEVELAND. We had better get some little information in addition to what we have upon the subject. It seems to me, that we ought to have some report from the committee here, to know what the effect of this action of ours is to be. We know not the amount of these lands. Here is a general statement made by the party in interest, petitioning and asking for this grant. We have a very general statement, and we know not what interest we may affect by the passage of the act. There may be individuals there who will suffer by the claim set up by the territorial government, and which we are called upon to pass in the dark. Is there any man who knows what we are called upon to do? We pass it, because such a bill has passed the Senate, or because it has been presented by somebody who represents that Territory, and is interested to have that grant. It seems to me, that would be an objection, which would make men hesitate long before they would vote this grant. In addition to that, I can see no distinction, in point of principle, between the grant we are now called upon to make, and the grant of land we shall ere long be called to make in the State of Ohio. I am opposed to all these grants of lands. I can see no difference, in point of principle, between making the grant asked for here, and a grant of 200,000 acres of land in the State of Ohio, or that of the entire body of unsold lands in the State of Illinois.

Now, it does seem to me that we ought not to begin this system. The way these grants are obtained is in this still, silent, quiet way. They seem to be matters of small moment, and without explanation, without a written report, without any exposure whatever, a gentleman gets through the grant, and then that grant is used as a precedent for another and more dangerous one, and that for another, and so it goes on. There is no reason assigned for making the grant in this case, by the gentleman who appears in behalf of it.

Mr. LOCKHART here interposing, made a remark, but in so low a voice as to be wholly inaudible to the Reporter, in the confusion that prevailed in the Hall.

Mr. CLEVELAND. The gentleman has not intimated that this grant is designed for any such purpose. It is not put upon that ground at all. If the gentleman puts it on that ground, why not put it in the bill itself, so that it can never form a dangerous precedent for other applications of a different character? That is my objection to it. If the gentleman will state what the grant is for, and if it is for a fair and legitimate purpose, we are all ready to go for it. But till it does appear on the record in such a form that it cannot be used as a dangerous precedent, I cannot vote for it. At present it is much too uncertain and indefinite. I suggest to the friends of the bill that they should put it in such a shape that we may understand it, and that those who come after us may understand what we have done, and why we have done it.

Mr. HOWARD. I can relieve the gentleman from Connecticut of the difficulty he is in in relation to this matter. Under the Spanish law, all the towns to which no larger grants had been made, were entitled, under a general law, to four leagues, commencing at the center, and running each way. The same law has been enacted in nearly all the States of the Republic of Mexico, and they give to all the new towns four leagues.

There were some of the old towns under the Spanish regime to which larger grants were made, and in some cases the original titles to the property from the Crown of Spain to the inhabitants of the towns have been lost. I know that such is the case in the town in which I reside, and which was the old capital of Texas. Now, if I understand this bill, its object is to settle all controversy by a direct release on the part of the United States. I will say further, from my knowledge of the law in relation to these matters—and I have been concerned in litigation on the subject—that I have no doubt the people of Santa Fe could maintain an action of ejectment on the ground of their former title. But this bill is intended to settle all controversy of that kind, and quiet the title of the town.

Mr. CLEVELAND. With the consent of the committee, I will now withdraw my amendment. There being no objection, the amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. BISSELL. I propose to strike out the word "houses," in the ninth line. I do not know, and I am hardly disposed to doubt, but that this is right, yet I think that it is requiring a little too much of the House, to expect us to pass the bill in this form, without more light. I think it is a bill which would well have justified a report—a report made from the desks of members, or read before us. Without that, or something like it, I cannot see that I can vote for the bill.

Take the case, as presented in the bill, and as made out by the statement which the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. LOCKHART,] has given us, and I see nothing in it but a grant of land. It is all very right, probably, but then it is a grant of an indefinite quantity of land, and a grant of land without an object. Now, I am in favor of granting land to settlers, that they may cultivate it, and for the purpose of constructing railroads and similar objects, but I am not in favor of granting to any State or Territory—unless under peculiar circumstances, which are not shown to exist here—an indefinite quantity of land, without specifying the object for which the grant is made.

Now, what member of this House, besides those who are upon the Committee on Territories, and the very intelligent gentleman from Texas, [Mr. HOWARD,] has any information in regard to this matter—how much it gives—how many houses—what description of houses—and for what purpose? Why, says the gentleman, the thing is all made right, since you invest the President with discretion in this matter, and authorize him to cede as much of the land as he chooses, to the Territory, and retain the balance. Sir, I will not consent to rest any such discretion in the President. We ought to have the information before the House, and to determine here, for ourselves, what the quantity shall be, and for what purpose they shall have it. If we want information from the War Department, or from the President, as to the amount necessary to be reserved for military and other purposes, we can call upon them for that information, and act when we receive it. I cannot vote for the bill, with the light now before me.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. In regard to the views in reference to this bill, which have been presented by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. HOWARD,] I will say that I was not before aware of the existence of such a law as he has alluded to, granting four leagues to each city and town. But I am also informed by the gentleman's colleague [Mr. SCURRY] that such a law does exist. The people of Santa Fé probably, do not know their rights in this respect. Under the circumstances, I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the Territories.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion cannot be made in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. STUART. It is in order to move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it be recommitted to the Committee on the Territories, and I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

EXPENSES OF THE CAYUSE WAR.

The next bill on the Calendar was House bill, No. 257, to amend an act entitled "An act to settle and adjust the expense of the people of Oregon in defending themselves from attacks and hostilities of Cayuse Indians in the years 1847 and 1848," approved February 10, 1851.

Mr. LOCKHART. That bill was reported in conformity with a request from the Treasury Department—indeed the bill was drafted at the Department. For the purpose of enabling them to pay the expenses of the Cayuse war which occurred in Oregon, $100,000 was appropriated in February, 1851, and they now ask for the passage of this bill to enable them to pay the claims so far as they have been adjusted.

The bill was then laid aside, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

BOUNDARIES OF MILITARY RESERVE AT ST. PETER'S RIVER, MINNESOTA.

The next bill on the Calendar was House bill No. 158, to reduce and define the boundaries of the military reserve at the St. Peter's river, in the Territory of Minnesota, and to secure the rights of actual settlers thereon.

The bill was read through.

Mr. SIBLEY. I will merely say that I have here a report from the War Department concurring in the report of the commanding officer, upon which the bill is based.

On motion by Mr. HALL, the bill was then laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, moved that the committee do now rise; which motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman (Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee) reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the special order, and had instructed him to report the following bills:

House bill No. 255 "making further appropriations for the construction of certain roads in the Territory of Minnesota," with sundry amendments, and with a recommendation that it do pass;

House bill No. 256, "relinquishing to the Territory of New Mexico, all the right, title, and interest which the United States may have to certain real estate within the corporate limits of the city of Santa Fé, in New Mexico," with a recommendation that it be recommitted to the Committee on the Territories;

House bill No. 257, "to amend an act entitled 'An act to settle and adjust the expense of the people of Oregon in defending themselves from attacks and hostilities of Cayuse Indians in the years 1845 and 1848,'" approved February 10, 1851; and House bill No. 158, "to reduce and define the boundaries of the military reserve at the St. Peter's river, in the Territory of Minnesota, and to secure the rights of actual settlers thereon," without amendment, and with the recommendation that the bills do pass.

Mr. STUART. I would suggest that such of the bills which have been reported from the committee, that there is no objection to, be put upon their passage now.

[Cries of "Agreed!" "Agreed!"]

The SPEAKER. The first bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union is House bill No. 187, "for the construction of military roads in Oregon Territory."

Mr. STUART. That bill is under discussion, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BISSELL] has the floor upon it.

The SPEAKER. That was the first bill reported to the House.

Mr. STUART. My suggestion is, that we shall pass such bills as there is no objection to.

Mr. KING, of New York. There is objection to this bill, and a gentleman is upon the floor speaking against it.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be laid aside, then, and the Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. WARD. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, on a division—ayes 68, noes 37.

And the House adjourned until to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

PETITIONS, &c.

The following petitions, memorials, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. BRENTON: The petitions of A. Crawford and George W. Wood, assistant marshals in the State of Indiana, asking additional compensation for taking the census.

By Mr. ROBINSON: Two petitions of citizens of Lawrenceburg, in the State of Indiana, praying for the construction of a canal around the Falls of the Ohio river, on the Indiana side.

By Mr. COTTMAN: Resolutions of the General Assembly of Maryland, in relation to the establishment of a light on Fort Soliers, in Patuxent river.

By Mr. SCURRY: The petition of J. M. Beeton, assistant marshal of Beaver, Texas, praying for extra compensation for taking the Seventh Census.

By Mr. CABLE, of Ohio: A memorial for the sale of lands and city property, not connected with the public buildings nor public service, at public auction, and the proceeds therefrom to be invested so that the interest thereof should be applied to a system of common schools in the District of Columbia.

By Mr. CHANDLER: The memorial of L. S. Chapman, of Philadelphia, asking aid in prosecuting a discovery of importance to the nation.

Also, the memorial of the Art Union of Philadelphia, asking Congress to employ Mr. P. R. Rothermel to paint an historical picture for the nation.

Also, the memorial of Elizabeth McDougall, asking for a pension for the services of her father in the revolutionary war.

By Mr. FLORENCE: The memorial of Joseph Eneue, Oliver P. Cornman, Edward W. Power, A. De Kalb Tarr, Egbert Somerville, and 38 others, citizens of Philadelphia, petitioning Congress to pass a law giving to the soldiers of the war of 1812, and of the Indian wars, &c., one hundred and sixty acres of land.

By Mr. BARCOCK: The petition of citizens of Oswego county, New York, praying Congress to make an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor of Port Ontario.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, May 22, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is the consideration of a bill to appropriate money to build roads in Oregon.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is my purpose to move to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, in order that we may get all the territorial business into a shape where it may be acted upon. There are three bills yet left, upon which there has been no action in committee. Some of them need amendment, and there are some gentlemen who desire to discuss them. I think that we may dispose of them to-day; and for that purpose I now move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HALL. I ask the gentleman to withdraw his motion for the purpose of enabling me to introduce a bill from the Committee on Public Lands in relation to school lands in the Territory of Minnesota.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will withdraw the motion for that purpose.

Mr. HALL, by unanimous consent, then introduced, from the Committee on Public Lands, a bill to appropriate lands for the support of schools in certain townships and fractional townships, not heretofore provided for; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I now renew the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question was put, and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the special order, (Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee, in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN stated, as the first business in order, the consideration of House bill No. 224, being a bill to amend an act entitled "An act 'to create the office of surveyor general of the public lands in Oregon, and to provide for the survey, and to make donations to the settlers of said public lands.'"

The bill was read through by the Clerk.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is a bill reported from the Committee on Public Lands, and of which I know nothing. There are some measures behind this coming from the Committee on the Territories, which it is important should be passed. With a view therefore of terminating debate upon this bill, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman that perhaps it might be better to lay that bill aside informally for the present, and pass to the others.

Mr. LANE obtained the floor.

Mr. HALL. With the consent of the gentleman from Oregon, [Mr. LANE,] I desire to explain that bill. It is a bill which ought to be explained to the committee; and, I think, with certain amendments ought to pass. The Committee on Public Lands, however, thought differently. There are certain provisions of the bill which are just, and certainly ought to be adopted. I hope the bill will not be laid aside, but that it may be explained, and discussed by the committee.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman from Oregon allow me to make a suggestion? I hope he will allow this bill to be passed over for the present. There are other bills behind this, which I ask may be taken up with the understanding that as soon as they are disposed of, this bill may again be brought up.

Mr. VENABLE. I have no objection to this bill. I desire simply to say a single word in relation to the course it is proposed to pursue in relation to these bills now left upon the Calendar. I think it is a mistaken policy to attempt to crowd bills containing important principles and involving matters of very high import, as those left upon the Calendar now do, in the space of a few hours. I do not think it is a wise policy to stop all discussion, to suppress all debate upon these bills when we have spent three or four months in discussing nothing of very high importance to the country to say the least of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must inform the gentleman from North Carolina, that this motion is not debatable.

Mr. VENABLE. I know that the truth is very often not debatable. I merely throw out those remarks for the consideration of the committee.

The question was then put, and the bill was passed over informally.

PROTECTION OF THE TERRITORIES.

The CHAIRMAN stated as the next business in order, House bill No. 259, being a bill to provide for the protection of the Territories of New Mexico and Oregon.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate, &c., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause arms to be distributed among such portions of the inhabitants of New Mexico and Oregon as he may deem advisable, and under such regulations and precautions as may be considered necessary to insure the preservation of said arms, and the application thereof to the defense of the said Territories.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized, whenever he may deem it necessary for the protection of said Territories, or either of them, to call out all or any portion of the militia thereof, or to accept the services of one or more volunteer companies which may be raised therein; and the volunteers and militia so called into service shall be entitled to the same ordinary monthly pay and allowances as were provided by law for volunteers while in the service of the United States, under the act entitled "An act providing for the prosecution of the existing war between the United States and the Republic of Mexico," approved May 13, 1845.

The bill was read through by the Clerk.

Mr. PEASLEE. I desire to call the attention of the committee to the provisions of the bill now under consideration, as I conceive it to be an important one, and entitled to their favorable action.

The first section of the bill authorizes the President to distribute arms amongst such portions of the people of New Mexico and Oregon as he may deem advisable and necessary for the protection of the inhabitants of those Territories. It also requires him to take such precautions, and adopt such regulations as to their delivery, as shall insure their preservation, and their application to the defense and protection of the people of the Territories.

We have a plenty of arms now lying idle in our arsenals—over six hundred thousand stands, including muskets, rifles, pistols, musketoons, and carbines, and under such guards and restrictions as the bill imposes to insure those distributed being placed in trustworthy and responsible hands, and to prevent their being sold or improperly used, no loss of any consequence would accrue to the Government from this course, unless the power given to the President should be abused, of which there is as little apprehension in this case as in any whatever.

The arms will never be more needed than they are at present, if as much so; and it should be remembered that such are the changes and improvements made, and continually making, in the manufacture of fire-arms, that those on hand may become comparatively valueless for use against an enlightened enemy.

The second section authorizes the President, whenever he may deem it necessary for the protection of these Territories, or either of them, to call out the militia that may be organized, or accept the services of such volunteer companies as may be raised. This part of the bill only authorizes to be done in the Territories what has always been understood to be authorized by the law of 1795 in the States, as to their militia.

It would seem that the right or authority to exercise this power, if it should exist anywhere, ought to exist and be exercised for the benefit of a people who are surrounded by hostile tribes of Indians, who, separated into small predatory bands, oftentimes overrun the country, destroying crops, driving off whole herds of cattle, frequently murdering the inhabitants, or carrying them into captivity, and who are a source of constant terror and annoyance. Of these occurrences we have frequent and almost daily accounts. We have heard of depredations committed last fall by the Apaches and Navajos at the Copper mines, which resulted in their carrying off a hundred and seventy head of stock, belonging to the Army, and to the Boundary Commission—or, which is all the same, to the Treasury of the United States; and we have had more recent accounts of their stealing, under the eye of the garrison of Fort Conrad, forty mules from the troops; and, although hotly pursued by our dragoons, escaping with their booty; of their running off with about the same number of animals from near Fort Fillmore; of their robbing and killing Mr. Brent, the lamented and distinguished member of the Legislature from Santa Fe, and his servant; of their entering La Joya, a Mexican town in the valley of the Rio Grande, and, after a regular battle, succeeding in carrying off all the stock they wanted, besides killing a number of New Mexicans; of their behaving in like manner with the inhabitants of Polvadera; also, of a small band of Apaches surprising three citizens from the village of Leimiter, and murdering them; of their entering the suburbs of El Paso, and killing four men; of their destruction of the mail party near San Antonio; of their attacking ten dragoons, who had in charge a United States wagon, returning to Fort Conrad, killing four of them, and wounding several, and taking off the wagon, with the mules; of their carrying off a hundred head of stock, and killing two non-commissioned officers near Fort Webster; all these outrages, and doubtless many others, were committed within the space of two months. The very last accounts that I have seen from New Mexico, show that the Indians are continuing their depredations to an alarming extent; that meetings are being held to memorialize Congress on the subject; and that the people are in a state of the greatest distress and misery.

I saw in a paper this morning, that on the 16th of March last, the Indians killed one man below Socorro; on the 18th, that one man was killed at Socorro and eight oxen stolen; that about the same time they took three Government mule teams and wagons, on their way from Albuquerque to the mountains, and that six men only could be mounted at headquarters for their pursuit; that of an express, sent by Major Emory to Mr. Bartlett, of the Boundary Commission, with dispatches, the whole party, numbering some fifteen men, had been killed; that a party of seven men, hunting up some pack-mules, were surprised and inhumanly murdered, near the mouth of the Colorado, by a very large party of Indians armed with clubs; that there were six soldiers and one citizen teamster, who were herding the animals of Major Fitzgerald, cut off from the camp by a body of more than two hundred Indians, and killed; after which the Indians made an open attack upon the camp, and were repulsed with the loss of four killed, and many wounded. A people so situated ought, at least, to have on hand, and be as liberally supplied with the means of defense and protection as the inhabitants of the older States, who are not subjected to such outrages, threatening the safety of all. It will be recollected, too, that the nature of the country affords but little for the support of an army, and that the transportation of the stores, provisions, and munitions of war (many of them perishable in their nature) for our troops, in wagons over so great a distance as to New Mexico, is exceedingly expensive; and also that the country, covered with thickets as bad as any in Florida, interlaced with an intermediate network of sloughs, abounding, as it does, in places of refuge and concealment, renders it easy for the Indians to avoid the troops, and is remarkably favorable for this predatory warfare.

The New Mexicans, too, could probably be far more effectually employed than any regular troops in expeditions against the hostile Indians, whose mode of fighting is familiar to them, and does not strike them with that degree of terror with which it inspires those men who enlist on the regular establishment.

We cannot, without impeachment both to our justice and our humanity, abandon the people of New Mexico to the plunder and rage of their savage enemies. And when we consider the warlike disposition of the Indians in general, and the alacrity with which the victors are ever sure to be joined by numerous allies; and when we know, too, that the savages place all their glory in deeds of war; and that among them a young man cannot make his appearance in company until he has signalized his valor by some martial achievement, it behooves us to encourage, instruct, and assist in every possible way our fellow-citizens, thus situated, that they may be able and prepared to defend themselves.

The theory of our Government is, that (instead of relying upon a large standing army) arms should be placed in the hands of all the people, and that they should unite for the protection of life, property, and freedom, and be themselves ever prepared to meet the shock of battle. The few American-born citizens residing in New Mexico, are doubtless well supplied with arms; but the New Mexicans are destitute, may be said to be entirely destitute, of any fit for service. What can be expected of a people thus deprived of the means of defending themselves or others, if acting under the consciousness of universal contempt and individual distrust? Would it not be better, far better, to endeavor to elevate them to the character of agents, upon whom devolves the duty of assisting in propelling this Government towards the end sought in its institutions? And will not the distribution of arms and books of tactics—the organization, discipline, and instruction of militia companies—the habit of exercising the privileges of freemen at the polls, of investigating the affairs of Government, and the conduct of public officers, have a tendency to give greater intelligence, industry, and exaltation of character, and to fasten immovably the affections of this people upon the political institutions of their country, and to excite every just feeling of national and individual pride?

There is another point it would be well for us to think of at an early date. By our treaty with Mexico, we are in fact made a party to their border Indian wars. If we were to be involved in general Indian hostilities in New Mexico, where the fastnesses of the country would enable them to hold out perhaps for many years, who could estimate the expense which would result from it, especially if we receive no aid from the inhabitants? It is said the Florida war cost $40,000,000; if so, the cost of a similar war in New Mexico might exceed $200,000,000. Shall we, then, afford to our well-disposed citizens no means, no encouragement, no power to defend themselves, and keep down those border difficulties, which have for years desolated the Mexican States; and thereby save millions of dollars to the Treasury, and thousands of lives of our fellow-citizens?

The bill further provides, that the militia and volunteers, when called into service, shall receive the same rates of pay allowed under the act of 1846 to the volunteers in Mexico and Texas, which is a trifle larger than the allowance of the United States troops. This will not be objected to when we consider the sacrifices to which they would be subjected when called off for a temporary purpose from their regular pursuits on a sudden emergency; and when we consider, also, that labor and every species of supplies are dearer in New Mexico and Oregon than they were in Texas and Mexico, where the same pay was allowed.

Mr. RICHARDSON, (interrupting.) I desire to call the gentleman's attention to one fact. I do not think there is any difficulty in relation to the provisions of the second section. The question, however, might arise, in relation to the allowance to be given these militia and volunteers, whether they would not also be entitled to the bounty land to which the volunteers in Mexico were entitled?

Mr. PEASLEE. In answer to the gentleman's inquiry, I would inform him that the same point had occurred to me, and thank him for alluding to it. I have made inquiry at the Pension Office Department, and was informed that bounty land would not be allowed under this provision.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask the gentleman from New Hampshire to permit me to make one other inquiry. I am in favor of the bill. I think the best means we can adopt for the purpose of defending our frontiers are those proposed in this bill. But I desire to inquire of the gentleman whether a like provision is made to distribute arms in the State of California and Texas, where depredations are likewise committed? If not, I would suggest that the bill be so modified as to include those States.

Mr. PEASLEE. In answer to the gentleman's inquiry, there is no provision for the distribution of arms to the States of Texas and California, as proposed by the bill, to the Territories. Those States and the Territories, however, are entitled to receive their annual quota of arms, according to the number of their militia, if they comply with the requisitions of the law. But the latest returns show our whole militia force to be 2,211,174 men. This will give only 5.18-100 muskets, with the requisite equipments, per 1000 militia men. A 6-pounder cannon, mounted and equipped, is rated as equivalent to 47.57-100 muskets and equipments. One cannon so furnished will, therefore, absorb the quota due to 9183 men.

It will be a long time, as the committee perceive, before the people of the Territories, or the new States alluded to by the gentleman from Illinois, could be armed under the general law. I have no objection to the amendment proposed by him, and will vote for it; but as the subject was not brought before the committee for whom I reported this bill, by any petition or application, it was not acted on by them.

It will be recollected, Mr. Chairman, that the President, in his annual message, and the Secretary of War, in his last report, recommend substantially the same measure now before the committee.

They recommend that every facility and encouragement should be afforded in these Territories to the formation of a local militia, in which they are now almost entirely deficient. As the first step towards the accomplishment of this object, it is important that the Executive be authorized to distribute arms among such portions of the inhabitants as the bill proposes, and the committee who have had this bill under consideration are fully persuaded that the advantages which would result from the adoption of this measure, in familiarizing the people with the use of arms, in inspiring them with confidence, and in encouraging the formation of militia companies, would far more than compensate for the trifling expense that would attend it. The very fact that the inhabitants were known to be armed would tend to intimidate the Indians, and save to some extent the necessity of their use.

Colonel Sumner, the intelligent commanding officer of our troops in New Mexico, in a letter from Fort Union, addressed to the Secretary of War, in October last, says: "Our system of shielding this people entirely must have a tendency to debase them. They never can become respectable American citizens, until they are able and willing to assist in defending their own firesides;" and he suggests that it would be well to organize several companies of Mexican volunteers, to receive army pay and rations when called out by the proper authorities, and only then. He advises that they be furnished with arms, and would have them instructed and encouraged in every possible way. This, he says, would make them respected and feared by the Indians there. The same remarks apply with equal force, and perhaps greater, to the people of Oregon, (so far as relates to the distribution of arms and the encouragement of a local militia,) for they are further removed from assistance, and have within their borders sixty tribes of Indians, although some of them are small.

As an additional reason for adopting this course, I am informed by the Secretary of War, that partly on account of the scarcity of forage in New Mexico, and partly with a view to afford protection to emigrants on the route to Oregon, several companies of dragoons now stationed in New Mexico, will probably be withdrawn, whereby the regular force assigned to the defense of this Territory will be considerably reduced.

The Constitution guarantees, not by implication, but in express terms, "protection of person and property" to the inhabitants of these Territories, as well as to all other citizens of this Republic. By the eleventh article of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, too, we are bound to protect the Mexican frontier against our Indians; and this frontier is equally exposed with our own Territories to their hostile incursions. Congress failed to raise the additional regiment of mounted men, recommended by the Executive at the last session, for the protection of our southwestern frontier and the adjacent Mexican States against the Indian tribes within our borders. The military force now stationed within the Territories, although forming a large portion of the army, is represented as entirely inadequate for the fulfillment of our treaty stipulations with Mexico, and to afford that "protection" which we are bound by our constitutional obligations to afford to all of our citizens. This measure is urged as all-important by the Delegates from the Territories of New Mexico and Oregon. It may be the means of saving the lives of many of our citizens and much of their property, and of saving the Government, too, a large amount of money by aiding in preventing those border difficulties and depredations of our Indians upon the Mexican frontier, which we are bound by our treaty stipulations to prevent, and in the transportation of the stores, subsistence and munitions of war, about nine hundred miles in wagons. It is a measure asked for by the President, to enable him to discharge his duty; the bill, too, in the form in which it has been reported and unanimously agreed upon by the committee, I am authorized to say, meets with the entire approbation of the Secretary of War in all its provisions, and I believe also of the Commander-in-Chief of the Army. It will be attended with but little comparative expense, and I hope the committee will not hesitate to adopt it at once, as an act of justice to the people of the Territories, and economy to the Government, and demanded alike by interest and duty.

Mr. PHELPS obtained the floor.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask the gentleman to yield for a moment, in order to enable me to offer an amendment. I propose, as an amendment to the bill, to insert after the word "Oregon," in the second section, the words "and the States of Texas and California."

Mr. PHELPS. I do not concur in opinion with the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. PEASLEE] as to the propriety or expediency of the first section of this bill. I desire as much as he can, and I desire as much as the Delegate from New Mexico can, that protection shall be extended to the people of New Mexico. I am as well aware as he is, or as the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. PEASLEE] can be, that there are depredations and murders committed by the Indians almost daily upon the inhabitants of New Mexico. But the inhabitants of that Territory are more peculiarly situated than the inhabitants of any other Territory. A large class of those citizens have recently been obliged to change their allegiance by no act, wish, or will, of their own. They have been transferred from Mexico to the United States, and it cannot be expected, among the ignorant Mexican population of that Territory, that any very great good-will or kind feeling should be manifested or entertained towards the American citizens who may be residing among them. You may divide the population of New Mexico into four classes: There is, first, the native-born Mexicans, who became citizens of the United States by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo—

[Here a message was received from the Senate, by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, its Secretary, informing the House that that body had passed House bills of the following titles:

An act for the relief of John W. Robinson;
An act for the further relief of Robert Milligan;
An act for the relief of Sylvanus Blodgett; and An act for the relief of Sylvanus Greer.

The Senate have also passed bills of the following titles:

An act to regulate the compensation of the district judge of the United States for the district of Massachusetts;

An act to provide for the removal of obstructions in the river Savannah, in the State of Georgia, and for the improvement of the same;

An act for the relief of Sarah D. Mackay;

An act for the relief of William Bédient, late a sergeant of the fourth regiment of artillery;

An act for the relief of Robert Armstrong;

An act for the relief of Guion & McLaughlin;

An act for the relief of Theodore E. Elliott;

An act for the relief of Barbary Reily;

An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Noah Miller, of Lincolnville, in the State of Maine, and the relief of other persons;

An act to amend and extend the provisions of an act entitled "An act for the relief of the widows and orphans of the officers, seamen, and marines of the United States schooner Grampus, and for other purposes," approved June 15, 1844;

An act for the relief of John McVey;

An act for the relief of Gad Humphreys;

An act for the relief of Nancy Bowen;

An act for the relief of Lafayette McLaws, of the United States Army;

An act for the relief of Richard King;

An act for the relief of the sureties of Daniel Winslow; and

An act for the relief of Rosanna Sowards;—

In which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.]

Mr. PHELPS (resuming.) I was remarking that the population of New Mexico might be divided into four classes. The native born Mexicans, who became citizens of the United States by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. The native Americans, who have emigrated from the States to New Mexico, and have resided there for some length of time. The Pueblo Indians, or the civilized Indians, inhabiting the towns and villages, who by the laws of Mexico were recognized as citizens, and entitled to the rights of citizenship, and it is contended that these Indians are citizens of the United States by virtue of the provisions of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. And then there is a fourth class, consisting of the wild Indians who, inhabiting the mountains, make incursions into the cultivated regions of the country, and commit these murders and robberies. Those murders and robberies are committed, as well upon the Pueblo Indians as upon the white citizens residing in that Territory. I do not profess—for such has been no part of the duty assigned to me as a member of this House—to know how far the military laws of the United States extend to the Territories, but my impression is, that there is no law of the United States authorizing the organization of the militia in the Territories of the United States. The act of 1792, the main provisions of which are now in force, only extends to the States. By the provisions of this bill, you authorize the President of the United States to cause arms to be distributed among such portions of the inhabitants of New Mexico and Oregon—but I have nothing to say in relation to Oregon, and confine my remarks entirely to New Mexico—as he may deem advisable. If these arms are to be distributed to the inhabitants of New Mexico, there is as much necessity for their distribution to the Pueblo Indians, as there is to the Mexicans who have become citizens of this country. The American-born citizens who are there need no arms to be distributed to them. There is no American-born citizen in the Territory of New Mexico who is not, at this time, as well armed as he would be if you pass the first section of this bill, and distribute arms to them. Nor is there a single citizen in Oregon Territory who is not armed, and they have gone out there—have crossed the Plains—as well armed, as a soldier is armed for the field of battle.

I tell you that the people who are inhabiting the Territories and living on the frontiers, do not need arms to be placed in their hands—I mean our native-born citizens—for the purpose of protecting themselves. I ask the Delegate from the Territory of New Mexico, [Mr. WEIGHTMAN,] if the American citizens in New Mexico, when traveling there, do not go armed, as much as if they were engaged in the military service of our country?

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I have to reply to the honorable gentleman from Missouri, that the American portion of the population of New Mexico have arms, but they comprise but a mere handful of the people of New Mexico. They do not exceed eight hundred; and those eight hundred will be very insufficient to carry out the objects intended by this bill—the protection of the people of that Territory. And further, I stand here and say that they, as a general thing, do not desire the protection of the people of that Territory. The whole population of New Mexico, as shown by the census, is 61,547, and this includes the Pueblo Indians, a very respectable class of the community.

Mr. PHELPS. Certainly; a very respectable and industrious class they are.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Out of that number, there are of persons born in the States, five hundred and thirty-eight, and no more; and of persons born in other foreign countries, two hundred and sixty-two, making in all only eight hundred people, other than New Mexicans, in the whole Territory.

Mr. PHELPS. I do not at this time want the others armed, except when called into the military service of the country. The gentleman from New Mexico has answered me, and has answered as I knew he must answer, that the American-born citizens are all of them armed. He has furthermore stated to this House, that there are about eight hundred of them, and that they do not desire the Mexican inhabitants to receive arms.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. I did not say that; and perhaps it may be as well now to remind the House, what I told them before, that I have accompanying me from New Mexico, an escort of seven or eight persons, (though I cannot call it an escort of honor,) who come here for the purpose of defeating everything like beneficial legislation for that country. One of them stands behind the gentleman now.

PUBLISHED AT WASHINGTON, BY JOHN C. RIVES.—TERMS $3 FOR THIS SESSION.

32D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, MAY 25, 1852.

NEW SERIES....No. 91.

Mr. PHELPS. The gentleman will excuse me, if I desire him to confine himself to the subject-matter under consideration. I understand him to remark, that those New Mexicans who are here desire not to see the Mexican citizens armed. Well may they desire it. Well may they express such a request. I had occasion, a day or two since, to refer to the last information received from New Mexico. And what is that information? It is that the Governor of this Territory had released the prisoners confined in jail in New Mexico, because there was no money with which to purchase provisions for feeding them. The Governor, in his notification to the prefect of Santa Fé, advised him to call out an additional police, for the purpose of protecting the property and the lives of the citizens of New Mexico. In addition to that, the same express brings the intelligence that Governor Calhoun is in fear of an insurrection, and that rumors of an insurrection are hourly reaching Santa Fé, and I have seen dispatches brought by this express from New Mexico, which confirm these statements.

Now, when fears are entertained by the Governor of New Mexico, when the latest intelligence you have states that there are rumors of an insurrection, when the very day upon which an attack is to be made upon the "Exchange," in the city of Santa Fé, has been designated, will you place arms in the hands of those men who will perhaps use them to subvert the authority of the Government in that Territory?

I believe, myself, that the second section of this bill is a just one. I am in favor of calling upon the militia. I am in favor of calling volunteers, in this distant Territory, into service, instead of depending so much upon the regular force there. I believe they are far more active and more efficient men, more accustomed to traversing the plains, and with the habits of these Indians, than the regulars. In short, they are better Indian fighters than regulars. They are much better fitted for the defense of that country than all the regulars you can send there. Hence it is that I oppose the first section of the bill, and am in favor of the second section.

I go as far as the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. WEIGHTMAN] can ask for the protection of those people; but are you going to distribute arms, and place them in the hands of a people, whom the Governor of that Territory believes to be now meditating an insurrection? I know not from what cause it has arisen; I know nothing about it, except from this letter of the Governor, addressed to the prefect of Santa Fé, to which I have referred, that he must advise the civil authorities of Santa Fé to call out additional police, to protect them from the consequences of the act which the Governor himself has perpetrated upon them.

I am aware, Mr. Chairman, that there is some hostility existing between the American citizens and the people of New Mexico. I do not come here prepared to enter into the discussion of the origin, or of the cause of that hostility, nor will I; for I desire to speak directly to the bill. I am aware that there was a difficulty, which occurred at some of the elections which have taken place in that Territory; that a gentleman by the name of Burdett, from the State of New York, was killed at that election. I am aware that a very respectable citizen of the Territory of New Mexico, and formerly of the State of Missouri, (Mr. Skinner,) a man who has been honored with the confidence of the people of the county in which he formerly resided, and who afterwards became a citizen of New Mexico, was slaughtered when visiting the house of Armijo, one of the most wealthy and influential native Mexicans; that he was basely murdered, or, to take the other version of it, that a manslaughter was perpetrated, in a quarter where few American citizens resided.

It is confidently stated that, upon the grand jury which was impaneled at the time, it was expected that an indictment was to be found against him. There were some members who were present when Skinner was murdered, and who were relatives of Armijo, and who were themselves implicated in the commission of this crime.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Will the honorable gentleman be good enough to say who were the officers of that court?

Mr. PHELPS. I do not know.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Were they not United States officers?

Mr. PHELPS. Most assuredly they were the United States judges. I thought you inquired their names.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. Who was the prosecutor?

Mr. PHELPS. They were United States officers; but the question may arise, under what laws that court was held—what laws were in force in that Territory providing for the impaneling of a grand jury, and whether the Legislature of New Mexico had made any provision in relation to the impaneling of a grand jury, and for challenging the persons summoned upon that jury.

These are some of the causes which, I presume, have produced feelings of hostility between the citizens of that Territory of different origin. But this is foreign to the subject under discussion. I am aware of the recommendation of the Secretary of War, to which the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. PEASLEE] has referred. I will read it. It is in his annual report:

"I would suggest that every facility and encouragement should be afforded to the formation of a local militia, in which our new possessions, like all the Mexican States, are very deficient. As the first step towards the accomplishment of this object, I would recommend that the Executive be authorized to distribute arms among the inhabitants. I am fully persuaded that the advantages that would result from the adoption of this measure, in familiarizing the people with the use of arms, in inspiring them with confidence, and in encouraging the formation of militia companies would more than compensate for the trifling expense that would attend it. The very fact that the inhabitants were known to be armed would tend to intimidate the Indians. The distribution should, of course, be made with such precaution as would prevent their being sold or converted to an improper use."

These are the remarks of the Secretary of War. I cannot concur with him in this recommendation; but I do believe that if you desire to keep down the incursions of these Indians—if you call for two or three, or as many volunteer companies as may be needed, which would be composed partly of American-born citizens, and a portion of the Mexican-born citizens, and will place them in service together, where they will be compelled to defend themselves, they will be found more efficient than all the dragoons and infantry that you can send to that Territory, and it would, in my opinion, be a cheaper mode of defense than the present system. I do not wish to dispense with regulars altogether; but desire a force composed of regulars and volunteers for the defense of the Territory.

Mr. Chairman, there was a little matter to which the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. WEIGHTMAN] had occasion to refer. He spoke of my sources of information of affairs in New Mexico, and seemed to think I acquired all my information from gentlemen residents of that Territory, and now in this city. I freely admit, however, that nearly all the information which I have obtained of the affairs of New Mexico has also been confirmed or corroborated by the letters of the correspondents of the St. Louis Republican and of the St. Louis Intelligencer; and I understand that one of the correspondents of the St. Louis Republican is the present Secretary of that Territory.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. No; he is not now the Secretary of that Territory.

Mr. PHELPS. Well, perhaps he may have just resigned. I mean Mr. Allen. I have also been informed by one of the editors of that paper, that their correspondents in New Mexico had every means and opportunity of procuring reliable information, and that they were gentlemen of intelligence and veracity. I have proceeded upon that information. That is the source from which I have derived the greatest part of my information. The gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. PEASLEE], has alluded to the necessity of defending the frontiers between New Mexico and Mexico from the incursions of the Indians, and has referred to our treaty obligations with Mexico upon that point, and urges that the inhabitants of New Mexico shall be furnished with arms in order to prevent these Indians from marauding within the limits of the Republic of Mexico.

How much do you expect to be able to defend from any incursions of the Indians in the Territory or Republic of Mexico by furnishing the inhabitants of New Mexico with arms? You will not prevent these incursions from being carried on, but, on the contrary, you will only tend to increase them by driving these Indians off from their accustomed haunts of thieving and robbing, and send them to prowl upon their neighbors, and upon other portions of our territory.

The wild Indians who inhabit this Territory are not in a destitute condition. They possess stock, and raise a sufficient amount of grain for their subsistence; but they come down from their mountains into the plains and valleys of the Rio Grande for the purpose of stealing and driving off the stock of the inhabitants. If they cannot do this stealthily, some person is generally killed on one side or the other in their forays. It is not want that impels these Indians to make these incursions. It is not a starving tribe that commits these murders and robberies. Many people in the old States imagine the reason these robberies and murders are committed by the Indians is, that they are impelled by necessity to preserve themselves from starvation, or by some outrage perpetrated by the white man. No doubt such has been the case sometimes, but I do not believe it to be so in New Mexico. Ever since we have known anything of that Territory we find that the Indians have considered the white inhabitants of Mexico, residing within that Territory, as persons placed there to raise stock for the Indians to plunder and drive off. It is a system of rapine and destruction which has been pursued by the Indians for the last twenty or thirty years. They have driven off so much stock that, on the same portion of the Territory of New Mexico from whence annually many flocks of several thousand of sheep were driven, thirty or forty years ago, to the city of Chihuahua, and from thence to Sonora and other portions of Mexico, you can hardly find a flock of sheep. They have plenty of subsistence in their own mountains. They raise their corn and stock there. But they come down from a mere love of plunder, and from a hope to expel the white man, who has taken their country and encroached on them, by waging war against him. They seek to drive him off.

I am aware the Mexicans are not well supplied with arms; in fact they have but few, and those have been mainly obtained since we conquered that country. It was not the policy of the Mexican Government, perhaps for the want of means, to arm its citizens in New Mexico. The greater part of those people have become citizens. They are of themselves without the means of defense. They look entirely to the Government for protection. If arms were distributed to them, they would pass by sale or barter from one to another until they might pass into the hands of some of the Indians. The tribes of wild Indians inhabiting that country are divided into bands. Some of them receive presents from the Government; some have made treaties with us. But I believe it has occurred whilst one band of a tribe has come in to have a talk with their Father in the Territory, and receive presents, another band of the same tribe is in another part of the Territory robbing the citizens of their stock, and perhaps committing murders. These robberies and murders are as often committed against the Pueblo Indians as against the white man. And that class of people are the most quiet, peaceable, industrious, and unoffending of the citizens of New Mexico, and by some who have visited that Territory, are termed its best citizens. I mean of those which we have acquired by the treaty with Mexico.

I hope the second section of the bill, which provides for calling out volunteers should additional force be needed in the Territories, will pass; and for the defense of New Mexico, I hope those volunteers will be raised in that Territory. If called into the service, they will be armed by the Government. I have made inquiry if there is a supply of arms for that purpose, and am informed at the War Department, that there is now in the depot at Fort Union a large supply of muskets, musketoons, and rifles. These volunteer companies would be composed of citizens Mexican and American by birth. Being brought into immediate contact with each other, and engaged in a common cause—their own protection and defense—much, very much, would be done to remove their mutual prejudices. I cannot consent to furnish the inhabitants of New Mexico with arms, until they are called into the military service of the country. I cannot consent, when we have the rumor of an insurrection in that Territory, to vote that arms may be placed in the hands of the inhabitants of that Territory, to be, perhaps, hereafter used in a more formidable insurrection—to arm those whom perhaps we may be compelled to chastise—to place weapons in their hands to be used against the legal and constituted authorities of the Territory.

These are the reasons why I have felt it incumbent upon myself to oppose the first section of this bill; at least, so much of it as applies to the Territory of New Mexico.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is very apparent that we cannot get through with the territorial business unless we terminate debate. I move that the committee rise.

The question was then put on the motion, and it was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman of the committee reported, that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the special order, being House bill No. 259, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move that all debate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon bill No. 259, be closed in fifteen minutes after the committee shall have again resumed its consideration.

The question was then put, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOCKHART. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, upon the special order.

The question was then put, and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of House bill No. 259.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. The object of this bill has been well explained by the chairman of the Committee on the Militia. It has for its object the distribution of arms, ammunition, &c., to the people of New Mexico and Oregon, to enable them to protect themselves against the incursions of the savage Indian foes who surround them.

The measure proposed by this bill has been recommended by the Secretary of War, by the General-in-Chief, by the Quartermaster-General, and I believe, by the Interior Department. It is recommended as a measure of defense, and as a measure of economy.

Besides being recommended, it has to a certain extent been carried out by the present commander of the troops in New Mexico, Colonel Sumner, without express authority of law, because of the urgent existing necessity of such a step in New Mexico. And yet the honorable gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PHELPS] objects to placing arms in the hands of the people of New Mexico.

That Colonel Sumner has issued arms to the people to a certain extent in order to their self-protection against Indians, I know from a communication of a Mr. Merritt to the Santa Fé Gazette, who mentions the fact as a reproach on Colonel Sumner, who is charged by this person with, by this act, degrading the Army.

The acts and doings of Colonel Sumner, whose fame is of record in the military history of the country, have met little of the approbation of a certain class in New Mexico, whom the honorable gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PHELPS] represents on this floor. The Governor of New Mexico is not approved by this class, nor the people of the country. Yet the previous character of the officers I have named would justify the belief that they desire to perform the duties which their Government has confided to them, and reason and common sense would induce us to believe that the people desire to promote their own welfare and happiness. Yet those whom the honorable gentleman represents, object to people, governor, and commander of troops.

The difficulty is, that the persons whom the honorable gentleman represents, are in nowise interested either in promoting the general prosperity of the people I represent, or in the protection of the country against Indian invasion. They do not like the late movement of the troops from the towns to the frontiers. Though most persons would suppose that this was a good movement, as against Indians who are not residents of the towns, the friends of the honorable gentleman do not approve.

Few or no contracts are now given out. The corn and grass trade is ruined, and the price of calicoes has come down.

How is the giving out of contracts to be stimulated—the corn and grass trade revived, and the price of calico to be advanced?

Much could be done if the troops could be recalled from the frontier again to garrison the towns.

Rumor upon rumor has been put afloat in New Mexico of "war between the races," of "danger to American lives," and insurrectionary movements. To some of these the honorable gentleman has alluded, and, indeed, what was rumor in the beginning and rumor at last, he has assumed as fact. He has alluded to the death of Mr. Skinner, which he has characterized as a "brutal murder," committed by a Mexican. This matter was examined into by the chief justice of New Mexico, a countryman of the deceased, and not a Mexican, who, after a careful examination of witnesses, a number of whom were friends of the deceased, gave the opinion I now read:

OPINION OF THE COURT.

"The testimony in this case establishes, with reasonable certainty, these facts: 1st. That the deceased, before and at the time of his death, cherished feelings of a hostile character towards the accused. 2d. That, in accordance with these feelings, he had threatened him with personal chastisement, of a nature the most degrading to an honorable mind. These facts are proved by the witness, Thomas. He states that he had no reason to suppose that the threats were pointed at Ambrosio Armijo; and the deceased having made the assault upon the accused immediately after an interview with Ambrosio, the reasonable presumption is, that they were aimed at the accused. 3d. That at the time the attack was made, the accused was in his store, engaged in his ordinary pursuits; and that the assault upon him by the deceased was a matter of surprise, and wholly unexpected. 4th. That the deceased entered the store with a hostile intention, and armed for deadly conflict. 5th. That prior to the giving of the fatal blow, several other persons became engaged in the conflict.

"In view of these facts, suppose the deceased had killed the accused, what would have been the character of his crime? Bearing malice against the accused, as it appears he did, he would have incurred the guilt of murder of the darkest dye. A man's house has been styled his 'castle,' and the law holds it sacred from all unlawful intrusion. But this was a store, and it may be said that all persons might lawfully enter there. True, all persons might, during proper hours, lawfully enter, provided it be for a lawful purpose; but against the intrusion of all persons actuated by unjustifiable motives, the law holds it as sacred as it does his dwelling, the earthly sanctuary of his family.

"When the deceased entered the store in the manner shown by the evidence, and presented his cocked pistol at the breast of the accused, had he cause to apprehend that great bodily harm was about to be inflicted upon him? That he had, the court is satisfied, and had he then taken the life of the deceased it would have been a clear case of justifiable homicide, and the court would not have hesitated a moment to discharge him.

"So, too, if he had killed him after they got from behind the counter, or after they got out of the store, or at any time before the interference of third persons, provided the deceased still retained the means and the power, and manifested the intention, to do the deceased some great bodily harm.

"It is the necessity of taking the life of an assailant, in order to prevent him doing some great bodily harm, that constitutes the justification in the eye of the law. When that necessity ceases, the justification also ceases. Whether the necessity, which did at one time exist in this case, ceased before the fatal blow was given, is a matter involved in much obscurity, and one about which the court has serious doubts. It would seem that the timely interference of two or three bystanders, properly directed, might have rendered it unnecessary, for the safety of the accused, to take the life of the deceased.

"Considering all the facts and circumstances of the case, in the entire absence of any proof of malice or ill-feeling on the part of the accused towards the deceased, it seems to the court that the highest offense they could constitute would be one of the lower grades of manslaughter.

"The court will require the accused to enter into bond, with one or more good and sufficient sureties, in the sum of $1,500, conditioned according to law for his appearance at the next term of the district court of the United States, for the third judicial district of the Territory of New Mexico, to be held at the court-house of the county of Bernalillo, on the 25th day of October, 1851, and in default of such bail that he stand committed to the jail of the said county until discharged by due course of law."

In no court in the United States would this be considered a "murder," and in my opinion nothing was established to show manslaughter, or anything else than justifiable homicide.

A man engaged in lawful business, under his own roof-tree, with his pen, an implement of peace, in his hand, who, startled and surprised by the presentation of a pistol at his head in the hands of an enemy, kills his assailant—justifiably kills him, and commits neither murder nor manslaughter.

At the succeeding court, presided over, not by the chief justice before whom the examination was had, but by another countryman of the deceased, Hon. Judge Mower, well known to the delegation from Michigan, the grand jury found no bill against Mr. Juan Cristobal Armijo, whom the honorable gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PHELPS] has said, and said truly, is one of the most respectable men in New Mexico, and I say he will suffer by no comparison with the honorable gentleman himself.

Yet after all this the honorable gentleman says a "brutal murder" has been committed. Who believes it?

This is the horrible case—the "brutal murder" to which the honorable gentleman has alluded, and is one of many rumors which have been circulated and sent to the United States, the tendency, if not the object, of which has been to effect the recall of the troops from the frontier to the towns—from the frontier where they have been ordered to chastise the barbarian enemies of New Mexico, to the towns—for the avowed purpose of protecting American lives, and for the real purpose of insuring a good sale of corn and hay, plenty of Government contracts for the honorable gentleman's constituents, and of advancing the price of calico.

If ever there has been a people who, under our Government, have been harassed and oppressed, it is the people of New Mexico.

After all that has taken place, the neglect of the Government of the United States cannot be excused. I will not here, in my place, under these circumstances, when it is proposed to deny to the people of New Mexico the poor boon of defending themselves against the attacks of the savage foes by whom they are surrounded—I will not extenuate the neglect of the Government, or the conduct which many of my countrymen in New Mexico have pursued towards the New Mexicans. I am here to execute my duty, and I intend to do it without fear, favor, or affection.

The New Mexicans have been neglected by the Government, and maltreated and oppressed by that portion of my countrymen in New Mexico who are represented by the honorable gentleman from Missouri,—persons who have not a single eye to the public good in New Mexico, but another one, also, which squints somewhat towards their own personal profit or loss, and looks beyond to the time when, with the money they may be able to make out of the New Mexicans, they will return to the section in which they do feel an interest. The Governor of New Mexico is opposed by these people, and his offense in their eyes is, that he has stood between them and the people at whose expense they desired to secure selfish and personal ends. Among the apprehensions of the honorable gentleman, is one that the arms proposed to be distributed by this bill will be sold or given by the New Mexicans to the murdering and plundering Indians who are now laying waste their country. I have not the time, in the few minutes allowed me, to take up and consider all the points presented by the honorable gentleman, else I should be happy to do so.

I have before me a table prepared at the Census Bureau, showing the loss of stock in the different counties in New Mexico by Indian depredations, from August 1st, 1846, to January 1st, 1851, from which I will read to the committee:

NEW MEXICO.

Counties.	Population.	Stock run off by Indians from August 1, 1846, to January 1, 1851.
		Sheep.	Mules.	Horses.	Cattle.
Santa Fé....	7,713	16,260	570	267	894
Taos.....	9,507	17,089	1,032	1,764	5,600
Rio Arriba....	10,668	43,489	1,960	658	2,382
San Miguel....	7,074	50,000	7,000	3,000	20,000
Santa Anna....	4,645	154,915	749	989	1,302
Bernalillo....	7,751	171,558	576	372	1,403
Valencia....	14,147
Total.....	61,505	453,293	11,887	7,050	31,581

These, Mr. Chairman, are startling figures; but the table from which I am reading, prepared at the Census Bureau, goes on and gives the value of the protection which the Government of the United States has given to my constituents.

The Census Bureau goes on, in the table from which I am reading, to give the—

VALUE OF STOCK.

453,293 Sheep, at $1 25 per head.....	$566,616 25
11,887 Mules, at 50 00 “ .....	594,350 00
7,050 Horses, at 30 00 “ .....	211,500 00
31,581 Cattle, at 12 00 “ .....	378,972 00
	$1,751,438 25

One million and three quarters is, in itself, a respectable number of dollars, but gives no proper idea of the actual loss in New Mexico. The estimates are all too low; sheep are, at this time, in New Mexico, worth from two dollars and a half to three dollars per head, and cattle, twenty dollars or more per head, to say nothing of mules and horses.

The loss per annum, then, in New Mexico, since that country has been under the protection of this Government from Indian depredations, may safely be calculated to exceed $500,000.

If you, Mr. Chairman, or any member of this committee, who is fond of calculation, please, you can amuse yourself by finding out how many of the children of my constituents, whom the honorable gentleman from Missouri has stated to be so ignorant, might, with this annual sum, be sent to school and educated.

The table from which I am reading shows the number of farms in New Mexico. The number is 3,750. With this additional item the calculation may be varied, and it may be discovered what is the value of the protection afforded to each farmer in New Mexico.

This will give some idea of how far short the Government of the United States has fallen in carrying out the provisions of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, which was entered into in the NAME OF ALMIGHTY GOD, and by which it was stipulated that the Mexicans in the original country should be protected in life, liberty, property, and religion.

As I had occasion to show, in reply to a previous attack made by the honorable gentleman upon my constituents, as well as upon the Governor of New Mexico, the military government, which, for a long time, this Government neglected to abate, as administered by Munroe, not only failed to protect, but actually assailed the liberty, property, and religion of my constituents, and up to this hour, savage Indians are permitted to deprive them of life and property.

The honorable gentleman from Missouri has, in the course of his remarks, shown that he is aware of the great depredations, and the frequent murders the Indians are committing upon my constituents, and yet he is apprehensive, that if arms are distributed to the New Mexicans, that they will put them in the hands of the Indians, who are now perpetrating all these wrongs upon them.

The statement of the gentleman's proposition is its own refutation.

By the bill under consideration, it is not made imperative on the President to distribute arms, but he is merely “authorized to cause arms to be distributed among such portions of the inhabitants as he may deem advisable, and under such regulations and precautions as may be considered necessary,” &c. The bill is well enough guarded, as has been shown by the chairman of the Committee on the Militia.

Though I, myself, am utterly incredulous in regard to the last rumor to which the honorable gentleman has alluded, of recent apprehended disturbances in Santa Fé, I do not desire to conceal from Congress the fact, that the Governor of New Mexico has paid so much attention to the rumors circulated there, that, like a prudent man, he has taken steps of preparation for unexpected emergencies. I have seen the telegraphic dispatch to which the gentleman has alluded, and the Governor expressly states his disbelief in the story of the “war of races,” the belief of which those whom the honorable gentleman represents have taken so much pains to bring about.

I know something about New Mexican rumors, or I should rather call them stampedes, and distrust them all; and particularly do I distrust all those which, by raising a clamor in the towns, tend towards the recall of the troops from the frontier. They smell too strongly of hay and corn contracts, and calico.

The honorable chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, pending the discussion of the deficiency bill, stated to the House that the expenditure for the army in New Mexico were enormous. The item of house-rents in Santa Fé particularly struck his attention. The honorable chairman read from a table of house-rents, extracted from the accounts of the gentleman who contested my seat, whose memorial the honorable gentleman from Missouri presented to the House when he made his first onslaught on the character of the people I represent.

The chairman of the Committee on Finance, in the Senate, has also spoken of the extraordinary expenditures in New Mexico. He stated that the expenditures of the quartermaster in New Mexico, for the fiscal year ending June, 1851, was about $300,000, and that of that amount nearly $600,000 was for forage. This was under the old plan, when Munroe kept the troops in the large towns, by way of whipping the Indians who were on the frontiers, and when the gentleman whom the Committee on Elections so summarily disposed of, and in whom the honorable gentleman from Missouri took so much interest, was the disburser of the funds which came so easy and went so easy.

Colonel Sumner, the successor of Munroe, has changed matters somewhat. He thinks that the enemies he was sent to New Mexico to subdue are the Indians, and not the citizens, and he has removed the troops to the frontier for more convenient fighting. It is true, that this idea of his has rendered him very unpopular with the persons in whom the honorable gentleman from Missouri takes so much interest, because when the troops are moving on the frontier they can get little or no corn and grass for nothing.

The mode of proceeding adopted by Sumner has decreased the Quartermaster General's estimate, for the item of forage alone, $300,000 per annum. In town, prairie-grass hay is worth from forty dollars to sixty dollars a ton. On the frontier, you can get twice as much for nothing.

Such little differences, amounting in all to (say) only $1,000 a day, is comfortable picking for the constituents of the honorable gentleman from Missouri. By constituents, I mean those whom the honorable gentleman represents quoad hoc, such as the late dispenser of patronage in New Mexico, his clerk, the sutlers, contractors, recipients of quartermaster's jobs, and the gamblers for such beardless lieutenants and disbursing officers' clerks as desire to bet against his bank, who are now, or heretofore have been, in this city attempting to thwart all beneficial legislation for New Mexico.

The gentleman from Missouri acknowledges that he gets his items from these persons, whom I may speak of as my escort, though not escort of honor.

A VOICE. A dishonorable escort.

Mr. WEIGHTMAN. To show the recklessness of the persons in whose behalf the honorable gentleman seems so much interested, how little they care to promote the interest of the Government towards whom they represent all others to be unfaithful, I read from a letter of Governor Calhoun, to the Indian Department:

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
SANTA FE, NEW MEXICO, June 30, 1851. }

SIR: For more than a month past insurrection and treason have been rife. You are aware, if I mistake not, that I visited Anton Chico on the 16th of last month, in company with Colonel Munroe and others, for the purpose of having a further talk with the Apaches residing east of the Rio del Norte, and of distributing among them some corn, as they complained of being in a starving condition. Several days before we reached Anton Chico a Comanche delegation arrived, and resolved to await my arrival. On the 14th, two days anterior to our arrival, the Indians departed in great haste. Subsequent inquiries brought to light the fact that they were frightened off by infamous individuals, who stated to them the Americans were gathering for the purpose of murdering all the Indians we could find. Not an Indian was seen, nor could I ascertain who put in circulation the report. Messengers (runners) were sent in the direction of the Bosque Redondo, who fell in with the Comanches who came to this superintendency on the 28th of May. During the ensuing day we had a long talk, in the presence of Colonel Munroe and a number of other persons. During the afternoon the chief, Eagle Feathers, visited me in my quarters, sold to me a captive, manifested perfect satisfaction at all that had passed, and repeated that nothing but death would prevent his visiting me again, with chiefs and others, before two moons should terminate their rounds. Between twelve and one o'clock on the morning of the 30th, these Indians fled from the city, leaving behind them their animals, arms, robes, and provisions. So soon as I ascertained the fact, I sent out agents in search of them; one only was overtaken, and he returned and stated that, about twelve o'clock at night the chief was called out, by whom he could not tell, and when he returned he stated they must run without a moment's delay, as we were preparing to have them all killed the next day. I sent out persons to have their property returned, a schedule of which you will find inclosed; this was done at a heavy cost, but I could not do otherwise. The Indians in their flight carried off a number of animals belonging to individuals residing between this and Anton Chico; and a widow, who had lost nine, informed me on yesterday all had been returned but one, and nine other articles of no great value, for which she claims indemnification. This return of property was caused by the receipt of their own, which I had sent to them; since then I have received two messages from them, desiring me to visit them, or to authorize them to come in. The latter proposition is altogether inadmissible, and will be so regarded until insurrectionary and treasonable intents are subdued. Ignorant as I am of the purposes of the Government, and entirely destitute of means, the first proposition cannot be entertained; but the end is not yet.

During the present month almost every conceivable effort has been made to induce the Pueblo Indians to take up arms, saying the party in the ascendancy in the Territory intended to take from them their lands and property, and to drive them out of the country or exterminate them.

The Pueblo Indians have besieged, almost, the superintendency during the present month. They held a council here, which lasted the greater part of three days. This council was composed of the Pueblos of Sandia, Santa Ana, San Felipe, Cia, Santa Domingo, Cochiti; and subsequently San Idefonso, Santa Clara, Tesuque Nambé, San Juan, and Taos, sent in delegations, all highly excited. Not one of the Pueblos at this time desire to abandon their old customs and usages; and you may rely upon it these people must be treated with the utmost delicacy, or bloody scenes will be witnessed in this Territory. A delicate induction will bring these people to any point you may desire; but it must be delicate, and protection must be afforded to them.

I have not time to say more, and have the honor to be your obedient servant,

JOHN S. CALHOUN.

HON. LUKE LEA,
Commissioner of Indian Affairs, Washington, D. C.

The Indians were by false representations frightened out of Santa Fé where they had come to see the agent of the Government, by false information conveyed to them for none other than mischievous purposes. The Indians, as the Governor in his letter states, fled on the morning of the 30th of May.

In the Santa Fé Gazette of that identical date appears the paragraph I now read:

“Query.—Some inquisitive fellow has sent us the following quiz:

“‘Who ran the Comanches out of town?’
“The same meddlesome fellow that does nearly all the mischief perpetrated hereabouts—Quien Sabe.”

Most persons here would consider such conduct as this very reprehensible; but by the editor of the Santa Fé Gazette, the organ of the friends of the honorable gentleman from Missouri, it is considered an excellent joke—a quiz.

I will mention another piece of recklessness. On one occasion rumors gathered in Santa Fé in the most authentic way that the Mexican inhabitants of Taos county were in a state of insurrection—that American lives were in great danger there—and that the mills of Mr. St. Vrain, a contractor, had been attacked, and burnt to the ground. These rumors came to Santa Fé, supported by apparently the clearest testimony. The distance from Santa Fé to Taos is only seventy miles, and most respectable persons said it was all as true as preaching. Under these alarming circumstances troops were ordered post haste from Santa Fé to Taos to quell the insurrection, and protect endangered American lives. One company of artillery marched from Santa Fé to Taos, (perhaps the force was greater,) and, on its arrival there, found the inhabitants industriously laboring in their fields, and the St. Vrain mills—the burnt down St. Vrain mills—in active operation, grinding flour for the Government. Although this mistake brought some expense to the Government, and gave unnecessary trouble to officers and soldiers, it may be that some corresponding advantage was gained. But this is merely suggestion. It is barely possible that somebody in the county into which the troops marched may have disposed of some corn or forage which otherwise would have been unused.
